In addition to these records, an examination of the invoices of Respondent Sloan reveals that entries were made on these documents by Jacqueline Hanley, Hugh Hanley Jr., and Hugh Hanley III, who is a son of the senior Hanleys and an employee of Respondent Kenmore. On an invoice for a project for a company, National Fire Adjusters,[13] the words, "Pat call Obersheimer if you disagree" appear and they were written by Jacqueline Hanley. C. Hanley testified that it was her mother who received the call from the customer because neither she nor her brother Patrick was in the office. She did not know what, if any, discussion her mother had with the customer, and she did not know what the notation meant. There was also a document bearing a Respondent Kenmore's letterhead attached to an invoice for a company, G. A. Dyce, dated November 30, 1983.[14] On the document, bearing Respondent Kenmore's letterhead, there is a notation, about a customer's order, in the handwriting of Jacqueline Hanley. C. Hanley explained that her mother also took this order because she and her brother were not in the office. The record reveals that several documents attached to an invoice for another company, Norcan Steel Corp., dated November 7, 1983,[15] are in the handwriting of Hugh Hanley Jr. and Hugh Hanley III and these documents described both the type of work to be performed and the price to be charged for this work.[16] C. Hanley was unable to explain the involvement of her father and brother in this project, which was a Respondent Sloan job, and she was unable to state whether they were paid by Respondent Sloan for their services. An invoice for a company, Spancrete Northeast, dated November 19, 1983,[17] contains a notation in Jacqueline Hanley's handwriting, "contract price, no tax." C. Hanley testified that it was her brother who received the call about this order but her mother reviewed the order because it involved a question about whether tax should be paid. According to C. Hanley, she did seek her mother's advice about tax questions because she was new in the business and unfamiliar with tax matters.[18] Another invoice for Norcon Steel Corp., dated November 30, 1983,[19] also has attached to it, in the handwriting of Hugh Hanley Jr., the work to be performed and the price to be charged for the job. C. Hanley could not explain why her father was involved in making this estimation of the job but she did note that in another document attached to this invoice, her brother Patrick also quoted the same price for the job. Finally, an invoice for a company, CJS Sign, dated November 7, 1983, has a document attached to it, in the handwriting of Hugh Hanley Jr., which describes the work to be performed and the price to be charged. C. Hanley admitted that the job was performed at the price quoted by her father to the customer. However, she testified that she did not know whether her father had the authority, generally, to quote prices to customers for work to be performed by Respondent Sloan.

Exh. 7, a red marking pen was used to identify Kazinski's handwriting; a black marking pen was used to identify Jacqueline Hanley's handwriting; a blue ball pen was used to identify C. Hanley's handwriting; entries made by Hugh Hanley Jr. are identified by the words "Hugh Jr."; Patrick Hanley's handwriting is identified by the word "Pat"; the handwriting of Respondent Sloan employee Linda Longobardi is identified by the word "Linda"; the handwriting of Respondent Kenmore's employee Hugh Hanley III is identified by the word "Hugh III."

[10] An entry made by Jacqueline Hanley indicated that an employee was owed moneys. C. Hanley testified that neither she nor her brother was in the office when the employee called and her mother took the message, noted it on the payroll record, and subsequently the employee was paid.

[11] C. Hanley attended school after July 1983 during the day. However, C. Hanley had hired another employee in October 1983, Linda Longobardi, to assist in the office work.

[12] C. Hanley testified that employees of Respondent Kenmore assisted other tenants with the maintenance of records. In fact, Respondent Kenmore's secretary, Shelly Schintsius, prepared the payroll for one of Respondent Kenmore's other tenants.

The record establishes that after Respondent Sloan commenced its operations it had 1 job in 1981, 7 jobs in 1982, and 13 jobs in 1983, and during this period it employed as few as 3 employees[20] in 1981 and as many as 12 to 14 employees in the summer of 1983. Respondent Sloan was engaged in basically the same type of business as Respondent Kenmore, i.e., construction work and the rental of crane equipment. However, Respondent Sloan did not own the crane equipment it rented to third corporations but, rather, it rented this equipment from Respondent Kenmore.[21] There was no verbal or written agreement between the two Respondents that permitted Respondent Sloan to rent Respondent Kenmore's equipment to third corporations, and it does not appear that Respondent Kenmore had permitted corporations, other than Respondent Sloan, to rent its equipment to third parties. Respondent Sloan charged these third corporations the same rental fee it had been charged by Respondent Kenmore and, thus, did not make a profit on the rental of the equipment. The profit, according to C. Hanley, was made from the moneys that were charged for the services of Respondent Sloan's employees who operated the equipment. Respondent Sloan's employees were nonunion. Respondent Kenmore, prior to this time, had not rented its equipment to other companies without an operator, who was a member of the Union. The record fails to establish that the extra moneys derived by Respondent Sloan from the rental of Respondent Kenmore's equipment was shared with Respondent Kenmore.[22] C. Hanley testified that representatives of Respondent Kenmore were aware that their equipment was being rented by Respondent Sloan to other corporations.

In addition to the crane equipment, which it rented, Respondent Sloan also rented toolboxes from Respondent Kenmore. These toolboxes contained the smaller tools needed on a job. Patrick Hanley testified that the type of job determined the type of tools needed and, generally, he was able to prepare the tool list for the job for his company, although on occasion he sought his father's assistance, and his father gave him advice without charging him for the services. However, another witness, R. Barry Miller, who was Hanley's cousin and an employee of Respondent Kenmore, testified that he had observed Hanley Jr.'s handwriting on Respondent Sloan tool lists when Patrick was at school. He did not know, however, if Patrick had called in the list of tools he needed for a job to his father. Miller, further, testified that when Patrick Hanley rented equipment he would specify which particular equipment he wanted and, usually, he preferred the equipment that did not have the Respondent Kenmore's name on it.[23] According to Miller, Patrick Hanley told him he wanted the unmarked equipment because he did not want other people to know that he used Respondent Kenmore's equipment on the jobs his company was doing.[24]

As noted, Patrick Hanley was 21 years old when he formed Respondent Sloan with his sister. During the period of time from November 1981 until about June 1983, Hanley worked for Respondent Sloan on weekends and during school recess. Hanley testified that he was familiar with the steel erection industry at the time of the formation of his company due to his family background. However, the record establishes that his actual knowledge about construction work was limited to some courses he had when he attended school. His prior work experience, as a Respondent Kenmore employee, did not involve actual construction work but involved the duties of cleaning the yard and fixing tools. Hanley admitted that he was not "a very good mechanic" and that he had been at jobsites only when he drove to work with his father and his father stopped to check the site. Notwithstanding this lack of experience in the field, Patrick Hanley claimed that he secured and estimated jobs for Respondent Sloan,[25] performed actual construction work, and supervised the other employees of Respondent Sloan, who performed steel structure work. According to Hanley, in order to secure customers he checked phone books for companies in the steel sales business and he spoke to employers with whom his father had done business and he tried to convince them to do business with his company. The first job he secured was from a prior customer of Respondent Kenmore who he knew "was getting more into an open shop area."[26] Hanley explained that he was aware that employers in the area were interested in doing business with a nonunion or open-shop employer and he had observed that companies who had agreements with unions "switched" and became nonunion and were unable to get more work. Hanley claimed that he did not discuss this issue with his father but he was aware of these changes from his observation and from what he heard at school or read in magazines. He testified, "I could give you all kinds of references on magazines, articles, such as that show the decline of unionism in the United States, thus pushing, making the open shop the better way to go."

[21] Patrick Hanley testified that it was usual for a company renting Respondent Kenmore equipment to sign for the equipment, although some did not, including Respondent Sloan. He also testified that when he rented the equipment he preferred to take equipment that did not have the Kenmore name, because he did not want to worry "about people trying to destroy the Kenmore equipment because they are upset renting to a non-union company."

[23] Miller stated that Patrick took whatever equipment he wanted and was not required to sign a rental form, although other companies were required to do so.

[24] The only equipment owned by Respondent Sloan was a pickup truck that was used for jobs and as a mode of transportation for Patrick. This truck was purchased from a friend of the Hanley family and was financed by a bank loan.

[25] Hanley's only prior experience in estimating a job involved work he did for school projects.

Patrick Hanley testified that he was able to secure sup- lies for jobs for his company without paying money, gning a purchase order, without collateral, and without credit rating. In one instance Hanley was able to pur- hase a fire escape, which cost $2800, in such a manner, e attributed his ability to make such purchases without dvancing money or signing a loan for them to "an onest face or trusting or whatever." There is no evi- ence that his parents or their corporation vouched for is honesty or guaranteed that these supplies would be aid.

Patrick Hanley claimed that his first priority was to ecure jobs for Respondent Sloan. However, he admitted hat when he went to a company to bid on a job and he ecured their drawings to prepare a bid, he allowed his ather to examine the drawings he had borrowed, and at imes his father made a bid on the same job. According o Hanley, he also subcontracted two jobs, on which he ad been the successful bidder, to Respondent Kenmore. Prior to subcontracting to Respondent Kenmore, Hanley id not seek bids from other companies, although on one f the jobs Respondent Sloan did not gain any financial enefit.[27] Respondent Kenmore also extended courtesies o Respondent Sloan that it did not extend to other companies. Thus, Patrick Hanley was permitted to store his crap material at Respondent Kenmore's yard without any charge, and he was assisted by Respondent Kenmore employees in loading his truck or the equipment he rented.[28]

When Patrick Hanley began to work for his company his salary was $50 per week, but it was increased to $140 per week in late July or early August 1983. It is unclear from this record whether Hanley continued to receive a salary from Respondent Kenmore after November 1981, but he did continue to work for that company as a yardman, he helped to load and unload trucks, and on one occasion he painted the Respondent Kenmore building. Patrick Hanley's testimony about whether he was paid for this work is contradictory: at one point he could not recall if he was paid, and at another point he testified that he "must" have been paid.

Patrick and Hugh Hanley Jr. both testified that Patrick sought advice on several occasions from his father and other Respondent Kenmore employees about how to estimate a job and about other problems that arose on Respondent Sloan jobs.[29] The record does not reflect whether Patrick always followed this advice, although it does appear from Miller's testimony that the two Hanleys did not always agree about a problem. Respondent Sloan did not pay for this assistance. Hugh Hanley Jr. admitted that a bid based on an incorrect estimation could cause serious problems for a company and that, usually, the individual who did the estimation work had to have experience in such a job, although it was not necessary for the experience to be gained from doing actual construction work. In fact, the employee who did the estimations for Respondent Kenmore did not have prior field experience, although he did have experience as an estimator in the fabrication field, which is not fieldwork.

The record reveals that Respondent Sloan is a member of the National Association of Women in Construction and the Construction exchange. It is not a member of CIEA. The record also establishes that the two corporations maintain separate payroll records, have separate telephone numbers, are listed separately in the telephone book, and maintain separate financial records. It fails to reveal any direct payment of moneys from Respondent Sloan to Respondent Kenmore. The employees of Respondent Kenmore are paid according to the Union's collective-bargaining agreement and they receive fringe benefits. The employees of Respondent Sloan are paid at a lower wage level and do not receive fringe benefits. There is no evidence that Patrick Hanley or Cherub Hanley hired, disciplined, or discharged any Respondent Kenmore employee. Nor does the record reflect that Hugh Hanley Jr. or Jacqueline Hanley hired, disciplined or discharged any Respondent Sloan employee. There is, however, one instance that counsel for the General Counsel contends establishes that Hugh Hanley Jr. supervises and directs the work of Respondent Sloan employees. In late July or early August 1983 Respondent Sloan commenced work at the National Fire Adjuster jobsite. The income for this job was the largest received by Respondent Sloan to that date. It is significant, the General Counsel asserts, that at the start of this job, Patrick painted over the name of Respondent Kenmore on the crane rented by his company, the name of Cherub Hanley was removed from Respondent Kenmore's payroll, and Patrick Hanley received a substantial pay increase.[30] In early August 1983, Michael Fitzpatrick, the Union's business agent, went to the jobsite and observed Hugh Hanley Jr. giving hand signals to the crane operator, which the operator followed. Hugh Hanley Jr. testified that he did give signals to the operator but denied that he was supervising the job. He testified that as he passed the jobsite he observed a dangerous condition because the "choker" that was hauling the steel was twisted. He directed the operator to lower the steel to correct the condition. Hanley Jr. maintained that it was obvious he was not working on the job because he was not dressed in work clothes. Fitzpatrick did not dispute this testimony about the clothes. Fitzpatrick claimed that he spoke to Hanley Jr. at the time and during the course of the conversation Hanley Jr. said he was paying the employees $7 an hour. Hanley Jr. denied that he said that he was paying the employees $7 an hour but he admitted that he told Fitzpatrick that the employees were receiving one-third of the union rate of pay, which at that time was about $22 an hour.[31]

[27] It does not appear that any representative of Respondent Sloan went to the jobsite to examine the work that had been subcontracted.

[28] Miller testified that he assisted Hanley, and the representatives of other companies, to load material on equipment rented for Respondent Kenmore.

[29] There is no evidence of employee interchange, nor does it appear that employees of one corporation were transferred to the payroll of the other corporation.

[30] It appears to be counsel's position that the increase in Patrick's salary was to compensate Cherub for her loss of salary as a Respondent Kenmore employee.

[31] Fitzpatrick testified that he had heard rumors about the new corporation in April or May 1983, but the first actual knowledge he had about

The parties stipulated that the two corporations had similar customers. In 1981 Respondent Sloan had 1 customer who was also a Respondent Kenmore customer, in 1982 Respondent Sloan had 4 customers who were or had been Respondent Kenmore customers, in 1983 there were 8 such customers, and in 1984 there were 11 such customers.

Discussion

The determination of whether one company is the alter ego of the other is difficult to make under any set of circumstances. It becomes more difficult when the individuals involved in the two companies are related. That relationship creates appearances that are suspicious. However, the courts and the Board have outlined certain criteria to be considered in making a determination whether companies are alter egos. These criteria include whether the companies have substantially identical ownership, business purposes, management, operations, equipment, customers, and supervision.[32] It does not appear that any one of these factors is controlling.[33] Counsel for the General Counsel cited several cases in support of his position that the Respondents meet the criteria outlined and, therefore, Respondent Sloan should be considered the alter ego of Respondent Kenmore.

In Hageman Underground Construction, 253 NLRB 60 (1980), cited by counsel for the General Counsel, the facts were substantially different from those existing in this case. That case involved four enterprises in which one individual, George Hageman, was involved. The first enterprise, Hageman Backhoe Service or (Backhoe), was established to rent and did rent equipment to other companies for several years until it went out of business in 1975. In that year George Hageman formed a second company, Hageman Underground (Underground), to install underground utility lines, and Backhoe transferred all its equipment to Underground. Underground installed lines for Pacific Telephone & Telegraph Company (PT&T) and rented the equipment, which had been transferred from Backhoe, to other companies. Underground had a collective-bargaining agreement with a union. In 1978 George Hageman formed a third company, Hageman Construction (Construction), to construct underground utility lines for PT&T, and he testified that he formed Construction to operate as a nonunion company. Construction leased equipment from Underground and hired all the construction workers who had been employed by Underground. After the formation of Construction, Hageman received a visit from union representatives during which they demanded that he apply the terms of the Underground contract to the Construction employees. Hageman decided after this visit to set up a forth company, Hageman Engineering (Engineering), also to install underground utility lines for PT&T and to operate under nonunion conditions. Engineering commenced performing the type of work that had been performed by Construction, and Hageman transferred Construction's employees to Engineering's payroll. Thus, the record in that case established that Underground, Construction, and Engineering had the same officers, the same employees, and that the labor relations policies for all three companies were set up by one person, George Hageman. It is significant that George Hageman testified that he established Engineering to operate as a nonunion entity because of the efforts by the union to have the terms of Underground's collective-bargaining agreement applied to Construction's employees.

In J. M. Tanaka Construction, 249 NLRB 1238 (1980), also cited by counsel, in which the Board found alter ego status, the two corporations had similar officers, similar supervision, and similar control of labor relations policies. Thus, in that case Raymond Tanka was president of both corporations; the supervision of all jobs, including the supervision of manpower, equipment, and supplies for both corporations was vested in the same person, Takeo Wakido, who was an uncle of Raymond Tanka; Raymond Tanka formulated the labor relations policy for the original corporation while he shared the responsibility for that policy for the newly formed corporation with his uncle, Takeo Wakido. In addition, after the formation of the new corporation, the original corporation phased out its operation and laid off its employees because it could not continue to pay fringe benefits required by the collective-bargaining agreement. These laid-off employees, subsequently, were hired by Raymond Tanka and Takeo Wakido, as employees for the new corporation.

In McDonald's Ready Mix Concrete, 246 NLRB 152 (1979), at least one member of the same family was an officer in both corporations. Thus, in that case the evidence established that McDonald's Ready Mix was owned and operated by Bill McDonald, his wife, and son. The son, Jim, effectively, controlled the operations of this corporation for about a year before a new corporation, Jim's Ready Mix, was established. The new corporation purchased the ready mix portion of the McDonald's business and the son, Jim, became president of the new corporation. The record in that case established that both corporations used the same premises, had the same customers and suppliers, and interchanged employees.

It is apparent from an examination of these three cases that, although, there are some similarities to the present case, there are crucial differences. In all three cases, at least one individual was an officer in both corporations, a situation not present in the instant case. Thus, in this case the record establishes that Hugh and Jacqueline Hanley are the sole stockholders and officers of Respondent Kenmore. The stockholders and officers of Respondent Sloan are Cherub and Patrick Hanley. Although they are members of the same family, Cherub and Patrick are not the same individuals as their parents and, thus, the two corporations do not share common ownership or control. Further, in the three cases cited by counsel, the same individual exercised control over the day-to-day operations of the two corporations and the labor relations policy for the two corporations was formulated by the same individual. The record fails to reveal that Hugh Hanley or Jacqueline Hanley controls the operations of Respondent Sloan or is involved in the formation of its labor relations policy, nor does it appear that Cherub and Patrick control the operations of Respondent Kenmore or are involved in the formation of its labor policy. Finally, there is no evidence in this case that two corporations interchanged employees, transferred employees, or have hired similar employees.

Counsel has cited one case, Ramos Iron Works, 234 NLRB 896 (1978), where an alter ego status was found and where there are some similarities to the instant case. In that case, as in the present one, a young son of the president of the original corporation formed a new corporation, allegedly to develop a solar-heating structure. The record revealed that the son, in that case, also had limited construction or business experience. However, the differences between the present case and the Ramos case are greater than the similarities. In Ramos the administrative law judge found that Ramos Sr., the father, and Ramos Jr., a brother, were involved in the original corporation, which had a collective-bargaining agreement with a union. Prior to the formation of the new corporation, Ramos Sr. openly stated his opposition to the union, and after the new corporation was formed the employees of the original corporation worked for the new corporation. These employees continued to work on projects for the new corporation that they had worked on for the original corporation. In addition, Ramos Sr. worked "intensively" on projects of the new corporation, and a vice president of the original corporation spent a considerable amount of time at the project of the new corporation. As noted, the employees of Respondent Kenmore and Respondent Sloan are not the same, and the only evidence of Hugh Hanley's presence at any jobsite of Respondent Sloan was on one occasion, at the National Fire Adjusters jobsite.

A close family relationship will not establish the alter ego status.[34] Counsel for the General Counsel contends, however, that factors other than the family relationship exist in the instant case. He asserts that but for the indirect financial assistance from their parents, Cherub and Patrick Hanley could not have funded Respondent Sloan. However, financial assistance from one corporation to another will not establish the alter ego status. In Shellmaker, Inc., 265 NLRB 749 (1982), the record revealed that William Boland was president of a company, Shellmaker, which had a collective-bargaining agreement with the Union. This agreement provided that new dredges had to have a four-man crew. Boland planned to operate a new dredge with a two-man crew. A second corporation, Bayside, was formed by Boland, his wife, and his nephew, who had worked for Shellmaker, to operate as a nonunion shop. The initial capital for Bayside came from personal loans made by Mrs. Boland and Boland's nephew. The loans were repaid when Bayside borrowed $50,000 from Shellmaker's profit-sharing plan. This loan by Shellmaker to Bayside was unsecured. The direct financial assistance did not cease but continued when Bayside renegotiated its loan. Notwithstanding the suspicion surrounding the formation of the new corporation and the extensive financial assistance given to it with unsecured loans, the Board did not find the companies to be alter egos. In the instant case, as noted, the officers are not the same, and there is no evidence of any direct financial assistance given by Respondent Kenmore to fund the formation of Respondent Sloan.

A further factor relied on by the counsel for the General Counsel to support his assertion that the corporations are alter egos is the assistance that Hugh Hanley gave to Patrick Hanley in estimating jobs. Counsel, to some degree, relied on the testimony of Miller to establish this fact. An examination of Miller's testimony establishes that Miller basically "assumed" that Patrick was receiving such assistance, not only about estimating jobs but about how to perform the work. However, I am convinced from the testimony of the Hanleys that Patrick did discuss, with his father, both how work was to be performed and how to estimate a job. The Board has failed to find corporations to be alter egos because of this type of assistance. In Victor Valley Heating & Air Conditioning, 267 NLRB 1292 (1983), the record established that the president of Victor Valley, the original company, taught an employee of the new corporation formed by his son, how to estimate and bid jobs and for the first few months the father came to the new corporation's workshop approximately once a week to assist the employee to learn these functions. In addition, the father signed bids for the new corporation, gave advice about jobs, and referred suppliers and customers to the new corporation. In that case there was evidence, also, that the bookkeeper of the original corporation maintained the books and records of the new corporation and did so without being reimbursed. Notwithstanding this type of assistance, the Board did not find one corporation to be the alter ego of the other corporation.

It is obvious that representatives of Respondent Kenmore did show favoritism to the representatives of Respondent Sloan. Thus, they allowed rent bills and car bills to go unpaid for months, they permitted their office supplies to be used without reimbursement, and they rented equipment to Repondent Sloan at low fees. However, even blatant favoritism in the day-to-day operations, standing alone, does not necessarily make one corporation the alter ego of the other.[35] As was true in Victor Valley the favoritism exhibited to Cherub and Patrick showed the concern of the parents that their children should be given the opportunity to succeed.

This record fails to establish that the two corporations have common ownership, common management, common control over labor relations policies, the same employees, or the same supervisors. There is evidence that the two corporations are engaged in the same type of business, use some of the same equipment, and share the same premises. However, these factors are insufficient to outweigh the lack of common ownership, common management, and common control over labor relation policies. Accordingly, I find that Respondent Kenmore and Respondent Sloan are not alter egos.[36]

Counsel for the General Counsel argues, in the alternative, that the two corporations constitute a single employer within the meaning of the Act. The criteria for determining that status was set forth in Radio Union Local 1264 v. Broadcast Service, 380 U.S. 255, 256 (1965), and includes the interrelation of operations, common management, centralized control of labor relations, and common ownership. Although no one factor appears controlling, the Board stresses the first three criteria, with particular emphasis on centralized labor relations.[37] This record fails to establish that the operations of the two corporations are interrelated. There is no evidence that either Cherub or Patrick Hanley was involved in the operations of Respondent Kenmore except in their capacity, respectively, as receptionist and yardman. They were not involved in making decisions of formulating policies for that corporation and the evidence is insufficient to establish, affirmatively, that their parents made decisions of formulated policies for Respondent Sloan. Based on my discussion set forth above with respect to the other criteria, I find that Respondent Kenmore and Respondent Sloan do not constitute a single employer within the meaning of the Act.[38] Accordingly, I find that the General Counsel has failed to sustain the burden of proof as required.[39]

Respondents assert that the Union had knowledge of Respondent Sloan in April or May 1983, but at no time did it make a request that the collective-bargaining agreement of Respondent Kenmore be applied to the employees of Respondent Sloan. Therefore, they contend that the complaint is time barred by Section 10(b) of the Act. Although I have recommended dismissal of the complaint, I do not agree with the contention that the complaint is time barred. The record does not support the assertion that the Union had knowledge of Respondent Sloan in April or May 1983. Rather, the record establishes that in that time period the union representatives had heard rumors about the existence of Respondent Sloan but they did not gain specific information until Fitzpatrick saw Hugh Hanley at the National Fire Adjusters jobsite. It is obvious, in view of the position of the Respondents about their separate status, that none of the Hanleys informed the Union about the existence of Respondent Sloan. Further, in view of that position it is also obvious that any demand by the Union that the collective-bargaining agreement of Respondent Kenmore be applied to Respondent Sloan's employees would have been rejected.

Conclusions of Law

1. Kenmore Contracting Co., Inc. is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. International Association of Bridge, Structural and Ornamental Iron Workers, Local No. 6, AFL-CIO is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. The General Counsel has failed to establish by a preponderance of the evidence that Respondent Kenmore and Respondent Sloan, as alleged in the complaint, are alter egos and/or constitute a single employer within the meaning of the Act and violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act.

[39] In view of my finding that the two corporations are not alter egos and do not constitute a single employer, I do not find that a unit consisting of both groups of employees constitutes an appropriate unit for purposes of collective bargaining.

University of Dubuque, Petitioner and Faculty Association of the College of Liberal Arts. Case 33–UC–98

June 27, 1988

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On a petition filed by the Employer, a hearing was held before Hearing Officer Robert W. Chester. At the hearing, the Union moved that the petition be dismissed. The hearing officer referred this motion to the Board for disposition, and the Regional Director transferred this proceeding to the National Labor Relations Board for decision pursuant to Section 102.67 of the Board's Rules and Regulations. Both the Union and the Employer have filed briefs in support of their respective positions.[1]

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has reviewed the rulings of the hearing officer made at the hearing and finds that no prejudicial error was committed. The rulings are affirmed.

On the entire record in this case, the Board makes the following findings.

1. The Employer is a private university affiliated with the Presbyterian Church, USA and is located in Dubuque, Iowa. The University consists of the College of Liberal Arts and the Theological Seminary. Only the College of Liberal Arts is involved in this proceeding.[2] The parties stipulated that the Employer is engaged in commerce and that "[d]uring the past calendar year, a representative period, gross annual revenue exceeded $1,000,000, of which more than $50,000 was received from directly outside the State of Iowa."

On these facts, we find that the Employer is engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act and that, as stipulated by the parties, the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

2. Since 1973 the Employer has recognized the Union as the collective- bargaining representative of certain employees of the College of Liberal Arts. During that time, the parties have entered into a series of collective-bargaining agreements.[3] The latest relevant agreement was effective from August 15, 1981, through August 15, 1984, and provided, inter alia, that negotiation for a new agreement would begin about February 15, 1984. The parties stipulated that the unit, as set forth in the collective-bargaining agreement, consists of:

> All full-time faculty and those part-time faculty teaching six or more academic hours per semester in the College of Liberal Arts, including department chairpersons. The unit shall also include the Director of the Learning Assistance Center. Those excluded from the unit are non-academic employees, division chairpersons, faculty of the seminary, administrative and clerical employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the National Labor Relations Act, as amended.

On November 9, 1983, the Employer filed the instant petition seeking to clarify the unit to exclude, in addition to those already excluded, "all managerial and supervisory full-time faculty (including department chairpersons) and part-time faculty teaching six or more academic hours per semester in the College of Liberal Arts, and the Director of the Learning Assistance Center." As noted above, the Regional Director transferred these proceedings, including the Union's motion to dismiss the petition, to the Board for disposition.

The Union argues that the petition should be dismissed because (a) there are no grounds for clarifying the unit in the absence of evidence that the duties of the faculty have changed; and (b) the Board's policy is not to entertain unit clarifications during the term of a collective-bargaining agreement, which contains a clear recognition clause. Thus, the Union argues that this petition should not now be entertained because it was filed more than 300 days before the agreement's expiration.[4] The Union contends that the entertainment of the petition at this time would disrupt a stable bargaining relationship and that, therefore, processing the petition is contrary to Board policy.

We have carefully considered the Union's arguments. We, however, find it appropriate to entertain the petition for the following reasons.

First, in light of the Supreme Court's decision in NLRB v. Yeshiva University, 444 U.S. 672 (1980), it is appropriate to clarify a unit composed of faculty to exclude those who are managerial and, therefore, not "employees" within the meaning of the Act. Lewis University, 265 NLRB 1239 (1982), revd. on other grounds 765 F.2d 616 (7th Cir. 1985).

[1] The Union's motion to file a substitute brief page and the hearing officer's unopposed motion to correct the transcript are granted.

[2] The College of Liberal Arts requires no particular religious affiliation or allegiance from its faculty members or students.

[3] The Employer recognized the Union pursuant to a recognition agreement entered into with the Union. The Board has not certified the Union as the collective-bargaining representative of the Employer's employees.

Thus, clarification is appropriate here even absent evidence of any change in faculty duties since the unit's formation. Washington Post Co., 254 NLRB 168 (1981).

Second, we find it appropriate to process this petition even though it was filed during the term of the latest relevant agreement. Although the Board has dismissed clarification petitions filed midway through the term of an agreement,[5] the Board has entertained such petitions when they are filed shortly before the agreement's expiration as the parties are preparing for negotiations. See Shop Rite Foods, 247 NLRB 883 (1980), and cases cited therein. The petition here was filed on November 9, 1983, some 280 days prior to the agreement's expiration. As specified in the agreement, however, negotiations for a new agreement were to begin on February 15, 1984, just 98 days after the petition was filed. In these circumstances, as the petition was filed just about 3 months before negotiations were to begin, we find it appropriate to process the petition. Accordingly, we deny the Union's motion and we shall consider the merits of the petition.

3. As noted above, the Employer seeks to exclude from the unit all managerial and/or supervisory employees. The positions at issue are full-time and certain part-time faculty, including department chairpersons and the director of the Learning Assistance Center at the College of Liberal Arts. This college is comprised of five academic divisions, each headed by a division chairperson. The divisions are further subdivided into a total of 19 departments. The chain of command at the college, in order of ascendance, consists of: faculty, department chairpersons, division chairpersons, dean, president, board of directors, and its executive committee. All levels above the department chairpersons previously have been excluded from the unit.

The faculty as a whole and as members of various committees participates in the formulation and effectuation of the college's academic policy. For example, the collective-bargaining agreement provides that the faculty has the exclusive right to set student grading and classroom conduct standards; set degree requirements; recommend earned degree recipients; "initially receive and consider" new degree programs; and develop, recommend, and approve curricular content and course offerings. The agreement also gives the faculty the right to recommend admission standards and departmental staffing needs. The president appoints three faculty members to sit on the nine-member Admissions and Retention Committee that sets admission policies and determines whether students on academic probation will be dismissed or retained.[6] Also, the president appoints three faculty members to sit on the seven-member Financial Aid Committee that establishes the policies concerning the distribution of financial aid to students. The faculty elects 5 faculty members to sit on the 16-member Educational Policies Committee. This committee reviews recommendations of the various divisions regarding the addition or deletion of courses; studies academic policies and standards; considers all matters affecting the curriculum and degree programs; and makes recommendations on these matters to the full faculty.

The faculty also participates in formulating and effectuating policy in certain nonacademic areas. In this regard, the Institutional Development Committee, comprised of six faculty members elected by the faculty, advises the administrators and the board of directors on major budgetary matters affecting employment; significant capital improvement programs; and proposals regarding financial exigency or substantial modifications or discontinuance of a program or department. Three of the six members also serve on the University Planning Cabinet along with board members, administration, and seminary faculty members. This committee reviews the total University budget prior to its submission to the University Administrative Cabinet,[7] and is responsible for long-range planning for the University.

The faculty participates in the selection of the dean, the division chairpersons, and the department chairpersons. With respect to the selection of the dean, two faculty members elected by the faculty sit on the five-member Search Committee, which conducts the search, screens and interviews candidates, and seeks the concurrence of the faculty for its recommended nominee. On approval of at least four of the five committee members, the committee selects a nominee to be recommended to the board of directors for appointment. The faculty of each division and department recommends to the dean its choice for the individual to be appointed division chairperson and department chairperson. Although it is the dean who makes the appointment,

[6] There are some 14 committees on which the faculty participates. We have discussed here only some. The other committees are: Nominating Committee, Campus Hearing Board, Athletics Committee, Teacher Education Committee, Continuing Education Committee, Off-Campus Semester Committee, and Human Rights Committee.

[7] The University Administrative Cabinet (UAC) is composed of the president, the two deans, the business manager, the development officer, and the Title III coordinator. The UAC executes policies of the board of directors, sets budgetary guidelines, and authorizes all full-time positions at the University.

Dean Stewart testified that he always has followed the faculty recommendations in this regard.

The faculty also elects the five members who sit on the Promotions and Tenure Committee. This committee evaluates the qualifications of individual faculty members for promotions and/or tenure. The committee reports its findings and recommendations to the dean, who, along with the president, makes the decision. Faculty members who are denied promotions or tenure may appeal to the Executive Committee of the board of directors, which makes the final decision. In the years 1981 through 1983, the president and dean followed all the recommendations of the Promotion and Tenure Committee except for one individual whom the Employer contends was ineligible for the recommended promotion because her contract had not been renewed.[8]

The faculty elects the three faculty members who comprise the Hearing Committee, which reviews certain adverse personnel actions such as dismissals for cause and nonrenewals during the probationary period. The committee collects evidence and makes a recommendation. It is the president who makes the final decision with respect to nonrenewals. With respect to dismissals for cause, there is a right of appeal to the board of directors, which makes the final decision. The faculty also elects the four faculty members who comprise the Professional Development Committee, which reviews and makes recommendations to the dean concerning all matters regarding leave for professional development, experience or advanced study, the distribution of funds for faculty development, and "exceptions for promotion eligibility."

Faculty members who function as department chairpersons perform certain duties in addition to teaching. In this regard, they chair department faculty meetings and prepare the department's list of course offerings and teaching assignments, which are subject to the dean's approval. Department chairpersons also prepare and administer a budget for their respective departments. The budget is reviewed by the dean, who may revise it, and it is subject to final approval by the board of directors. The department chairpersons also participate in the hiring of faculty for their respective departments. Thus, after the University Administrative Cabinet authorizes the filling of a position, the department chairperson, along with the dean, reviews employment applications and draws up a priority list of candidates for interviews. The hiring decision normally is jointly made based on recommendations of the dean, department chairperson, and the faculty. Dean Stewart testified that he has never vetoed any of the recommendations and has hired 27 people based on the recommendations of the faculty. Professor James Wright, however, testified that he is aware of "a couple of occasions" when the dean has hired individuals contrary to the recommendations of the faculty and department chairpersons. The department chairperson and the division chairperson evaluate the performance of the nontenured faculty and make recommendations whether their contracts should be renewed. After reviewing their recommendations, the dean decides the matter. If the dean denies renewal contrary to the recommendation of the division or department chairperson, his decision may be appealed to the Faculty Hearing Committee, composed entirely of faculty, which then makes a recommendation to the president, who makes the final decision.

The Union argues in essence that the faculty are not managerial employees within the meaning of Yeshiva, supra. Thus, the Union contends that the faculty has little input into the decision-making process at the University and that the faculty cannot make effective recommendations on policy because actual control lies not with the faculty, but with the University's administrators and management hierarchy. The Union contends that the University's curriculum is exclusively controlled by the board of directors and notes that in 1972 and 1975 the board of directors eliminated certain academic departments contrary to the faculty's recommendations. The Union also notes that the dean can overrule faculty recommendations on hiring and the selection of department and division chairpersons. The Union further argues that it is the board of directors that effectively controls terminations, sabbaticals, and budget matters.

The Employer contends that the faculty are managerial employees within the meaning of Yeshiva. The Employer notes that the faculty controls virtually all academic matters and makes effective recommendations concerning student admission policies, student retentions and dismissals, sabbaticals, leaves, grants, and hiring, including the hiring of the dean. The Employer notes that by virtue of their numbers on the Search Committee, the faculty can effectively veto any candidate for the position of dean. The Employer also notes that the faculty makes effective recommendations with respect to the promotion and tenure of faculty members and the renewal of contracts for probationary faculty. Finally, the Employer notes that the faculty makes effective recommendations concerning the budget within the guidelines set by the University Administrative Cabinet.

[8] In its motion to submit additional evidence, the Union contends that in February 1985 the Employer's president rejected four of the six recommendations on tenure made by the Promotion and Tenure Committee. Assuming this contention to be true, this would not affect our decision, as explained infra.

We agree with the Employer that the faculty members are managerial employees. As noted by the Court in Yeshiva, managerial employees are those who "formulate and effectuate management policies by expressing and making operative the decisions of their employer."[9] The Court noted also that managerial employees "must exercise discretion within, or even independently of, established employer policy and must be aligned with management" and normally must represent "management interests by taking or recommending discretionary actions that effectively control or implement employer policy."[10]

Applying these principles to the facts of the instant case, we find that the faculty members here, as in Yeshiva, play a major and effective role in the formulation of academic policy. We note first that under the collective- bargaining agreement the faculty as a whole has the exclusive right to set general student grading and classroom conduct standards, and degree requirements; recommend earned-degree recipients; "initially receive and consider" new degree programs; and develop, recommend, and ultimately approve curricular content and course offerings.[11] Under the agreement and/or through their participation in the various committees noted above, the faculty makes effective recommendations concerning course schedules, admission standards, student retention, the distribution of financial aid to students, and the modification of programs or departments. Although the board of directors may have eliminated certain academic departments some years ago contrary to the faculty's recommendation, this does not detract from the significant control exercised by the faculty over the academic policies in the remaining departments. Cf. American International College, 282 NLRB 189 (1986). Finally, as we emphasized in Livingstone College, 286 NLRB 1308 (1987), under Yeshiva it is the faculty members' participation in the formulation of academic policy that aligns their interest with that of management. Having found that the faculty members in the present case have substantial authority in formulating and effecting policies in academic areas, we conclude that they are managerial employees.

Although of less significance in ascertaining managerial status, we note that the faculty here also can effectively recommend discretionary actions with respect to the implementation of Employer policy in nonacademic areas. In this regard, the faculty makes recommendations concerning budget matters, capital improvements, department staffing needs, and the University's long-range planning. In addition, it makes recommendations regarding the promotion and tenure of faculty members, dismissals for cause and nonrenewals of contract for probationary employees, the granting of leave, and the distribution of funds for faculty development.[12] The faculty recommends the individuals to be appointed department and division chairpersons, and even participates in the selection of the dean. Faculty members who function as department chairpersons prepare and administer their department budget and are directly involved in the hiring of department faculty. Although ultimate authority in certain of these areas may reside with the board of directors or upper levels of management, who occasionally may reject faculty recommendations, it is clear that the faculty here plays a significant role in the operation of the University. Thiel College, 261 NLRB 580, 586 (1982); American International College, supra.

Our dissenting colleague finds several deficiencies in the Board's approach in this and other Yeshiva cases. First, the dissent counts the number of areas in which faculty at various institutions have input and compares these figures to the number of such areas found in Yeshiva. Noting that the Yeshiva faculty had absolute authority in academic matters, the dissent finds "nothing significant" in the Dubuque faculty's less than absolute authority on such matter. The dissent acknowledges that the Dubuque faculty makes effective recommendations in other, nonacademic areas but finds that after "examining the entire picture," the Dubuque faculty does not exercise the degree of authority exercised by the Yeshiva faculty and thus is not managerial within the meaning of Yeshiva. Finally, our dissenting colleague finds fault with the majority's mode of analysis and proposes that his analytical framework, based on but apparently not limited to the 18 criteria highlighted in Yeshiva, is the appropriate one.

Although it cannot be gainsaid that, as our dissenting colleague states, the Yeshiva faculty exercised a greater degree of authority than does the Dubuque faculty, in our view Dubuque is not sufficiently "unlike" Yeshiva to remove it from the range of institutions covered by the holding in that case. Indeed, it appears to us that our colleague's quarrel is essentially with the Court's opinion in Yeshiva itself inasmuch as that opinion virtually dictates the result we reach here. Our colleague accuses us of applying Yeshiva "too restrictively." We think that, on the contrary, it is his interpretation that is too limited and thus misses the thrust of the Court's opinion entirely.

[11] Although there is some conflict in the record testimony as to the extent of the faculty's role in setting degree requirements, the collective-bargaining agreement explicitly grants the faculty the exclusive right to set degree requirements, and there is no evidence that anyone other than the faculty has exercised this right at any time. See College of Osteopathic Medicine & Surgery, 265 NLRB 295 (1982).

[12] The Union in its motion to submit additional evidence contends that the president has rejected a majority of the recommendations made by the Promotion and Tenure Committee in February 1985. Even assuming the truth of this contention, this would not affect our decision given the substantial indicia of managerial status noted above. Livingstone College, supra.

In this regard, there is no indication in Yeshiva that the Court intended its holding to reach only institutions with faculties having as much or nearly as much input as the Yeshiva faculty. In fact, the implication is quite the opposite. Thus, the Court engaged in a lengthy discourse on the nature of institutions of higher learning in general. The Court noted that:

> The "business" of a university is education, and its vitality ultimately must depend on the academic policies that largely are formulated and generally are implemented by faculty governance decisions.

Yeshiva University, 444 U.S. at 688. In its discussion, the Court clearly focused on the faculty's role in academic matters although other factors were also considered. The Court made numerous statements about institutions of higher learning that, going beyond the facts of Yeshiva itself, were general in nature.[13] significantly, although the Court found that the Yeshiva faculty's authority in academic matters was absolute, it expressly found absolute authority is not a prerequisite for managerial authority.[14]

Only at the conclusion of its discussion did the Court suggest that some institutions of higher learning might be excepted, in whole or in part, from its holding. At that juncture, the Court offered two illustrations of faculty "unlike" that in Yeshiva, neither of which is applicable here. Thus, the Court stated at footnote 31:

> We recognize that this is a starting point only, and that other factors not present here may enter into the analysis in other contexts. It is plain, for example, that professors may not be excluded merely because they determine the content of their own courses, evaluate their own students, and supervise their own research. There thus may be institutions of higher learning unlike Yeshiva where the faculty are entirely or predominantly nonmanagerial. There also may be faculty members at Yeshiva and like universities who properly could be included in a bargaining unit. It may be that a rational line could be drawn between tenured and untenured faculty members depending upon how a faculty is structured and operates.

The faculty at Dubuque clearly have input into academic decisions that have impact reaching beyond merely their own courses, students, and research. Nor does the record here support a finding that junior, untenured faculty should be treated differently from senior faculty under Yeshiva.

Contrary to our colleague, we do not believe that the issue of managerial status can properly be decided simply by counting and comparing the number of areas in which faculty at a given institution have input with the number of such areas found in Yeshiva. Although this approach may measure the scope of areas in which faculty members exercise influence, it fails to measure the extent of that influence and consequently fails to take into account the many different combinations and permutations of influence that render each academic body unique. Such a mechanical formula may be analytically straightforward, but, in our view, it falls short of meeting the Court's concerns as expressed in Yeshiva.

Further, our mode of analysis seems to differ from that of our dissenting colleague not so much as to the factors to be considered but as to the weight to be accorded them. As set forth above, we have examined all the factors in this case that are relevant to managerial authority as it was defined by the Court in Yeshiva. Admittedly, the list of such factors is not as extensive as the list in Yeshiva. Nevertheless, what seems inarguable to us is that the faculty does have significant authority and makes effective recommendations in areas that the Court manifestly said in Yeshiva were managerial in nature. These areas are not insignificant. Whether any of us might be inclined under other circumstances to find that these factors fall short of establishing managerial status, in our view, Yeshiva leaves little choice as to the outcome. Accordingly, consistent with Yeshiva, we find that the faculty here are managerial employees.[15] We, therefore, shall clarify the unit accordingly.

ORDER

It is ordered that the collective-bargaining unit of all full-time faculty and those part-time faculty teaching six or more academic hours per semester in the College of Liberal Arts, University of Dubuque, including department chairpersons, and the director of the Learning Assistance Center, represented by the Faculty Association of the College of Liberal Arts is clarified to exclude all faculty members, department chairpersons, and the director of the Learning Assistance Center.

MEMBER JOHANSEN, dissenting.

Contrary to my colleagues, I find that the faculty members at the University of Dubuque are not managerial employees, but are statutory employees. I find that they are properly included in the unit.

Depriving a group of employees of protection under the National Labor Relations Act is a serious matter. My colleagues have applied the Supreme Court's decision in NLRB v. Yeshiva University, 444 U.S. 672 (1980), too restrictively and have wrongfully deprived the Dubuque faculty of the protection of the Act.

In Yeshiva the Supreme Court discussed certain areas over which the Yeshiva faculty exercised authority. There were 18 such areas, 13 in the academic sphere and 5 in the nonacademic sphere.[1] In the present case the majority finds that the Dubuque faculty possesses some degree of authority in five academic areas—grading, graduation requirements, curriculum, admission standards, and student retention. The faculty also possesses some degree of authority in three nonacademic areas—promotion, tenure, and termination. The Dubuque faculty therefore possesses some degree of authority in 8 of the 18 Yeshiva criteria, less than half. The Yeshiva faculty exercised authority in all. In another faculty-unit case, University of New Haven, 267 NLRB 939 (1983), the Board determined that the faculty exercised authority in 12 of the 18 criteria.[2] The New Haven faculty were found to be managerial. In Boston University, 281 NLRB 798 (1986), the Board determined that the faculty exercised authority in 12 of the 18 areas.[3] These faculty members were also found to be managerial.

A comparison of the Supreme Court's findings in Yeshiva with the Board's findings in the present case discloses a significant disparity in the authority of the two faculties. Dubuque is clearly a school "unlike Yeshiva." I further note that the Yeshiva faculty exercised a greater degree of authority than does the Dubuque faculty. The Supreme Court found that the Yeshiva faculty had absolute authority in academic matters and that they played a predominant role in faculty hiring, tenure, sabbaticals, termination, and promotion. They also effectively decided which students would be admitted, retained, and graduated.

The Dubuque faculty's authority in academic matters is not absolute. The five areas in which the faculty exercises authority are in the routine pedagogical areas. In Yeshiva the Supreme Court noted that "[i]t is plain, for example, that professors may not be excluded merely because they determine the content of their own courses, evaluate their own students, and supervise their own research."[4] I find nothing significant in the authority exercised by the professors in this case.

In the nonacademic area, the faculty makes effective recommendations in the areas of tenure, promotions, and terminations. The faculty thus exercises authority in three of the five criteria, which is a significant and indicative amount.

After examining the entire picture, the authority exercised in the academic sphere, the authority exercised in the nonacademic sphere, and the amount and degree of authority, I conclude that the Dubuque faculty lacks the depth and breadth of authority possessed by the Yeshiva faculty. I do not find that the Dubuque faculty exercises the degree of authority exercised by the Yeshiva faculty.

The majority disputes my figures, but offers none of their own, and misconstrues my analysis. The majority dismisses the attempt to formulate some meaningful framework for analysis and provide some measure of predictability in this area as "a mechanical formula." The faculties of mature universities, however, display certain common characteristics that the Supreme Court recognized and must be excluded from the unit. We note that the unit does not specifically include the athletic director and the director of Foreign Student Services. However, these two positions as well as the position of director of the Learning Assistance Center are held by faculty members. Because we have concluded that the faculty, including department chairpersons, are managerial employees, we find it unnecessary to determine whether these individuals are also supervisors within the meaning of the Act.

[1] The General Counsel Memorandum, No. 81-19 (April 10, 1981), Subject: Guidelines for cases arising under NLRB v. Yeshiva University, 444 U.S. 672 (1980), lists the following areas: (1) curriculum (course content and course schedules), (2) teaching methods, (3) grading policies, (4) matriculation standards, (5) admission policies, (6) retention policies, (7) graduation policies, (8) size of student body, (9) tuition, (10) location of a school, (11) teaching loads, (12) student absence policies, (13) enrollment levels, (14) faculty hiring, (15) tenure, (16) sabbaticals, (17) terminations, and (18) promotions.

[2] The areas were curriculum, admission, graduation requirements, teaching methods, teaching loads, size of student body, facilities planning, hiring, tenure, sabbaticals, terminations, and promotions.

[3] The areas were curriculum, teaching methods, grading policies, matriculation, admission policies, retention, graduation requirements, size of student body, hiring, tenure, terminations, and promotions.

analyzed in Yeshiva. It is these characteristics which we should examine. I start with the areas of common authority exercised by faculty at mature universities, but I am not limited to them. Once these factors are identified and the degree of faculty authority gauged, additional areas of faculty authority, such as the awarding of scholarships, can be examined.

Since the issuance of Yeshiva University on February 20, 1980, the Board has found faculty members to be managerial employees in eight cases.[5] In all of these cases the Board's approach to the question whether the school's faculty members were managerial employees has been tentative. In these eight cases the Board has found determinative faculty authority in certain areas in certain cases and in different areas in other cases. The majority defends their approach based on "the many different combinations and permutations of influence that render each academic body unique." But the bottom line is that the Board has failed to develop an integrated body of law.

The Board has been criticized for its lack of a consistent approach to the faculty managerial issue.[6] The 18 Yeshiva criteria provide a valid and valuable starting point for Board analysis. The Supreme Court highlighted the 18 criteria for a reason, the reason being to examine the entire gamut of faculty authority. The Yeshiva faculty possesses authority over 100 percent of this range, while the Dubuque faculty possesses authority over 44 percent of this range. The Yeshiva faculty were managerial employees, the Dubuque faculty are not. Accordingly, I would dismiss the unit clarification petition as to the faculty members.

DECISION AND DIRECTION

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS BABSON AND CRACRAFT

The National Labor Relations Board, by a three-member panel, has considered determinative challenges in an election held November 6, 1987, and the hearing officer's report recommending disposition of them. The election was conducted pursuant to a Stipulated Election Agreement. The tally of ballots shows five for and five against the Petitioner, with two challenged ballots.

The Board has reviewed the record in light of the exceptions and brief and adopts the hearing officer's findings and recommendations only to the extent consistent with this decision.

The Board agent conducting the election challenged the ballots of Brian Berlo and Rocco Sarno on the ground that their names did not appear on the eligibility list furnished by the Employer. The Employer contends that these employees are casual employees and not entitled to vote in the election.[2] The Petitioner asserts that they are regular part-time employees entitled to vote. The hearing officer found both employees to be casual employees and excluded them from the unit.[3] We disagree.

The Employer is a trucking company engaged in the transportation of garments operating in Norwood, Massachusetts.[4] The Employer employs drivers who make pickups and deliveries locally within the Norwood area and over-the-road drivers who transport garments to and from its facility in Little Falls, New Jersey. In local runs the garments are usually hung in the trucks, a practice requiring driver training.[5] At the time of the election there were seven full-time local drivers and three full-time over-the-road drivers. The Employer also employs spare drivers who usually are assigned over-the-road runs, which do not require training, although spare drivers may perform local runs when the garments are packed in containers.

All drivers who perform over-the-road runs are paid a flat fee for each round trip, and those drivers performing local runs are compensated on the basis of an hourly rate. The spares who do either over-the-road runs or local runs receive the same wages as the full-time drivers. Spares and full-time drivers report to the same supervisor and both classes of employees are subject to the same hiring procedures. Spares have become full-time employees on several occasions since the Norwood terminal opened in September 1985.

The full-time drivers receive paid vacations (1 week after 1 year and 2 weeks after 2 years), 5 paid sick days annually, a $1000 individual IRA payment a year, and a fully paid health insurance plan. The spares are not entitled to receive any of the above-mentioned benefits and receive a paid holiday only if they work the day before or after a holiday.

Sarno averaged one over-the-road run a week between July 26, 1987, when he was hired, and October 17, 1987, the eligibility cutoff date. Berlo made six over-the-road runs to New Jersey and worked 22 hours as a local driver between August 16 and October 17, 1987. In excluding both Sarno and Berlo from the unit as casuals, the hearing officer found that although both Berlo and Sarno met the 4-hours-a-week average eligibility test traditionally used by the Board to determine the inclusion of employees in a unit as regular part-time employees, their lack of community of interest with the full-time drivers precluded their inclusion in the unit. The hearing officer emphasized the differences in fringe benefits between the full-time drivers and the spares as well as the spares' ability to reject work and have full-time jobs elsewhere.

The test for determining whether an employee is a regular part-time employee or a casual employee takes into account factors such as regularity and continuity of employment and similarity of work duties. Pat's Blue Ribbons, 286 NLRB 918 (1987). In that case the Board stated, "[T]he individual's relationship to the job must be examined to determine whether the employee performs unit work with sufficient regularity to demonstrate a community of interest with remaining employees in the bargaining unit." Here, in concluding that both Sarno and Berlo were casual employees, the hearing officer failed to give proper weight to the similarities in working conditions between the spares

[1] On November 1, 1987, the Teamsters International Union was readmitted to the AFL–CIO. Accordingly, the caption has been amended to reflect that change.

[2] The stipulation sets forth the appropriate unit as:

> All full-time and regular part-time truck drivers, helpers and warehousemen employed by the Employer at its 655 Pleasant Street, Norwood, Massachusetts facility but excluding office clerical employees, managerial employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

[3] The Stipulated Election Agreement is silent as to the intended application of the term "regular part-time drivers." We agree with the hearing officer that by "regular part-time drivers" the parties' intended a definition identical to that used by the Board in making original unit determinations.

[4] The Employer also has facilities in Little Falls and Belmont, New Jersey, Reading, Pennsylvania, and Baltimore, Maryland.

and the full-time drivers. Both groups receive the same wages, have the same supervision, and perform the same work. Spares do over-the-road runs as well as local runs and receive the same compensation for their trip as the full-time employees. Further, spares remain employed as long as they choose and have even become full-time employees. Additionally, both Sarno and Berlo have worked continually and regularly for the Employer since their hire and have the expectation of continued employment.

The differences in employment conditions between the spares and the full-time employees are insufficient to justify the exclusion of spares from the unit. Part-time employees frequently receive less in fringe benefits than full-time employees. Similarly, the spares' ability to reject work is not determinative of their employment status so as to exclude them from the unit. Pat's Blue Ribbons, supra. Nor is the fact that spares may have regular employment elsewhere sufficient to justify their exclusion. V.I.P. Movers, 232 NLRB 14 (1977). In sum, the differences here do not warrant a finding that the spares lack a community of interest with the full-time employees.

The hearing officer also found that the Petitioner's failure to protest the exclusion of spares from the Excelsior list provided by the Employer was further evidence that the spares did not share a community of interest with the full-time drivers.[6] There is no requirement, however, that the omissions from the Excelsior list be protested, and we are unwilling to draw any inference from the Petitioner's failure to challenge the exclusion of these two employees from the Excelsior list.

We find that the Employer' s spare drivers, specifically Rocco Sarno and Brian Berlo, both shared a community of interest with the Employer's full-time drivers. As both Sarno and Berlo worked with sufficient regularity between the date of their employment and the end of the eligibility period on October 17, 1987, they are both regular part-time employees eligible to vote in the election. Accordingly, we shall direct the Regional Director to open and count the ballots of Rocco Sarno and Brian Berlo.

DIRECTION

IT IS DIRECTED that the Regional Director for Region 1 shall, pursuant to the National Labor Relations Board Rules and Regulations, within 10 days from the date of this decision, open and count the ballots of Rocco Sarno and Brian Berlo. The Regional Director shall further prepare and cause to be served on the parties a revised tally of ballots and thereafter issue the appropriate certification.

[6] The hearing officer stated that, if the Petitioner knew of the existence of spare drivers prior to the election and failed to protest their exclusion, this constitutes evidence that the spares were not included within the unit description of the Stipulated Agreement. The hearing officer further stated that, on the other hand, if the Petitioner was unaware of the existence of spares, this would highlight the lack of community of interest between the spares and the full-time employees.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On September 30, 1982, Administrative Law Judge David G. Heilbrun issued the attached decision. The General Counsel, the Charging Party, and the Respondent filed exceptions and supporting briefs, and the Respondent filed an answering brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order.

The complaint alleges that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by withdrawing recognition from the Union on August 26, 1981,[2] and by failing and refusing to bargain with the Union since October 5. The complaint also alleges that the employee strike of April 13 was prolonged by the Respondent's unfair labor practices and was converted to an unfair labor practice strike on October 29. The complaint further alleges that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5), (3), and (1) by refusing to pay to striking employees in 1982 accrued vacation benefits, which were earned during the period of January 1 through April 13. The judge dismissed the complaint in its entirety. First, he found that the Respondent could lawfully withdraw recognition from the Union and that the strike was not an unfair labor practice strike. Second, he found that the Respondent could withhold the strikers' 1982 vacation pay. We disagree with the judge's first finding because the evidence offered in support of the Respondent's asserted good-faith doubt is insufficient to rebut the presumption of the Union's continuing majority status. Thus, we conclude that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act and that the strike became an unfair labor practice strike. While we adopt the judge's conclusions on the vacation pay issue, we do so only for the reasons set forth below.

1. Withdrawal of recognition: The Respondent is a Delaware corporation engaged in the nonretail manufacture of water pipe and related products at Stockton, California. Since 1958 Machinists District Lodge 115, Local Lodge 1549 has been the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the Respondent's production and maintenance employees at its Stockton facility. The parties' last collective-bargaining agreement covering these employees expired April 12. Negotiations for a successor contract began in March. The Respondent's final contract offer was rejected by the union membership and a strike commenced on April 13. Approximately 230 employees engaged in the strike. Over the next several weeks, the Respondent hired permanent strike replacements. This resulted in a total work force on May 1 of approximately 301 employees, including 290 strike replacements, 9 returning strikers, and 2 individuals returning from their layoff status. By May 10 the total work force had diminished to approximately 279 employees, thus making a total of approximately 509 employees in the unit. There is no indication from the record that this total of unit employees changed from May 10 through August 26, the date of the Respondent's withdrawal of recognition.

On May 1 the Union and the Respondent conducted a negotiation session with a Federal mediator. During this meeting, the Union stated that it would accept one of the Respondent's two alternative final offers if the Respondent would return the strikers to work, giving recognition to their seniority, and lay off as many of the permanent replacements as necessary to do so. The Respondent rejected the Union's proposal and so notified the replacements by posting a plantwide notice. Then, in late May and early June, the Union requested further negotiation sessions with the Respondent. The Respondent declined to continue bargaining. No further negotiation sessions were held and the topic of striker reinstatement was not discussed further or pursued by the Union.

On May 11 one of the replacements filed with the Board a decertification petition accompanied by a list of 211 employee signatures dated from April 30 through May 5 (R. Exh. 15). In mid-May a copy of this list was provided to the Respondent by employee Theresa Anderson, the petitioner in the decertification case. Although on its face the list does not indicate its purpose, uncontroverted evidence reveals that Anderson told the Respondent that the document was a list of employees who signed the decertification petition. In addition, the General Counsel does not contest the authenticity of the document as the employee list accompanying the decertification petition. A few weeks prior to the instant hearing of June 3, 1982, the Respondent, for the first time, checked the list of signatures for authenticity. Each signature on the list is numbered beginning with 1 through 211. Kelly Garrett, the Respondent's employee relations supervisor, testified that approximately seven signatures (numbered 14, 17, 25, 54, 125, 128, and 182), which she marked with question marks, were illegible. Thus, the Respondent could rely on, at most, 204 signatures as evincing repudiation of the Union.

The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

The judge stated that even under the Respondent's view of the contract, the vacation pay paid in 1981 prior to the beginning of the strike was based on 1981 earnings. The judge was incorrect in this respect. In the Respondent's view, all vacation pay paid in 1981 was calculated on 1980 earnings.

In addition, during this period several replacements and returning strikers made disparaging comments about the Union to the Respondent's plant manager and two supervisors, Gene Karr and Glen Frisk. Joe Bird, the plant manager, testified that prior to the filing of the decertification petition he spoke individually with three employees: Kay Hallmark, Bob Harrison, and Theresa Anderson. Each asked him how the employees could get rid of the Union. Both Anderson and Hallmark later signed the employee list for the decertification petition (signatures numbered 4 and 116 respectively). Bird also testified that the Respondent held communications meetings for the replacements and returning strikers during the last week of April or the first week of May. Bird testified that each meeting was attended by approximately 30 or 40 employees, and questions were asked about how to get rid of the Union. Bird only identified certain supervisors and Theresa Anderson by name as having attended those meetings. Thus, the record does not establish how many, if any, of those employees attending the meetings were other than those who the record shows signed the employee list for the decertification petition, submitted union membership resignations, or were involved in the conversations with certain supervisors discussed below.

Plant Engineer Karr, a supervisor, testified that in May he had individual conversations with five replacements: William Dart, James Farmer, Robert Morris, John Parker, and Bill Constant. According to Karr, each replacement said that he did not want or need a union. William Dart and James Farmer also spoke with the foaming department supervisor, Glen Frisk, and indicated to him the same disaffection with the Union. Frisk also overheard Bill Constant telling other employees that he did not want the Union. Frisk further testified that during the period of May through July he had separate individual conversations with eight other replacements, all to the effect that they did not want or need a union. Those replacements involved were James Butlers, Michael Dayton, Bill Rivera, Mike Wood, Darrell Bonds, Jim Swanson, Bill Green, and Charles Hughes. Only Michael Dayton had signed the employee list for the decertification petition (the signature numbered 2). To summarize, the Respondent, through Karr and Frisk, identified by name 12 replacements who expressed opposition to the Union and whose signatures were not also included on the employee list for the decertification petition.

In addition, seven employees submitted to the Respondent copies of written resignations from their union membership. These letters of resignation, dated from April 22 through July 28, were from Frederick J. Valenzuela, Jesse Ramsey, Sam H. Ramsey, Sharon Galleys, Jim Valentine, Jack L. Fetters, and Aaron E. Holloway. Jesse Ramsey, Sam H. Ramsey, Jim Valentine, and Jack L. Fetters indicated in their letters that their resignations were due to financial problems.[3] In their letters, Sharon Galleys and Aaron E. Holloway did not give a reason for their resignations. In his letter, Frederick J. Valenzuela indicated that he had resigned his membership and could no longer support the Union due to a "personal belief that the act of violence, harassment [sic] and overall conduct of the labor dispute are negative to any meaningful negotiation." Frederick J. Valenzuela, Jesse Ramsey, and Sam H. Ramsey later signed the employee list for the decertification petition (signatures numbered 84, 144, and 145, respectively).

During the first 4-5 months of the strike, strikers harassed job applicants and new employees as they crossed the picket line; strikers temporarily blocked their cars, shouted at them, made obscene gestures, and called them "scabs." In addition, a dummy with the word "scab" on its chest was hanged by its neck near the plant entrance. At least 70 cars owned by employees sustained some combination of smashed windows, slashed tires, or body damage. Most of this vandalism occurred while the cars were parked on the Respondent's premises. The home of one employee was burglarized, the word "scab" written on the wall, and furniture stolen. The Respondent paid employees over [3] Jesse Ramsey indicated that he resigned because he was buying a new home and had other financial and family obligations. Sam H. Ramsey indicated that he resigned because he "had a son and another baby on the way." Jim Valentine indicated that he resigned because he did not support the strike and was "having a lot of family tension as [his] Dad is fighting for his life with brain tumors and [his] wife has a heart condition." Although Valentine indicated he did not support the strike, he did not indicate rejection of the Union as the bargaining representative.

At the August 26 hearing on the decertification petition, the Respondent's counsel informed the hearing officer that the Respondent no longer recognized the Union. This was the first announcement to the Union that the Respondent had withdrawn recognition. At the instant unfair labor practice hearing, the Respondent claimed that it doubted that the Union had majority status as of May 1 and that subsequent events merely reinforced this doubt.

In early September the Union made a formal request, based on California's OSHA regulations, for access to employee medical files and other medical data collected by the Respondent. By letter dated September 16, the Respondent refused to provide this information and reiterated its refusal to recognize the Union.

On October 29 the Union distributed union handbills to approximately 180 to 200 strikers at the picket line at the Respondent's facility. The handbills stated that the Respondent withdrew recognition from the Union on May 1 and that the strike was "to protest this and other unfair labor practices."

In dismissing the complaint, the judge found that the Respondent did not have sufficient objective factors to support a good-faith doubt of the Union's majority status, but concluded that under Telautograph Corp.[4] the Respondent's withdrawal of recognition was lawful because it occurred subsequent to the filing of the decertification petition on May 11. In light of this conclusion, the judge found that the Respondent did not have an obligation to bargain with the Union and that the strike had not been prolonged by any unlawful conduct by the Respondent.

In her exceptions the General Counsel contends, inter alia, that the judge erroneously applied Telautograph to conclude that the withdrawal of recognition was lawful. The General Counsel argues that the Respondent's reliance on the pending decertification petition is insufficient, alone or in combination with the other factors asserted by the Respondent, to establish a good-faith doubt concerning the Union's majority status. The General Counsel further contends that, as evidenced by the Union's notice of October 29, one of the purposes of the strike was to protest the Respondent's unlawful withdrawal of recognition and, thus, the strike was converted to an unfair labor practice strike on October 29.

We agree with the General Counsel's contention that the judge misapplied Telautograph. Contrary to the judge's analysis, the Board in Telautograph did not privilege an employer to withdraw recognition from a union solely based on the existence of a pending decertification petition. The Board there held that an employer must refuse to engage in further contract negotiations until the question concerning representation has been settled by the Board, but the employer remained obligated to deal with the collective-bargaining representative in all other respects, including contract administration and grievance processing.[5] Thus, the Respondent here was not privileged to withdraw recognition based solely on the pending decertification petition, although the petition may be relied on as a factor in assessing whether the Respondent had a good-faith doubt concerning the Union's majority status. In this connection, we find that the record evidence on which the Respondent relied to support its doubt of the Union's majority status was insufficient to justify withdrawal of recognition for the reasons below.

In Station KKHI, 284 NLRB 1339 (1987), the Board recently reaffirmed the essential principles controlling here:

> Absent unusual circumstances, there is an irrebuttable presumption that a union enjoys majority status during the first year following its certification. On expiration of the certification year, the presumption of majority status continues but may be rebutted. An employer who wishes to withdraw recognition after a year may do so in one of two ways: (1) by showing that on the date recognition was withdrawn the union did not in fact enjoy majority status, or (2) by presenting evidence of a sufficient objective basis for a reasonable doubt of the union's majority status at the time the employer refused to bargain.

As previously indicated, the Respondent's defense of its withdrawal of recognition is based on this second method, i.e., reasonable doubt of the Union's majority status prior to August 26. The objective factors presented by the Respondent at the trial to support its reasonable doubt were: its hire of strike replacements; the property damage and harassment of the replacements during the strike; the decertification petition supported by the employee list of 211 signatures; certain comments by replacements to the plant manager and two supervisors rejecting union representation; the seven union membership resignations; the Union's May 1 contract proposal demanding the reinstatement of the strikers, after discharging the replacements, if necessary; and the Union's lack of attempts to organize the replacements.

[5] In Dresser Industries, 264 NLRB 1088 (1982), the Board overruled Telautograph, but only prospectively. Accordingly, the Board found that the employer in Dresser had acted lawfully when it relied on Telautograph, which was the current law at the time it ceased negotiations. Because the Respondent here has similarly relied on Telautograph before that case was overruled, we find that it did not violate Sec. 8(a)(5) and (1) by refusing to engage in further contract negotiations pending an election. See Alexander Linn Hospital Assn., 288 NLRB 103, 107 fn. 16 (1988).

We note at the outset that in Station KKHI, supra the Board overruled Pennco, Inc., 250 NLRB 716 (1980), on which the judge relied here. In Station KKHI the Board held that it would no longer apply a presumption that strike replacements support the union in the same ratio as those shown to have been replaced. The Board also declined, however, to adopt the contrary presumption, urged by the Respondent here, that strike replacements willing to cross a picket line to go to work repudiate the union as their collective-bargaining representative. The Board stated that it will not apply any specific presumption concerning the union sentiments of strike replacements, but will review each case on its facts considering whether the employer has proffered evidence of employees' expressed desires to repudiate the union sufficient to overcome the overall presumption of continuing union majority.

Turning to the facts here, the record falls short of supporting the Respondent's affirmative defense in that it establishes only that prior to August 26 the Respondent was aware that, at most, 217 employees out of a combined total of approximately 509 strike replacements, returning strikers, and strikers had repudiated the Union. For the reasons set forth below, this figure is based solely on the statement from employee Morrison to Plant Manager Bird, the comments repudiating the Union made by the 12 employees identified by Supervisors Karr and Frisk, and the 204 employees who legibly signed the list for the decertification petition.

In arriving at this figure of 217 employees, we reject the other factors relied on by the Respondent. First, in Station KKHI, supra at 1344, we held that > [T]he hiring of permanent replacements who cross a picket line, in itself, does not support an inference that the replacements repudiate the union as collective-bargaining representative. . . . [A]n employee may be forced to work for financial reasons, or may disapprove of the strike in question but still desire union representation and would support other union initiatives. . . . [To hold that replacements can be presumed to disfavor the union] would disrupt the balance of competing economic weapons long established in strike situations and substantially impair the employees' right to strike by adding to the risk of replacement the risk of loss of the bargaining representative as soon as replacements equal in number to the strikers are willing to cross the picket line.

Consistent with Station KKHI, supra, we will not permit the Respondent to rely on its hiring of replacements but we "will require 'some further evidence of union non-support'"[6] before concluding that the Respondent had a good-faith doubt of the Union's majority status.

Second, we reject the Respondent's contention that further evidence of union nonsupport emanated from the purported strike violence that occurred here.[7] The Respondent asserts that various kinds of harassment by the strikers, including the vandalism to the unattended parked cars described above, justify a conclusion of employee rejection of the Union. In support of its contention, the Respondent relies, inter alia, on I T Services, 263 NLRB 1183 (1982), in which the Board considered several factors, including strike violence, to conclude that the employer had an adequate objective basis to support a good-faith doubt of the union's majority status.

We find the instant case distinguishable from I T Services in two significant respects. In the instant case, the circumstances surrounding the picketing[8] do not rise to the level of the outrageous conduct exhibited in I T Services.[9] More importantly given the crucial significance of the Respondent's decision to withdraw recognition, we note that the Respondent here had available other, more reliable factors, including the list for the decertification petition and the statements from identified employees, which could have indicated more tangibly majority employee dissatisfaction with the union and with the alleged violence, but, as we have found, fell short of doing so.[10]

[6] Station KKHI, supra, quoting NLRB v. Pennco, Inc., 684 F.2d 340, 343 (6th Cir. 1982).

[7] We note in this regard that in NLRB v. Randle-Eastern Ambulance Service, 584 F.2d 720 (5th Cir. 1978), the court determined that the employer had sufficient objective considerations to support a reasonable doubt of the union's continued majority status. Although the court noted that several returning strikers submitted union resignation letters after crossing the picket line in a fairly acrimonious strike and that the employer claimed that six replacements had indicated disinterest in the union or had been victims of picket line violence, the court's decision does not appear to have turned on the mere existence of a purportedly violent picket line as an indication of a lack of union support.

[8] We would reach the same conclusion even if we were to accept as true the additional purported violent acts perpetrated by strikers described in the Respondent's offers of proof, which the judge rejected.

[9] The judge in I T Services set forth in detail the "pervasive" violence that attended the strike there. He noted that some of the violence occurred in the presence of the union president or was committed by union picket captains and also noted the apparently racial character of much of the invective. The judge concluded that "the level of violence was so high" that employees subjected to it could, in effect, be presumed to reject any association with their perceived "tormentor."

Third, contrary to the Respondent's position, the Union's striker reinstatement demand on May 1 does not automatically prove that the Union abandoned the replacements or that the replacements do not have any desire for union representation. In this regard, the Board noted in Station KKHI, supra at 1344, that the incumbent union's primary concern, at least for the duration of the strike, is for the striker's welfare, rather than that of the replacements, and that the replacements are typically aware of this. The Board, however, refused to impute a lack of union support to the replacements. In this regard, inasmuch as at least an initial demand that all the strikers be reinstated is to be expected in the typical strike situation, to hold that such proposals establish the antiunion sentiments of the replacements and thus support an employer's doubt of union majority would invariably "substantially impair the employees' right to strike by adding to the risk of replacement the risk of loss of the bargaining representative." Station KKHI, supra.[11] Such a result would fly in the face of the purposes and policies of the Act.[12]

Fourth, we observe that six of the membership resignations relied on by the Respondent here indicate that they were submitted for financial reasons or do not indicate any particular reason. Valenzuela's resignation appears to be the only exception. It indicates a possible repudiation of the Union, but Valenzuela also signed the employee list accompanying the decertification petition and thus already has been counted among those rejecting the Union. Regarding those indicating financial reasons, the Board has held that membership resignations, which may be submitted for financial reasons, do not establish a renunciation of union representation. For example, in NLRB v. Mar-Len Cabinets, 659 F.2d 995, 999 (9th Cir. 1981), enfg. 243 NLRB 523 (1979), the court agreed with the Board's conclusion that employee resignations from the union did not support the employer's asserted good-faith doubt since > the employees resigned from the union to avoid potential fines, not to oust the union as a bargaining representative, and . . . they crossed the picket line and returned to work as a means of preserving a continuity of income because of economic necessity, and not because they rejected union representation.

We, therefore, conclude that the Respondent's reliance on the membership resignations was an insufficient basis for supporting an alleged good-faith doubt of the Union's majority status.[13]

Finally, we reject the asserted comments made in the presence of unidentified employees at the communication meetings described above by Plant Manager Bird. Such comments involved questions from speakers who, except for Theresa Anderson, were unidentified, asking how to get rid of the Union. We decline to speculate on the union sentiments of the 30–40 employees attending those mandatory meetings solely on the basis of their attendance at the meetings. There simply is insufficient evidence to establish that the employees attending, except possibly for Anderson, wanted to repudiate the Union.[14] Moreover, even assuming the unidentified employees actually shared Anderson's views, they may have already been considered by the Respondent if they signed the employee list for the decertification petition. Accordingly, we find that the evidence does not meet the Board's standards for objective considerations sufficient to support a reasonable doubt of the Union's majority.[15] We, therefore, find that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and that the strike to protest this unlawful withdrawal of recognition converted to an unfair labor practice strike as of October 29.

2. Vacation pay: Regarding the issue of the striking employees and vacation pay, the clause concerning vacation pay in the parties' expired contract was as follows:

> Employees participating in the vacation plan for the first time shall not be entitled to a vacation until their anniversary date. Thereafter

[10] As may be evident elsewhere in this decision, although we need not reach this matter here, the weight we choose to accord to other factors, such as statements from unidentified employees and the request by the Union for the discharge of strike replacements, differs from the weight accorded those factors in I T Services.

[11] We note additionally that it is our experience that such union demands are often modified as strike settlement negotiations progress.

> employees shall be entitled to a vacation in the calendar year in which their vacation falls, provided that they work sometime during the calendar year for which the vacation is due, or through the month of December of the previous year. An employee's first vacation shall be calculated at 2% of total earnings during their first year of employment. Pay for subsequent vacations shall be calculated at 2% of total earnings during the calendar year prior to the vacation, for each week of vacation, for which the employee is eligible.

On May 7 the Respondent paid approximately $200,000 in vacation pay to the striking employees with the notification that such payment represented "all monies due you by the company" under the expired contract. The Respondent's officials testified that the money distributed on May 7 represented a fringe benefit which accrued by virtue of employment in 1980. An additional $52,000 had previously been paid during 1981 to employees requesting vacation pay before the strike began, again assertedly based on 1980 earnings. On February 26, 1982, the Union's business representative sent to the Respondent 168 requests "for payments for vacation earned for . . . members/employees . . . currently on strike." The Respondent did not respond to this request.

At the hearing, the Respondent claimed that under its interpretation of the contract provision discussed above, no further payments were due the strikers because they had not worked in December 1981 or, as of yet, in 1982. Uncontroverted evidence showed that during 1979 and 1980, 70 or 80 individuals voluntarily terminated their employment, 11 more individuals were laid off, and none of these individuals received vacation pay during the year of his termination or layoff. The General Counsel advanced a different interpretation of this contract provision and asserted that, by February 1982, further payments to the strikers were indeed due because they had worked during 1981. The General Counsel relied on the disposition of a 1970 employee grievance involving Harold Lewis to show that an employee was entitled to vacation pay if he had worked during the year prior to his request. Lewis, who had been laid off in November 1968, sought vacation pay in 1970 because he had received a holiday pay advance in 1969. His grievance was denied by the Respondent because he had "performed no work in December 1968 and he performed no work in the plant at any time during the calender year of 1969."

The judge concluded that the Respondent did not violate the Act by refusing to comply with the requests made for vacation pay in February 1982. In so doing, the judge distinguished Vesuvius Crucible Co., 252 NLRB 1279 (1980), concluding that there the Board had found a violation because the employer had the punitive objective of denying fringe benefits to employees because they went on strike whereas here no such motivation is present. The judge went on to find that the impact on employee rights of the Respondent's actions was, under the mode of analysis set forth in NLRB v. Great Dane Trailers, 388 U.S. 26 (1967), comparatively slight as opposed to inherently destructive, and the Respondent had sufficiently justified its action by asserting that it was relying on its interpretation of a contract that was, at best, ambiguous. We agree with the result reached by the judge for the reasons set forth below.

In determining whether an employer's refusal to pay benefits to strikers violates Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act, we have recently applied the principles articulated in Great Dane in Texaco, Inc.[16] In Texaco, supra, the Board set forth the following analytical scheme for application of the Great Dane test in this context:[17]

> Under this test, the General Counsel bears the prima facie burden of proving at least some adverse effect of the benefit denial on employee rights. The General Counsel can meet this burden by showing that (1) the benefit was accrued and (2) the benefit was withheld on the apparent basis of a strike. . . .
> Once the General Counsel makes a prima facie showing of at least some adverse effect on employee rights the burden under Great Dane then shifts to the employer to come forward with proof of a legitimate and substantial business justification for its cessation of benefits. The employer may meet this burden by proving that a collective-bargaining representative has clearly and unmistakably waived its employees' statutory right to be free of such

> First, if it can reasonably be concluded that the employer's discriminatory conduct was "inherently destructive" of important employee rights, no proof of antiunion motivation is needed and the Board can find an unfair labor practice even if the employer introduces evidence that the conduct was motivated by business considerations. Second, if the adverse effect of the discriminatory conduct on employee rights is "comparatively slight," an antiunion motivation must be proved to sustain the charge if the employer has come forward with evidence of legitimate and substantial business justifications for the conduct. Thus, in either situation, once it has been proved that the employer engaged in discriminatory conduct which could have adversely affected employee rights to some extent, the burden is upon the employer to establish that he was motivated by legitimate objectives since proof of motivation is most accessible to him. [Emphasis in original.]

> discrimination or coercion. . . . If the employer does not seek to prove waiver, it may still contest the disabled employee's continued entitlement to benefits by demonstrating reliance on a nondiscriminatory contract interpretation that is "reasonable and . . . arguably correct" [emphasis in original, footnote omitted and thus sufficient to constitute a legitimate and substantial business justification for its conduct. Moreover, as under Great Dane, even if the employer proves business justification, the Board may nevertheless find that the employer has committed an unfair labor practice if the conduct is demonstrated to be "inherently destructive" of important employee rights or motivated by antiunion intent.

Applying this analytical scheme to the facts here, we find that the General Counsel has made a prima facie showing of a violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1). In this regard, the General Counsel relied on the vacation pay provision in the expired collective-bargaining agreement. This provision, as set forth above, states that "employees shall be entitled to a vacation in the calendar year in which their vacation falls, provided that they work sometime during the calendar year for which the vacation is due." The record reveals that the Union considered this provision to mean that an employee is entitled to vacation payment for a given year, e.g., 1982, provided that the employee worked sometime during the prior year, e.g., 1981. The record also reveals that the employer's stated reasons for rejecting Harold Lewis' grievance for vacation pay support the Union's interpretation of the vacation pay provision. The General Counsel showed that the vacation benefits were due and payable to the striking employees and had accrued in 1982 when the Respondent withheld payment of them.[18] In addition, it is undisputed that the Respondent withheld vacation benefits for strikers while paying such benefits to employees who crossed the picket line and returned to work sometime in 1982. The benefit, therefore, was withheld on the apparent basis of a strike. Consequently, the burden shifts to the Respondent to prove a legitimate and substantial business justification for the denial of these vacation benefits to the strikers.

The Respondent's asserted reasons for denying the benefits were its interpretation of the applicable contract provisions and its past practice regarding employees who were absent for reasons other than being on strike. Reliance on such reasons for denying benefits to strikers has been held to be a substantial business justification by at least two courts of appeals.[19] Moreover, the Respondent's construction of the contract "is reasonable and . . . arguably correct"[20] and nondiscriminatory. The record reveals, as set forth above, that the Respondent had applied the contract in the same manner on numerous past occasions to employees absent for reasons other than participation in a strike.[21] Accordingly, we find that the contractual language and past practice provided the Respondent with the necessary proof of a legitimate and substantial business justification for its denial of vacation benefits to its striking employees in 1982.

Having found that the Respondent established a legitimate and substantial business justification, we must further consider whether the Respondent's denial of vacation benefits can reasonably be found to be "inherently destructive" of important employee rights. The Supreme Court in Great Dane described "inherently destructive" conduct as that which carries with it "'unavoidable consequences which the employer not only foresaw but which he must have intended' and thus bears 'its own indicia of intent.'"[22] Such conduct has been described as having "far reaching effects which would hinder future bargaining, or . . . discriminated solely upon the basis of participation in strikes or union activity,"[23] or that it created "visible and continuing obstacles to the future exercise of employee rights."[24] Here, as noted above, the Respondent paid a large sum of vacation pay to striking employees in May 1981. At that time, the Respondent informed the Union and the employees of its position that no further payments were due under the terms of the expired agreement. Furthermore, the Respondent's evidence establishing that it had applied the contract in the same manner in the past to employees absent for reasons other than striking is essentially uncontradicted.[25] Because of the Respondent's earlier payment of benefits to strikers, its expressed reliance on the contract for its later denial of similar benefits, and its denial of such benefits to nonstriking employees in the past, we find that there has been no broad and obvious impact on employee rights as envisioned by the Supreme Court in fashioning the term "inherently destructive."

[18] This does not signify that the Respondent's interpretation that, according to the contract's provisions, no further vacation benefits accrued to the striking employees, who had not worked either during December 1981 or at all during 1982, is any less tenable.

[25] The grounds for denial of the 1970 grievance of Howard Lewis, presumably under the same contract language, are too tenuous a basis for negating the Respondent's evidence of past practice under the contract operative here.

The final issue that must be resolved regarding this complaint allegation is whether the General Counsel proved an antiunion motivation for the Respondent's denial of the vacation benefits despite the presence of a business justification for the denial. We conclude that no such motivation has been established. Thus, the Respondent based the denial of benefits on its interpretation of the vacation benefits provision of a contract negotiated well before the strike commenced. Further, there is no evidence that the Respondent was motivated by discriminatory considerations when it agreed to those provisions, which are facially neutral, or when it arrived at its interpretation of those provisions. Moreover, as noted above, the Respondent paid approximately $200,000 in vacation benefits to its employees after the strike began. Indeed, such payments tend to militate against a finding that the Respondent's subsequent denial of benefits had an unlawful motivation.

In these circumstances, we conclude that the Respondent did not violate Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by denying vacation benefits to strikers in 1982.[26]

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. By withdrawing recognition from the Union on August 26, 1981, the Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) and Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. The strike, which commenced on April 13, 1981, was prolonged by the Respondent's unfair labor practices, described above, and was converted to an unfair labor practice strike on October 29, 1981.

REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, we shall order it to cease and desist and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act. We shall order the Respondent to recognize the Union as the exclusive representative of its employees in the appropriate unit.

Having found that the Respondent's unlawful withdrawal of recognition of the Union converted the strike to an unfair labor practice strike on October 29, 1981, we shall order that all striking employees who were not permanently replaced prior to that date be reinstated, on their unconditional request, to their former jobs or, if such positions no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or other rights or privileges previously enjoyed, discharging, if necessary, any replacements hired after October 29; and that the Respondent make such strikers whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits resulting from its failure to reinstate them within 5 days of the unconditional request, with interest, to be computed in the manner prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), and New Horizons for the Retarded.[27] Such employees for whom employment is not immediately available shall be placed on a preferential hiring list for employment as positions become available and before other persons are hired for such work. Priority for placement on that list is to be determined by seniority or some other nondiscriminatory test.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, Johns- Manville Sales Corporation, Stockton, California, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall [26] Chairman Stephens agrees with his colleagues that the Respondent's denial of vacation benefits to strikers in 1982 was not unlawful. He would find, however, that the General Counsel failed to establish, prima facie, an adverse effect of the benefit denial on the employees' rights because, in his view, the General Counsel did not show that the vacation benefits were accrued. Texaco, Inc., supra. In the first place, as noted above, the contractual eligibility criteria for those benefits were facially neutral—i.e., they were defined without reference to the exercise of any Sec. 7 right, including the right to strike. Second, unlike the majority, Chairman Stephens is persuaded that the Respondent's interpretation of the eligibility criteria was correct, and that the strikers were not entitled to vacation benefits in 1982 because they had not worked either during that year or through December 1981. Thus, under the correct application of facially neutral eligibility criteria, the strikers in this case had not accrued the vacation rights in question. Because the General Counsel has not established a prima facie case under Texaco, Chairman Stephens would dismiss the 8(a)(3) allegation without pursuing the Texaco analysis further. However, assuming that the vacation benefits can properly be regarded as having accrued, Chairman Stephens agrees with the majority that the Respondent set forth a legitimate and substantial business justification for denying those benefits to the strikers, and that the denial was not inherently destructive of the strikers' Sec. 7 rights. See his concurring footnote in Amoco Oil Co., supra, 285 NLRB 918 fn. 9.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

DAVID G. HEILBRUN, Administrative Law Judge. This case was heard at Stockton, California, on June 3, 4, and 7, 1982, based on a consolidated complaint alleging that Johns-Manville Sales Corporation, (Respondent), violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the Act by refusing to bargain with International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, AFL-CIO, District Lodge No. 115, Local Lodge No. 1549 (Union) as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of employees in an appropriate production and maintenance unit through its withdrawal of recognition from the Union and insistence that it no longer represented a majority of employees in that unit, followed by a refusal to tender payment of assertedly accrued vacation entitlement of striking employees contrary to past practice and because the strikers joined, supported, or assisted the Union and engaged in concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection, and in order to discourage employees from engaging in such activities or other concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection. The consolidated complaint further alleged that since on or about October 29, 1981, a strike described as commencing April 13, 1981, had been in protest of, and then prolonged by, such withdrawal of recognition and, in consequence, the employees engaged in striking became unfair labor practice strikers as of that latter time.

On the entire record, my observation of witnesses, and consideration of posthearing briefs, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT AND RESULTANT CONCLUSION OF LAW

Based on a collective-bargaining relationship that has existed since 1958, the applicable labor contract of these parties was last effective from April 10, 1978, to and including April 12, 1981. Renewal negotiations began in March 1981 with 12 sessions following over approximately the next 30 days.[1] Crucial sessions were held on both April 8 and 9, the former occasion being one at which Respondent made a proposal offering the choice between two economic options. This presentation, as described by James Owens, Respondent's labor relations manager and chief negotiator, was termed a final offer. Option 1 retained a COLA feature with a proposed general wage increase of 3 percent annually over a 3-year term, while option 2 contemplated folding the accumulated $4.17 hourly COLA into the payroll and setting 14-10-10 as annual hourly rate increase percentages under a new contract. Numerous other features were also included, the chief of which, as described by Manuel Joaquin, union president and negotiating committee member, was a retirement plan deemed highly inadequate for the membership.[2] The parties met again on April 9 at Stockton for a day-long session that was entered by Federal Mediator Sherman Warady in the early evening. During the course of this meeting, Respondent clarified that its final option 1 had inadvertently failed to show a proposed continuation of existing dental plan benefits and, following this, the Union made a counterproposal, which was rejected. As had been true the day before, principal spokesmen for the parties were DeMattei and Owens, with the latter reiterating that pending options represented a final offer and management intended to operate the plant with or without the then-present work force.

On April 10, Joaquin presided over a membership meeting at which contract rejection resulted, primarily because of the distressingly viewed retirement plan offer. A strike ensued on Monday, April 13, at which time the unit's active complement was 228 employees. Another approximately two dozen persons were on layoff at the time. On April 14 Respondent sent union officials and each member of the striking unit a letter reading:

> Due to the continuing bargaining impasse and the strike, this is to inform you that the company intends to implement the company's Option II, first year final offer in its entirety, which was given to the Union on April 8, 1981. Accordingly, the first year offer of a 14% increase on job rates and other language changes will be effective April 21, 1981, and benefits on May 1, 1981 with the exception of any Dental Plan.
> In addition, the company intends to hire permanent replacements for the Stockton, California plant effective on April 21, 1981 unless we have a signed contract by noon on April 20, 1981.
> If you have any question, please let us know.

The following Monday a full-length advertisement was placed under "Employment Opportunities" in the classified section of area newspapers, in which "Permanent Jobs" were prominently announced to be "Available Now" with various maintenance and operating titles and associated hourly rates shown. Other benefits were listed to reflect what, in fact, was Respondent's option 2 offer. The advertisement stated that a labor dispute was in progress at the plant. During the balance of that week approximately 1500 persons were interviewed, and hiring commenced on April 24 in consequence of which 290 persons were newly employed by May 1. Kelly Garrett, labor relations supervisor, testified that under Cain's direction she had organized and carried out this hiring process, establishing an initial screening interview phase and a final interview phase between staff members at the plant and "people that we felt we would want to hire." Garrett testified that she had personally interviewed only about five or six applicants, and that she told them, recalling particularly having done so with Gerald Thornhill and Karen Cox, that the positions were permanent. By May 1, nine strikers had returned to work and two individuals also did so from their former layoff status.

[2] Principal union spokesman for the primary course of bargaining was Business Representative Lawrence DeMattei, with Joaquin, Chief Steward Leonard Moreno, and certain rank-and-file employees also present on this negotiating team. Other persons comprising Respondent's bargaining committee included Plant Manager Joe Wayne Bird and Stockton Manager for Employee Relations Fred Cain.

This resulted in a total work force on May 1 of 301 persons. By May 10, this total had diminished to 279, including another prestrike employee who returned to work in early May. On this basis Respondent had resumed production operations as traditionally performed here, and had augmented scheduling of work because a strike was then in progress at a sister facility in Long Beach, California.[3]

The parties' bargaining committees had met again under FMCS auspices at Sacramento, California, on May 1, at which time Directing Business Representative Ray Gable served as principal union spokesman, with Owens in his customary role as chief management representative. Gable sought to then accept the option 2 package, provided Respondent would supplant its replacement work force with striking members of the Union. Owens answered this by saying there were no jobs that remained available because the striking work force had been replaced "in its entirety." Gable argued unavailingly that all newly hired personnel should be viewed as probationary employees with job rights subordinate to strikers' seniority.[4]

The next significant event was filing of a refusal-to-bargain charge by the Union. It was docketed as Case 32-CA-3594 on May 5 and, following investigation, was ultimately dismissed on July 8. Another proceeding close in time was a petition docketed as Case 32-RD-314, filed on May 11 with 211 employee signatures appended in support. The hearing ensued on August 26, in the course of which Respondent's counsel voiced a declination to recognize the Union. Subsequently there was a blanket request by the Union for information from employee medical records and health monitoring data, to which Cain responded by letter dated September 16 that such would only be divulged directly to employees on their authorization. Cain's letter added that his approach was taken because of "challenge" to the Union's representative status, and that no waiver of a previously stated position on the subject should be construed from disclosure to individuals. The initiating letter on this matter, that of DeMattei, dated September 1, had forwarded approximately 120 individual requests of strikers for the same information as he was seeking, and by letter dated September 17, Cain sent individual answers to each of these employees. The transmittal letter cautioned each recipient to rethink what use they might put the "confidential[ly]" based medical information to, and reemphasized that the Union was "in no way" still recognized as the collective-bargaining representative at the Stockton plant.

On October 5 the Regional Director issued a Decision and Direction of Election respecting the RD petition in which certain routine contentions were disposed of, and on this impetus a preelection conference was conducted with the parties on October 25. The projection was to vote all active employees, plus those on strike, in an election set for November 5. On October 22, however, the Union had filed the charge on which this proceeding is in part based, the result of which was to block further proceedings on the RD case. On October 29 the Union distributed a notice to all its striking members that read:

> Johns-Manville has engaged in unfair labor practices by their withdrawal of recognition from Machinist District Lodge 115 and Local Lodge 1549 on May 1, 1981. Our strike at Johns-Manville is to protest this and other unfair labor practices.

A second branch of this case concerns the matter of vacation pay entitlement because this might be assured from contract language taken in conjunction with other circumstances and applicable law. On May 7 Respondent had paid approximately $200,000 in vacation pay to those employees who struck effective April 13, and the transmittal of such payments individually notified that it represented "all monies due you by the company" in terms of the recently expired collective-bargaining agreement.[5] Article 13 of this agreement prefaced the subject of vacation pay by language referring to the salutory benefits of "an annual period of rest [being] desirable for the health and well-being of people steadily employed," and then set forth certain operative phrasing in a section 63 as follows:

> Employees participating in the vacation plan for the first time shall not be entitled to a vacation until their anniversary date. Thereafter employees shall be entitled to a vacation in the calendar year in which their vacation falls, provided that they work sometime during the calendar year for which the vacation is due, or through the month of December of the previous year. An employee's first vacation shall be calculated at 2% of total earnings during their first year of employment. Pay for subsequent vacations shall be calculated at 2% of total earning during the calendar year prior to the vacation, for each week of vacation, for which the employee is eligible.

Respondent's Stockton Plant Controller William Bixby testified that the amounts distributed on May 7 represented payment of a fringe benefit accrued by reason of employment during 1980. This explanation was identical to that of Cain, who had himself expressly termed the compensation as "based on 1980 earnings."

[3] Respondent is a Delaware corporation engaged at Stockton, California, in the nonretail manufacture of water pipe and related products, annually selling and shipping goods valued in excess of $50,000 directly to customers located outside California. On these admitted facts I find Respondent to be an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Sec. 2(6) and (7) of the Act, and otherwise that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Sec. 2(5). On October 29 certain business changes had resulted in Respondent being wholly owned by the entity called Johns-Manville Corporation, which in turn was wholly owned by a parent corporation newly titled Manville Corporation.

[4] This description of the May 1 meeting synthesizes testimony of Moreno, Joaquin, Owens, Bird, and DeMattei, but in doing so I credit the actual recollections of Owens and Bird. The three other witnesses named were vague, evasive, and unconvincing in their description of how and why the Union pressed such a rather unrealistic position during this May 1 meeting. I also emphasize that by Owens' credited version the Federal mediator had first broached the subject of an employer's entitlement to secure permanent replacements for strikers, but coupled that with his concern as a neutral about the fate of "long service employees."

On February 26, 1982, the Union's then-business representative Robert Elsholz wrote to Cain enclosing "168 requests for payment for vacation earned for . . . members/employees . . . currently on strike." Taking guidance from superiors Cain made no response to this letter, and when Elsholz telephoned him 2 weeks later to inquire about status of the request, Cain said there would be no response. Cain testified that at the time his influencing motivation was the employer's position that no further vacation moneys were due, and that he wished to avoid corresponding with the Union since this seemed to lead to further accusations of unfair labor practice conduct. Case 32-CA-4377 represents the charge that was promptly filed on this subject.

In this context the General Counsel and the Union argue that Respondent has been without objective bases on which to decline continued recognition of the established collective-bargaining representative for its plant employees, and that the most prominent indicator of this failing is actual testimony of management's industrial relations functionaries. The most highly placed of these, Corporate Vice President of Labor Relations Michael Tappin, testified that he was the chief architect of contingency planning when negotiations reached their crisis/impasse stage in April, and had determined it was vital for the Stockton facility to remain in production because of the impact of strikes at other west coast locations. Tappin testified that when the strike replacement program at Stockton resulted in a viable work force by very early May, he began to sense or conclude that the Union could not truly still represent a majority of the production and maintenance unit as then constituted. His perspective was formed from total circumstances, including what was reported to him concerning hostility between strikers and strike replacements at a picket line respecting the persons of those appearing for work from late April onward, plus the repudiatory position assumed by Gable toward the strike replacements as voiced during the May 1 meeting. Tappin explained that his belief was an inchoate sort of conclusion that gained reinforcement over summer months as the RD petition underwent processing, numerous strike replacements expressed objections to management officials about ever having the Union as their representative, and a generally polarized antipathy arose between strike replacements because of vehicle damage and incessant unpleasantries. From this Tappin believed that the legal position voiced by Counsel John D. O'Brien in the course of RD case hearing procedures on August 26 was simply a reflection of what had become evident from the entire circumstances of several previous months. This was also the tenor of Owens' testimony. He, too, described the employer's belief as based on the inherent realities of a numerically superior work force displaying near-unanimous disdain for the Union, versus the numerically lesser group of strikers who still adhered to the Union by their picketing and other activities.

Respondent counters with a contention that objectively viewed good-faith doubt factors were in truth present, and that more importantly the issue is controlled by Telautograph Corp., 199 NLRB 892 (1972). On this basis Respondent argues that a superior rationale is present where under policies of the Act are better fulfilled by permitting a Board-supervised secret ballot election to decide the question whether continued exclusive representation should be accorded the Union in poststrike circumstances.

On the separate vacation pay issue, the General Counsel confines itself to an assertion that applicable contract language requires prorata payment for time worked in 1981, viewed in the context of NLRB v. Great Dane Trailers, 388 U.S. 26 (1967). The Union adopts reliance on Great Dane, and looks to the particular evidence of a grievance filed by Harold Lewis in 1970 in which this individual claimed vacation pay based on income received in early 1969 as a "hardship" case advance of such holiday pay as might be earned by Lewis on a recall to work from layoff. Ultimately Lewis never returned from layoff, in consequence of which his last actual day of work at Respondent's plant was November 15, 1968. A third step disposition denying this grievance was written August 31, 1970, by then Industrial Relations Manager J. E. Gilmore, in which he noted that under presumably identical contract language Lewis had "performed no work in December of 1968 and he performed no work in the plant at any time during the calendar year of 1969." Thus the rejection of Lewis' grievance was plainly because while money was paid to him in 1969, it was an isolated special case and not within the intendment of contract language as viewed by the Company. The Union analogizes from this sole past illustration to argue that here the actual active employment by 168 requestees during 3-1/2 months of 1981 is exactly the sort of qualifying status that Lewis lacked in losing his 1970 grievance. Stated otherwise, the Union takes the phraseology of why Lewis' grievance was rejected, and applies it to this situation in contending that a prorata entitlement to vacation pay had vested by the time the April strike commenced, and that it was premature to claim this until at least January 1, 1982, had arrived. In briefing this issue the General Counsel contends that 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) violations have occurred both because of the "inherently destructive" principles of Great Dane, and because Vesuvius Crucible Co., 252 NLRB 1279 (1980); Knuth Bros., Inc., 229 NLRB 1204 (1977); and Elmac Corp., 225 NLRB 1188 (1976), are holdings that illustrate why a violation should be found in this situation. The General Counsel emphasizes further that in any event a breach of residual obligation to negotiate in good faith on the subject has been shown, citing Sherwin-Williams Co., 260 NLRB 1231 (1982), and Stokely-Van Camp, Inc., 259 NLRB 961 (1982).

Respondent's countering argument is that the Lewis grievance was of such unique and frivolous character that it is meaningless to any resolution of this issue, particularly because the vacation pay clause has never been viewed as entitling an employee to prorata vacation pay when separation from employment occurs in the same calendar year as the active employment. Respondent enlarges on this theory by pointing to contract language saying that the most remote type of qualifying employment requires it to be through the previous December, a standard that is tantamount to saying a hypothetical employee would be one continuing his or her employment into the new calendar year for which a new annual vacation benefit would then start. Respondent emphasized that its distribution of money in May included the advice that it represented all that could ever be construed as due strikers from that point in time onward, and Bixby testified without contradiction that during the years 1979 and 1980 approximately 70 or 80 individuals voluntarily terminated their employment and received no vacation pay for earnings received during the calendar year of such termination. Bixby gave one specific example of Steve Botiller, who terminated December 5, 1979, and received no vacation pay for 1979 earnings, having neither claimed such nor had a grievance filed on his behalf. He made the same point that the Union did not grieve any of the described 1979 and 1980 cases, nor did it do so for a particular group of 11 individuals laid off during calendar year 1980 and to whom no vacation pay was tendered based on the actual earnings of that same year.

It is evident that the Union's fundamental survival turns on resolution of the chief issue in this case concerning consequences of Respondent's admitted refusal to accord further recognition. Given the settled principle of a rubuttable presumption that the Union's established majority status continues,[6] analysis proceeds directly to the rule that new employees in a strike situation are presumed to support the incumbent labor organization in the same ratio as those they replace.[7] The Pennco case recently and fully set forth rationale for this principle, dealing expressly with both the instances of strike replacements who must cross a hostile picket line and strikers who return to work. The Board believes that a multiplicity of personal reasons could influence particular individuals, and these are undiscernible without supporting evidence to qualify the behavior. It was even noted in Pennco that the occurrence of some picket line violence is merely a factor "weakening the presumption of majority status but not alone rebutting it."

As a threshold mechanistic view of the situation it must, therefore, be presumed that 226 (the same ratio) replacement employees are in the Union's column, leaving only 75 against out of the original 301. Allowing further for 7 written resignations or indications of disaffection with the Union, plus the 14 different individuals testified to by Supervisors Gene Karr and Glen Frisk as verbally expressing opposition to the Union, the working arithmetical configuration is still no better than a presumed 205 for and 96 against. With the final adjustment of an estimated 40 persons, at most, described by Bird as having spoken vociferously in group gatherings against the Union, and assuming none of these to be in the 21 adjustees above, the relationship changes to only 165 presumably for the Union, at any time after May 1, and 136 opposed.

These calculations, however, were not even consciously involved among Respondent's officials, for Tappin himself, as head theoretician, testified to the belief that majority status had departed the Union on May 1, and circumstances at that point in time "obviously" led to "good faith doubt" on the matter. A similar feeling was harbored by Bird, who echoed the May 1 date as that on which an obligation to recognize the Union expired. Owens stopped short of expressly fixing May 1 as the date he believed the Union lost its majority status, but did testify that replacement of a work force was "a pretty good indication" of this consequence. He was not, however, aware of a "conscious" management decision along the line until actually voiced by Counsel O'Brien on August 26.

Had Respondent proceeded with typical overt position-taking consistent with what its functionaries now testify was their belief, this case would have an entirely different complexion. The issue requires more searching attention, however, for this was not done, and the eventful period before and after May 1 was actually dominated by other considerations. As of April 9 the situation was a classic bargaining confrontation compounded by an employer's keen awareness that an effective strike at the facility would cripple its pipe-producing capacity. This was the critical danger facing Respondent as it adhered to an offer notwithstanding imminent strike action. By April 13 the plantwide strike necessitated a project of replacing the work force or seeking an accommodation through bargaining. The former course was chosen and from that point onward the mainstream of labor relations activity was to operate a plant, not necessarily negotiate a contract. In essence the last, best, and final offer had been, albeit in option form, just that, and the strike gauntlet was determinedly picked up. Tactically the first step was notification of intent to replace, with a short period for the Union to react. On other fronts the replacement hiring program was quickly structured and picket line activity anticipated. Notably Tappin made the expectable point that he kept Respondent's pipe division general manager and production manager informed of things,[8] and when Respondent chose to seek injunctive restraint against picket line interference with its hiring program, it was equipped to do so as early as April 27, when it secured a certain temporary restraining order.[9]

The significant point is that just as the Union had every right to commence the strike, Respondent, too, had the concomitant right to operate with replacements as long settled by Mackay Radio & Telegraph Co., 304 U.S. 333 (1938). Once the strike replacement program was underway the only significant dealings between the parties soon thereafter was the May 1 meeting, and here Respondent did nothing more actionable than adhere to its earlier bargaining position.[10] I recognize that Respondent seeks some advantage from remarks of Gable, which by crediting the testimony of Bird and Owens, I find to have been those of directly pressing for a reversal of the replacement hiring effort by restoring strikers to work. The fact that seniority provisions of the expired contract were looked to in justification of this request is immaterial, for the newly constituted work force was one that arose from a definite program of hiring permanent replacements for strikers. The newspaper advertisements prominently offered this characteristic, and I accept Garrett's uncontradicted testimony that it was explained with each person so hired. In an expired contract situation it is debatable that the former 45-day probationary period even applied to the replacements, but it can be conceded this particular character of such employment was in the nature of a condition subsequent to permanence. Thus, without any job or job-related dereliction, the individuals would achieve full status in terms of being the sort of replacements contemplated and authorized under Mackay Radio.

[8] Bird picked up this pattern of communication, testifying to daily contact with Pipe Division Production Manager G. C. Eggleston during all of May.

[9] On that date a courthouse conversation ensued between Bird and DeMattei, with the former quoting the latter as pining over loss of a local affiliate because of the "mess" occasioned even after the Company's "very good offer." DeMattei covered this exchange in his own testimony, recalling how he told Bird that Respondent had been grossly shortsighted in his overall economic package in a way amounting to bad-faith bargaining. I credit Bird respecting this episode, but find it inconsequential as establishing an objective basis to have doubt concerning the Union's majority, because the entire episode presents nothing more than DeMattei's wistful ruminations.

The critical change in complexion to this situation came with the RD petition, and I am satisfied that on the basis of what followed Respondent is correct in arguing that Telautograph controls here. Significantly no request for resumed bargaining was raised during the May-August period, and disposition of Case 32-CA-3594 left Respondent shown as free of unfair labor practice conduct. By the time the RD hearing occurred, there was really no other position to take than that voiced by Counsel O'Brien, for even under newly decided RCA Del Caribe, Inc., 262 NLRB 963 (1982), the overruling of Shea Chemical Corp., 121 NLRB 1027 (1958), in situations of competing unions, does not, in itself, create that much impact on an RD situation. The test here is not, as in traditional Mid-West Piping[11] and Shea Chemical situations, whether an employer should continue bargaining with one union in the face of a rival claim, but whether greater policy and institutional interests are served by fulfillment of direct, demystified procedures of an RD petition processed to completion. By late August, and more obviously by mid-September when Cain responded as he did to the health data requests, a crystallized situation was extant in that plant operations were at near-normal levels with an outside surplus group of employees retaining full rights of permanently replaced economic strikers.

Much is made of the fact that Telautograph has not been vigorously expanded in the years since it was decided; however, it is equally valid to note that the General Counsel may have found no previous vehicle to test its outer limits. Although Telautograph alluded to Shea Chemical, its "clarify[ing]" thrust was to obviate delays in "properly supported decertification petitions" when a violation-free environment was present. Notably in Traub's Market, 205 NLRB 787 (1973), former Chairman Miller enlarged on Telautograph by projecting its salutary purpose as allowing "prompt action" through "orderly election processes" and freeing a nonviolating employer from the "harassment" of an 8(a)(5) proceeding. This thrust was also found in special footnoted clarification by two members of a Board panel in Cantor Bros., Inc., 203 NLRB 774 (1973), who wrote of an employer "relieve[d]" of the duty to bargain with an incumbent labor organization when an adequately supported decertification petition was filed in a context free of employer unfair labor practices.[12] Such views fully harmonize with a now-discernible trend to "definitive results which are both predictable and speedy while incentive for protracted litigation is greatly reduced, as is the possibility of disagreement between the Board and the courts" as voiced in Midland National Life Insurance Co., 263 NLRB 127 (1982).

For these reasons I hold that Respondent's otherwise imperfect and premature good-faith doubt of the Union's continued majority status was erroneously lacking objectively based factors of proof, but that this free-floating smugness did not have actionable characteristics. To gloat is one thing and to act another, and here the Union idly permitted time to pass with the RD petition winding towards fulfillment while it relied exclusively on Case 32-CA-3594 to extricate it. When this failed a new policy reason for elevating the RD proceedings to a controlling plane had materialized. Absent the unfair labor practice of unlawfully withdrawing recognition, there could be no change in character to the strike, and I hold that it was not, as alleged, converted to an unfair labor practice strike on or about October 29 nor has it been prolonged by unlawful employer conduct of any kind.[13]

On the vacation pay issue of this case I am satisfied that the General Counsel has misplaced reliance on Vesuvius Crucible and related cases, for there the denial of fringe benefit pay by an employer was because employees went on strike or the holdings are clearly distinguishable on their facts.[14] This directly punitive objective is not [10] Immediately following that meeting Bird had posted a plantwide notice to employees reading:

> A meeting was held in Sacramento in the office of the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Services between the company and the union.
> The union demanded that the new employees be replaced by the strikers.
> The company rejected this demand in its entirety.

Contrary to assertions by the General Counsel and the Union, I consider this notification a privileged informational item that does not tend to establish animus or any other component of allegations, against Respondent.

[11] Midwest Piping & Supply Co., 63 NLRB 1060 (1945).

[12] This exact thought finds extension in dictum of Sahara-Tahoe Hotel v. NLRB, 648 F.2d 553, 556 (9th Cir. 1980), in which the court's opinion reads:

> Thus, the filing of a decertification petition with the requisite 30% showing alone might justify an employer's refusal to bargain with the union.

[13] It is questionable that a "top-down" declaration of strike characteristics as distributed by the Union on October 29 could in any event show an actual positive link to changed strike nature. This is particularly true when the claim is given stilted meaning, as embodied in the original charge in Case 32-CA-3594 in which, as filed May 5, the text of the Union's charge stated that from "its inception" the strike had been "to protest the employer's unfair labor practices." (Tr. 583.)

[14] Vesuvius Crucible was denied enforcement by the Third Circuit, 668 F.2d 162 (1981). In its reported opinion the court believed "the Board overstepped its authority and seriously misperceived its role," pointing out that the employer's refusal to accord disputed vacation pay to strikers was "reasonable and at least arguably correct."

present here. Similarly it does not assist Respondent to argue that numerous other individuals had not received vacation pay for earnings of the year in which they voluntarily or involuntarily terminated because strikers only withhold services; they do not terminate employment. This leads the analysis squarely to Great Dane, and without requisite evidence showing antiunion animus the question must be whether "inherently destructive" conduct has occurred, or even if "comparatively slight" impact on Section 7 rights are present, has the employer come forward with legitimate business justification. The situation lacks inherently destructive characteristics, for major strike action was anticipated, ratified, and commenced without even consideration of the factor. There is, of course, some impact on the strikers by withholding further vacation pay, for this tends to increase the economic pressure that might permit the strike to last longer than it otherwise might. Respondent, however, has explained, and satisfactorily so in my opinion, that its position is solely one of contract interpretation as to which it believes nothing further is due. I accept the legitimacy of this explanation, largely because of the very contract language itself. Fundamentally it is of ambiguous construction, particularly the key central language in which the entitled "calendar year" is qualified by the identical phrase "calendar year." It is a classic infirmity of composition when some meaning to a phrase is attempted by using that very same phrase, and the awkwardness, or worse, of this contractual passage is highlighted by the fact that the General Counsel could not even manage to accurately quote it, having left out the portion "in the calendar year" from the second sentence (G.C. br. at 8).[15] More specifically, the purpose of this fringe benefit is to provide respite from the rigors of steady year-round work, a condition no longer present for those who strike. I recognize that about 20 percent of all vacation pay granted even under the Respondent's view of 1981 eligibility was based on 1981 earnings of those astute enough to request it in advance. This is but a reflection of the inequities that can arise in a work setting, as with Lewis who in 1969 was bold enough to obtain what others similarly situated did not enjoy. In the last analysis, chosen language is a major controlling factor in a contract interpretation dispute,[16] and here the clause in question is so lacking in coherence that it may legitimately be resisted, without leading to a result whereby the action constitutes an unfair labor practice as opposed to rather crass rejection of a respectably arguable claim and relegation of the issue to other forums of contract dispute.

[16] The point is illustrated in an arbitral proceeding whereby an employer violated contract provisions stating that "employee's gross earnings for the 52 weeks prior to January 1 of the vacation year shall be the basis for computing vacation pay" by excluding a prior year's vacation pay in computing that fringe benefit for a current year. Although this employer had computed vacation pay in such a manner for 10 years, the contract language was clear and unambiguous, thus not permitting it to be overridden by extensive past practice in which that union had not acquiesced. *Huffman Mfg. Staff Builders Services, Inc. and Local 880, Service Employees International Union, AFL-CIO-CLC. Case 13-CA-27124

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

Upon a charge filed by the Union August 12, 1987, the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board issued a complaint September 11, 1987, against Staff Builders Services, the Respondent, alleging that it has violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act.

The complaint alleges that on December 10, 1986, following a Board election in Case 13-RC-16435, the Union was certified as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the Respondent's employees in the unit found appropriate. (Official notice is taken of the "record" in the representation proceeding as defined in the Board's Rules and Regulations, Secs. 102.68 and 102.69(g); Frontier Hotel, 265 NLRB 343 (1982).) The complaint further alleges that since June 3 and August 31, 1987,[1] the Company has refused to bargain with the Union, and since August 7, 1987, the Respondent has refused to provide the Union with requested information that is relevant and necessary for collective bargaining. On September 28, 1987, the Respondent filed its answer admitting in part and denying in part the allegations in the complaint and setting forth affirmative defenses.

On November 2, 1987, the General Counsel filed a Motion for Summary Judgment. On November 9, 1987, the Board issued an order transferring the proceeding to the Board and a Notice to Show Cause why the motion should not be granted. On December 15, 1987, the Respondent filed a response. On January 28, 1988, the Respondent filed an amendment to its answer.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

Ruling on Motion for Summary Judgment

The Respondent's answer attacks the validity of the Union's certification and amended certification on the basis that the Board lacks jurisdiction over it and that the Union is not a labor organization. We agree with the General Counsel.

The record, including the record in Case 13-RC-16435, reveals that a Decision and Direction of Election issued in Case 13-RC-16435 on May 10, 1984. On June 5, 1984, the Respondent timely filed a request for review of the Regional Director's Decision and Direction of Election, on the grounds that the Regional Director erred in finding (1) that the Board has jurisdiction over the Respondent, (2) that the United Laborers Union Local 880 was a labor organization "within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act"; (3) that the Certified Nursing Assistants (CNA) and Companions were not irregular or casual employees, (4) that the appropriate unit included all CNAs, and (5) that the unit was not limited to the Respondent's Chicago, Illinois facility.

On June 28, 1984, the Board granted the Respondent's request for review solely as to the Board's assertion of jurisdiction over the Respondent. On June 29, 1984, an election was held among the Respondent's unit employees and the ballots cast were impounded.

On June 30, 1986, the Board issued an Order remanding Case 13-RC-16435 to the Regional Director for further consideration of the jurisdictional issue consistent with Res-Care, Inc., 280 NLRB 670 (1986), and Long Stretch Youth Home, 280 NLRB 678 (1986). The record in Case 13-RC-16435 was reopened for submission of additional evidence and filing of briefs by the parties. On September 8, 1986, the Acting Regional Director issued a Supplemental Decision and Order adopting and reaffirming the May 10, 1984 decision and ordered that the ballots from the June 29, 1984 election be opened and that a tally of ballots be issued.

On September 22, 1986, the Employer timely filed with the Board a request for review. On November 19, 1986, the Board issued an order denying the request for review.

On December 2, 1986, the ballots cast August 17, 1984 in the election in Case 13-RC-16435 were opened and a tally of ballots issued. A majority of the valid ballots were cast for the Petitioner and on December 10, 1986, the Acting Regional Director issued a Certification of Representative.[2]

[1] Par. IX(b) of the complaint alleges that the Respondent refused to recognize and bargain with the Union since August 31, 1987, rather than August 7, 1987. In her Motion for Summary Judgment the General Counsel notes that the letter (attached to the motion) from the Respondent's attorney, R. Clay Bennett, to the Union refusing to bargain and to supply information is dated August 7, 1987. Therefore, the General Counsel states the complaint should have alleged that the Respondent refused to bargain on August 7, 1987. The Respondent raises no issue concerning the authenticity of the letter.

[2] United Labor Unions Local 880 (ULU) filed the petition in Case 13-RC-16435. However, on August 17, 1985, ULU conducted an election among its dues-paying members to determine whether the members wished to affiliate with the Service Employees International Union, AFL-CIO-CLC (SEIU). A majority of valid ballots were cast for affiliation, and the Union changed its name to Local 880, SEIU to reflect the affiliation. On December 1, 1986, ULU filed with the Regional Director a motion to change the name of Petitioner (in Case 13-RC-16435) on all

By letter dated June 1, 1987, the Union requested the Respondent to bargain. In its June 3, 1987 letter to the Union, the Respondent refused to recognize and bargain with the Union. On August 4, 1987, the Union sent the Respondent another letter in which it requested recognition and an opportunity to bargain and also requested the Respondent to furnish it with the following information:

> 1. A list of all active full-time and regular part-time chorehousekeepers, homemakers and other bargaining unit personnel including their date of hire, length of service, rate of pay, hours of work, and any and all information relating to wages, hours and working conditions.
> 2. Copies of all work rules, agreements employees are required to sign, management policies and procedures, disciplinary or grievance procedures and any or all policies that are relative to the workforce.

By letter dated August 7, 1987, and since that date, the Respondent has refused to provide the Union with the requested information or to bargain with the Union.[3]

The Respondent contends in its affirmative defenses to the complaint and in its opposition to the Motion for Summary Judgment that its refusal to bargain and to provide the Union with the requested information is justified by the invalid certification of the Union based on the Regional Director's erroneous findings that the Board has jurisdiction over the Respondent and that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of the Act and by the Acting Regional Director's erroneous amending of the Union's certification by substituting a different union's name for that of the Union. In addition, the Respondent raises for the first time affirmative defenses that contend special circumstances have arisen that affect the appropriateness of the bargaining unit and that previously unavailable evidence would be grounds for the Board to decline jurisdiction over the Respondent.

The Respondent alleges that since the hearing in Case 13-RC-16435 the duties of the contract representative have been fully merged into the coordinator and field supervisor positions and that these positions now have greater supervisory authority, including authority to hire, discipline, discharge, and direct employees, and to evaluate employees using independent judgment. This additional authority with which the coordinator and field supervisors are now endowed, the Respondent contends, are special (or unusual) circumstances that justify its failure to bargain with the Union. Assuming arguendo that the coordinator and field supervisors would be supervisors under Section 2(11) of the Act and no longer unit employees, such an occurrence would not constitute special or unusual circumstances within the meaning of Ray Brooks v. NLRB, 348 U.S. 96, 98–104 (1954), which would relieve the Respondent of its obligation to bargain with the Union.

The Respondent further alleges that since the hearing in the underlying representation case the Illinois Department on Aging (IDOA), a state agency and one of its three primary sources of income, has imposed a requirement that the Respondent expend a minimum of 73 percent of the IDOA reimbursement on direct service costs, i.e., wages and benefits paid to employees.[4] The Respondent contends that by this action significant control over the labor relations formerly exercised by the Respondent has been transferred to the IDOA and thus the Board should decline jurisdiction.

Assuming arguendo that the IDOA requires the Respondent to allocate a minimum of 73 percent of its IDOA reimbursement to employee wages and benefits, this would not deprive the Respondent of significant control over its labor relations. The Respondent would remain free to determine specific salary levels for all unit employees and could exceed the 73-percent requirement without IDOA restriction or approval. We find therefore that the existence of the IDOA requirement even considered with the other factors present here would not deprive the Respondent of significant control over its labor relations and would not be grounds for us to decline jurisdiction. See Community Living, 285 NLRB 312 (1987).[5] formal papers to its current name. On December 3, 1986, the Employer filed a response to the ULU's motion and on December 10, 1986, the Acting Regional Director issued an Order denying the motion. On March 31, 1987, the Union issued an Order denying the motion. On March 31, 1987, the Union filed a petition in Case 13-AC-56 to amend its certification in Case 13-RC-16435. On May 22, 1987, the Acting Regional Director issued a Decision and Amendment of Certification in Case 13-AC-56 and the certification in Case 13-RC-16435 was amended to substitute "Local 880, Service Employees, International Union, AFL-CIO-CLC" as the name of the Union. On June 4, 1987, the Respondent timely filed with the Board a request for review of that decision, which was denied by the Board on July 30, 1987.

[3] In its answer, the Respondent denies that the information requested is necessary for and relevant to the Union's performance of its function as exclusive representative of the unit employees. It is well established, however, that the employees' wage and employment information sought by the Union is presumptively relevant for purposes of collective bargaining and must be furnished on request. See, e.g., Mobay Chemical Corp., 233 NLRB 109 (1977). The Respondent has not attempted to rebut the relevance of the information requested by the Union. We therefore find that no material issues of fact exist regarding the Respondent's refusal to furnish the information sought by the Union.

[4] The alleged IDOA regulations would permit the Respondent to expend the remaining 27 percent at its discretion on administrative costs.

[5] Chairman Stephens notes that the Regional Director recognized in his Supplemental Decision and Order the pending status of the IDOA

It is well settled that in the absence of newly discovered and previously unavailable evidence or special circumstances, a respondent in a proceeding alleging a violation of Section 8(a)(5) is not entitled to relitigate issues that were or could have been litigated in a prior representation proceeding. See Pittsburgh Plate Glass Co. v. NLRB, 313 U.S. 146, 162 (1941); Secs. 102.67(f) and 102.69(c) of the Board's Rules and Regulations.

All issues raised by the Respondent were or could have been litigated in the prior representation proceeding. The Respondent does not offer to adduce at a hearing any newly discovered and previously unavailable evidence, nor does it allege any special circumstances that would require the Board to reexamine the decision made in the representation proceeding. We therefore find that the Respondent has not raised any issue that is properly litigable in this unfair labor practice proceeding. Accordingly, we grant the Motion for Summary Judgment.

On the entire record, the Board makes the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

The Company, a corporation, provides health care services at its facility in Chicago, Illinois, where, during the 12 months ending December 31, 1986, a representative period, the Respondent, in the course of its business operations, derived gross revenues in excess of $500,000 and purchased and received at its Chicago facility goods and materials valued in excess of $10,000 from other enterprises, located within the State of Illinois, each of which other enterprises are engaged in interstate commerce and meet the Board's jurisdictional standards. We find that the Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act and that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Certification

Following the election held June 29, 1984, the Union was certified December 10, 1986, as the collective-bargaining representative of the employees in the following appropriate unit:

> All full-time and regular part-time homemakers, chorehousekeepers, companions, certified nurses aides, contract representatives, and field supervisors employed by the Employer; excluding registered nurses, licensed practical nurses, casual employees, professional employees, technical employees, office clerical employees, Contracts Manager, Health Care Administrator, Home Health Care Coordinator, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act.

The Union continues to be the exclusive representative under Section 9(a) of the Act.

B. Refusal to Bargain

Since June 1, 1987, the Union has requested the Respondent to bargain, and since August 4, 1987, the Union has requested the Respondent to bargain and to supply it with information necessary and relevant to its function as the exclusive bargaining representative of the unit employees, since June 3 and August 7, 1987, the Respondent has refused to bargain, and since August 7, 1987, the Respondent has refused to supply the Union with the requested information. We find that this refusal constitutes an unlawful refusal to bargain in violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

By refusing on and after June 3 and August 7, 1987, to bargain with the Union as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of employees in the appropriate unit, and to supply it with the requested information necessary for and relevant to its function as the exclusive representative of unit employees, the Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) and Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

Having found that the Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act, we shall order it to cease and desist, to bargain on request with the Union, and, if an understanding is reached, to embody the understanding in a signed agreement. We shall also order the Respondent to provide the action at issue here, that the evidence proffered by the Respondent at this time was in fact "previously unavailable" within the meaning of Sec. 102.65(e)(1) of the Board's Rules and Regulations, and that in his view this evidence involves a matter of statutory jurisdiction. See his concurring and dissenting opinion in Res-Care, Inc., 280 NLRB 670, 675 and fn. 1 (1986). Thus, he would grant the Respondent's motion to reopen the record in the underlying representation proceeding. He also notes that the Respondent contends that the previously unavailable evidence is conclusive regarding the jurisdictional issue. On review of this evidence, and assuming its reliability, the Chairman finds, as before, no basis in the record to conclude that the Respondent is exempt from the Board's jurisdiction.

Union the information it requested on August 4, 1987.

To ensure that the employees are accorded the services of their selected bargaining agent for the period provided by law, we shall construe the initial period of the certification as beginning the date the Respondent begins to bargain in good faith with the Union. Mar-Jac Poultry Co., 136 NLRB 785 (1962); Lamar Hotel, 140 NLRB 226, 229 (1962), enfd. 328 F.2d 600 (5th Cir. 1964), cert. denied 379 U.S. 817 (1964); Burnett Construction Co., 149 NLRB 1419, 1421 (1964), enfd. 350 F.2d 57 (10th Cir. 1965).

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, Staff Builders Services, Inc., Chicago, Illinois, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Refusing to bargain with Local 880, Service Employees International Union, AFL–CIO–CLC as the exclusive bargaining representative of the employees in the bargaining unit.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On August 4, 1987, Administrative Law Judge James F. Morton issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief and the General Counsel filed cross-exceptions and a supporting and answering brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order as modified.[2]

We agree with the judge's conclusions that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) by failing to supply the Union with financial information the Union had requested and by failing to bargain generally in good faith with the Union. In so doing, we agree with the judge's finding that the Respondent claimed an inability, rather than an unwillingness, to meet the Union's economic demands and thereby became obligated to support this claim by providing the Union with the supporting financial data the Union had requested. In this regard, we note that the Union presented its economic proposals to the Respondent at the parties' first bargaining session on March 3, 1986.[3] Thereafter, the Respondent's negotiator, Cole, responded to that proposal at the parties' third bargaining session on March 27 by reading aloud a prepared statement of the Respondent's position. As more fully set forth in the judge's decision, the statement indicated, inter alia, that the Respondent was engaged in "a highly competitive industry and large profits per piece are practically non-existent." The statement characterized the Union's demands as the sort that "would make any company in this industry unprofitable," and suggested that the Union "withdraw all of your demands from the table and come back with a new set of demands which take into account a wage freeze." Cole, in reading the statement, further indicated that the next bargaining session scheduled for March 31 was canceled as nothing could be accomplished "until after you have removed these outrageous demands . . . and begun to negotiate in a more reasonable fashion." After reading this statement, Cole presented the Respondent's economic proposal, which called for, inter alia, a 3-year wage freeze, the discontinuance of the 3 days per year personal leave, and the freezing of the Respondent's contributions to medical coverage at the then-current level. The Union's negotiator, Perez, responded that he would be able to go along with the freeze proposal provided that the Respondent produced its books and records justifying this type of proposal. Cole denied the request.

Thereafter, there was a 3-month hiatus in bargaining. Bargaining resumed, and at the fifth bargaining session on July 23, the Respondent presented new economic proposals. The new proposals included, inter alia, a wage increase of 1 percent per year for employees with 1 year seniority. Perez, in response, told Cole "you got to be kidding me" and Cole said "no . . . this is a legitimate offer, that this was more than the company could afford." Perez again requested the Respondent's books and records and Cole again denied the request.

Based on the above, we find that the Respondent claimed an inability to meet the Union's economic demands and was therefore obligated to supply the Union with the requested financial data to support that claim. In so doing, we note that an inability to pay need not be expressed with any particular "magic words" so long as the words and conduct are specific enough to convey such a meaning. Atlanta Hilton & Tower, 271 NLRB 1600, 1602 (1984); Monarch Machine Tool Co., 227 NLRB 1265 (1977). See also Nielsen Lithographing Co., 279 NLRB 877 (1986). We find that the Respondent's conduct and statements, noted above, are tantamount to a claimed inability to pay. We particularly note that the representations in the Respondent's prepared statement must be read in the context of Cole's later characterization of the Respondent's economic offer, which was less costly than that proposed by the Union, as being "more than the company could afford." Accordingly, we agree with the judge that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) by failing to provide the Union with the financial data it requested.

[1] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[2] The judge inadvertently omitted reference to the unlawful discharge of Diego Fernandez and the unlawful suspension of Rolando Fernandez from the expunction provision of his recommended Order. We shall modify the provision accordingly.

The General Counsel has requested a visitatorial provision authorizing the Board, for compliance purposes, to obtain discovery from the Respondent under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure subject to the supervision of the U.S. court of appeals enforcing the Order. In the circumstances of this case, we find it unnecessary to include such a clause. See Cherokee Marine Terminal, 287 NLRB 1080 (1988).

As noted, we further agree with the judge's finding that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) by failing to bargain generally in good faith with the Union. In this regard, applying the criteria set out in Atlanta Hilton & Tower, supra, we conclude that the totality of the Respondent's conduct throughout the course of its bargaining evidences an intent to frustrate the bargaining process rather than a sincere purpose to reach agreement. See also Houston Country Electric Cooperative, 285 NLRB 1213 (1987). Thus, we note particularly the discriminatory warnings issued to all employee-members of the negotiating committee and the discriminatory treatment of union activists Diego and Rolando Fernandez. We further note that at the bargaining session of March 27, the Respondent's negotiator, Cole, canceled the next scheduled bargaining session and conditioned further bargaining on the Union's withdrawal of its demands. Finally, as set forth above, the Respondent refused to provide relevant financial data despite a claimed inability to meet the Union's demands. We conclude that by the above conduct the Respondent evidenced an intent to frustrate the bargaining process and failed to meet its obligation to bargain in good faith with the Union.[4]

The General Counsel has excepted to the judge's failure to include in his recommended Order a provision extending the Union's certification year for a 1-year period. We find merit in this exception. It is well established that when a party refuses to bargain during the certification year, the Board will extend the certification year to prevent that party from gaining an advantage from its failure to fulfill its bargaining obligation, and the extension normally given is for the period that will provide the aggrieved party with a full year of actual bargaining. See generally Colfor, Inc., 282 NLRB 1173 (1987), enfd. 838 F.2d 164 (6th Cir. 1987); Golmac Plastics, 234 NLRB 1309 fn. 4 (1978), remanded 592 F.2d 94 (2d Cir. 1979), enfd. per curiam 600 F.2d 3 (2d Cir. 1979). In the present case the record shows that the Respondent was engaged in overall bad-faith bargaining essentially from the outset of the certification year. We therefore find it appropriate to extend the certification year for a 1-year period running from the date that the Respondent begins to bargain in good faith. We shall modify the judge's recommended Order accordingly.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge as modified below and orders that the Respondent, Lustrelon, Inc., Edgewater, New Jersey, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order as modified.

1. Substitute the following for paragraph 2(c).

"(c) On request, bargain in good faith with the Union as the exclusive bargaining representative of the employees in the following appropriate unit on terms and conditions of employment and, if an understanding is reached, embody it in a signed agreement. The Union's certification year shall extend 1 year from the date that such good-faith bargaining begins. The appropriate unit is:

> All production and maintenance employees, including shipping and receiving employees, but excluding all office employees, clerical employees, administrative employees, executives, guards, maintenance men, professional employees, supervisors as defined in the Act and all other employees of Respondent."

2. Substitute the following for paragraph 2(d).

"(d) On request, provide the Union with the financial data it requested to enable it to verify the Respondent's assertion that it was financially unable to meet the Union's bargaining demands."

3. Substitute the following for paragraph 2(e).

"(e) Remove from its files any reference to warnings given employees on SOLO's bargaining committee and to the separate warnings given Diego and Rolando Fernandez and all references to the unlawful discharge of Diego Fernandez and to the unlawful suspension of Rolando Fernandez, and notify all these employees in writing that this has been done and that evidence of the unlawful acts will not be used against them in any way."

4. Substitute the attached notice for that of the administrative law judge.

CHAIRMAN STEPHENS, dissenting in part.

I would find all the violations found by my colleagues with the exception of the refusal-to-produce-information violation and the overall surface bargaining violation. I recognize this to be a very close case, and I agree that there is no one set of "magic words" through which a claim of inability to pay might be expressed; but I cannot conclude that, in context, the particular expressions on which my colleagues rely amount to such a claim. Without that violation, I would not find that the Respondent's conduct amounted to overall surface bargaining, i.e., an intent not to reach an agreement.

[4] In these circumstances, we find it unnecessary to pass on the judge's finding that the Respondent's proposals were of a regressive nature or to rely on his citation to Reichhold Chemicals, 277 NLRB 639 (1985). But see Reichhold Chemicals, 288 NLRB 69 (1988).

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

JAMES F. MORTON, Administrative Law Judge. The complaint in these cases, which were consolidated for hearing, alleges that Lustrelon, Inc. (Respondent) has violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), (4), and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act). Respondent's answer denies these and also the underlying factual allegations. The specific issues raised in the pleadings are whether Respondent (1) issued warnings to employees and discharged two of them because of their union activities, (2) discharged one of those employees also because he said he would file an unfair labor practice charge, and (3) refused to bargain collectively with Solidarity of Labor Organizations International Union (SOLO).

The hearing was held in Newark, New Jersey, on 2 and 3 March 1987. On the entire record, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and after due consideration of the briefs filed by the General Counsel and Respondent, I make the following

I. JURISDICTION AND LABOR ORGANIZATION STATUS

The pleadings establish, and I find, that Respondent manufactures lamps, and that in its operations annually it meets the Board's nonretail jurisdictional standard. I also find, based on the fact that SOLO had been certified in Case 22-RC-9536 as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative for Respondent's production and maintenance employees, that SOLO is a labor organization as defined in Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background

About 350 production and maintenance employees are employed by Respondent at its plant in Edgewater, New Jersey. Until January 1986, they had been represented for many years by a labor organization, referred to in the record in this case as Local 298. One of the General Counsel's witnesses, alleged discriminatee Rolando Fernandez, testified that Respondent's plant manager had, about 1984, spoken to him about his becoming a Local 298 delegate and that Fernandez then became the delegate.

The last contract negotiated by Respondent and Local 298 became effective in 1983, for a 3-year term. About the same time, new owners took over Respondent's business. In late 1985, SOLO petitioned for an election in Case 22-RC-9536, seeking to replace Local 298 as bargaining agent. Diego Fernandez, one of the alleged discriminatees in this case, testified without contradiction that he was one of the original and most active supporters of SOLO and that he had been told, during the course of SOLO's organizational effort by two of Respondent's supervisors, Joe Violante and Pasquale Rose, that he and the other SOLO supporters were wasting their time as Respondent has always done pretty much what it wanted to do. In its answer, Respondent admitted that Joe Violante and Pasquale Rose are supervisors and its agents. The statements attributed to them by Diego Fernandez had been made more than 6 months before the first unfair labor practice charge in this case was filed and are not alleged as independent violations of the Act.

An election was held on 10 January 1986 pursuant to an agreement of the parties approved by the Regional Director of Region 22. SOLO won and, as noted above, was certified on 22 January 1986 as exclusive representative of Respondent's production and maintenance employees. All dates hereafter are for 1986 unless stated differently.

B. Warnings Given to Employees on SOLO's Negotiating Committee

After SOLO's certification as representative, its president, Edmundo Perez, and Respondent's attorney, Larry Cole, agreed to hold the first negotiation session on 3 March. Cole also agreed to Perez' request that Respondent release five employees from work to assist him in the negotiations. Perez agreed that when they were finished on 3 March these employees would return to work. They were not to be paid by Respondent while serving on SOLO's committee.

The first session was held on 3 March at a Holiday Inn near Respondent's plant. Cole and Respondent's vice president, Walter Weil, were present for Respondent; Perez, assisted by the employee committee, negotiated for SOLO. The negotiations were in English. Perez translated them into Spanish for the benefit of the employees of SOLO's negotiating committee. As discussed further below, SOLO presented its economic and other demands. One of the alleged discriminatees, Diego Fernandez, served on the negotiating committee. He brought up, through Perez, safety issues for discussion at the session. Respondent agreed to set up with SOLO a safety committee and that provision therefor would be included in a collective-bargaining agreement, "subject to language." The meeting ended about noon. The members of SOLO's committee did not return to work then, but stayed with Perez to discuss the negotiations and to prepare for the next session.

Perez testified without contradiction that later on 3 March, Cole telephoned him to state that he thought the employees would be returning to work that day. Perez informed Cole that he was reviewing proposals with the employees to see how flexible SOLO would be in subsequent sessions.

Negotiations resumed on 13 March. The meeting between Respondent's representatives, Weil and Cole, with SOLO's president, Perez, and the employee committee ended that day before noontime. Perez then told Weil and Cole that the employees on SOLO's negotiating committee would remain with him to review the progress of the negotiations. The parties agreed on 13 March to meet again on 27 and 31 March. The employees on the committee stayed with Perez on the afternoon of 13 March and did not return to work.

The parties met again on 27 March. As discussed in further detail below in another section, Respondent had on 27 March proposed a 3-year wage freeze, informed SOLO that there was no reason to meet on 31 March as earlier scheduled, and that it was canceling that session. Respondent informed SOLO that it expected SOLO will take into account Respondent's demand for a wage freeze. Perez asked for financial data, as discussed in further detail below, and his request was denied. The meeting ended about noontime. Again, the employees on SOLO's committee remained with Perez and did not return to work. No further sessions were scheduled or held until 27 June. SOLO and Respondent exchanged correspondence respecting SOLO's request for financial data.

On 16 May, alleged discriminatee Diego Fernandez was given a written warning by his immediate supervisor and was asked to sign it. The warning was for excessive absenteeism. He refused to sign the warning as, in his view, the dates on which he was absent from work were dates on which he had been excused from work, either because he was participating in negotiations as a member of SOLO's committee or because he was receiving medical treatment. Fernandez wrote Respondent that same day to protest the warning, asserting in his letter that the warning was nothing more than harassment because of his activities on behalf of SOLO. He noted in that letter that 4 of the days cited in the warning were spent on contract negotiations. There is no evidence that he received a response to his letter.

The General Counsel called Vice President Walter Weil as a witness. He testified that Diego Fernandez and the other employees on SOLO's negotiating committee were issued warnings for absenteeism for the days they attended bargaining sessions and that he authorized the issuance of those warnings because he had understood that those employees were to return to work at the end of each meeting.

On 20 October, Respondent's attorney, Cole, wrote SOLO's president a letter, reading in relevant part as follows:

> Some time ago you filed an unfair labor charge with the National Labor Relations Board which alleged in part that written warnings for attendance had been given to members of your Committee. These warnings included days that the Committee was negotiating. You may recall that the individuals concerned did not return to work in the afternoons > of the negotiating sessions despite the fact that the sessions had concluded in the morning. Since the appropriateness of the warning was not clear, the warnings were removed from the files of the Committee members unilaterally by the Company. Apparently you were never notified of this.

> Please be advised that warnings have been removed and no action has been taken based upon absences on the days that the Committee was negotiating and that the Committee members were present at the negotiations.

None of the employees who served on SOLO's committee and who received warnings, as Weil testified, were ever notified by Respondent that those warnings had been removed from their personnel files or that the warnings were rescinded.

The evidence presented by the General Counsel establishes prima facie that Diego Fernandez and other employees on SOLO's negotiating committee were issued written warnings to discourage their support for SOLO. The warnings were not issued until after the negotiations between SOLO and Respondent had become badly strained. They were issued without prior notice to the employees or to SOLO's president. They were issued at Vice President Weil's direction, notwithstanding that he was one of the two principal negotiators for Respondent and was aware that the employees on the committee were with Perez and that Respondent had not on any of those days indicated to Perez that the employees on SOLO's committee were subject to discipline. The inference to be drawn from all the evidence before me is that Weil was sending SOLO a clear message by these warnings that its insistence on financial data and its overall bargaining position were not to Respondent's liking. Respondent thus had issued these warnings because these employees supported SOLO. Respondent suggests that the warnings were issued because of a misunderstanding and notes that, in any event, it notified SOLO in substance that they would not be given effect.

In Hanlon & Wilson Co., 267 NLRB 1264 (1983), the Board adopted a finding that the employer there had unlawfully rejected doctors' excuses proffered by an employee to justify his absences from work. In the instant case, Respondent took no action against these employees until it became clear that SOLO was not going to abandon its demand for financial data. Respondent's actions in issuing the warnings were a reversal of its earlier decision to go along with Perez' keeping the SOLO committee members with him after the conclusion of the meetings with Respondent's representatives. In effect, Respondent was rejecting its earlier excusals. In sum, Respondent's actions in warning these employees were not oversights. Nor are they to be excused on the basis of Cole's letter to Perez in October. That recantation, if it could be called that, was not timely, clear, or specific; it contained no assurances and was not sent to any of the employees. It did not begin to meet the test referred to in Passavant Memorial Area Hospital, 237 NLRB 138 (1978), to constitute an effective disavowal. See also Hollander Home Fashion Corp., 255 NLRB 1098 at fn. 3 (1981).

C. Warning Issued to, and Discharge of, Diego Fernandez on 23 May

The General Counsel alleges that Respondent, on 23 May, issued a warning to Diego Fernandez in order to discourage him from continuing his support of SOLO and discharged him that same day because he continued his support of SOLO and also because he advised Respondent of his intent to file an unfair labor practice charge with the Board. Respondent denies these allegations and asserts that it discharged Diego Fernandez solely because he punched in another employee's timecard.

Diego Fernandez began working for Respondent in August 1980. He was employed as a machine operator at the time of his discharge, about 23 May 1986.

The uncontroverted testimony establishes that he was an active, perhaps the most active, supporter of SOLO among Respondent's employees. Thus, he participated in its organizational effort, having distributed 30 to 40 authorization cards to his coworkers; he attended SOLO's meetings; he was told, as earlier noted, by two of Respondent's supervisors that he and other SOLO supporters were wasting their time because Respondent would continue to have its own way; and he was a member of SOLO's employee committee, participating actively at the negotiation sessions.

He arrived at work about 7:15 a.m. on his last day of work and was accompanied then by his brother Rolando. As they approached the timeclock, Respondent's plant manager, Rafael Ricciardi, was standing about 10 to 15 feet from it and was looking at them while talking to Supervisor Guiseppe (Joe) Violante. As work was scheduled to start 15 minutes later, Rolando Fernandez went for coffee for himself and Diego. Diego then punched in his own timecard and also Rolando's.

The foregoing factual recited is based on the accounts of Diego Fernandez and Joe Violante. Their respective accounts differ as to what occurred after Diego Fernandez had punched in the timecards.

Diego Fernandez' account is as follows. Later on that morning, his immediate supervisor, Pasquale Rose, approached him while at work and informed him that he would have to sign a warning that was being given him for having punched in his brother's timecard. Diego Fernandez (Diego, to distinguish him from his brother, Rolando) responded that he would not sign the warning as he had not done anything out of the ordinary when he punched in his brother's card. Suddenly, Joe Violante appeared and told Diego to come to the office with him. Diego did so. They went to Plant Manager Ricciardi's office. Ricciardi asked Diego why he punched Rolando's card. Diego responded that, what he did, he had done many times and that his brother was in the plant with him. Diego then told Ricciardi that if "they" continued to harass him, he would go "to the U.S. Labor Department (to) complain." Ricciardi became angry and discharged him.

Diego Fernandez also testified that he had never been told of any rule against punching in another employee's timecard and that there never had been any sign posted that pertained to any such rule. He related too that he had, on prior occasions, punched in his brother's card in the presence of Respondent's supervisors, and that they had never said anything to him about his having done so.

Guiseppe Violante's account of the events of that day is as follows. He and Plant Manager Ricciardi were standing near the timeclock. Ricciardi was facing the clock; Violante was standing with his back to it. Ricciardi told him that Diego had just punched in two timecards. Violante then saw Diego put his own card and also his brother's card in the rack. He asked Diego why he punched in two cards; he told Diego that he knows the rule that anyone caught punching in two cards would be fired on the spot. Violante then went to see Ricciardi as he understood that all disciplinary action is to be done through the main office. Diego was then called to the office and given the option of quitting or of being fired.

Violante also testified that ever since he began working for Respondent 16 years previously and until about March 1986 there had been a sign posted over the timeclock, which reminded employees that if any employee is caught punching in another employee's timecard, the penalty is immediate dismissal. He testified also that on the day that Diego was fired the one sign posted was one reading: "Punch your timecard only."

On further examination, Violante testified that he had fired Diego on the spot about 7 a.m. and that, later (about 8 a.m.), when he told Ricciardi that he had done so, Ricciardi instructed him to bring Diego to his office to sign a release. Violante testified that Ricciardi wanted the release because Diego had supported SOLO.

Ricciardi did not testify; neither did Respondent's supervisor-foremen, Pasquale Rose.

I credit Diego Fernandez' account. Violante's account was hardly persuasive. It is unlikely that he fired Diego "on the spot" and also that Diego was brought to Ricciardi's office, well after the workday had begun, to sign a release. Further, Violante's testimony that Ricciardi wanted Diego to sign a "release" is too vague and also illogical in that Ricciardi would have no reason to think that Diego would gratuitously accommodate him in releasing Respondent from all liability arising out of his discharge. Moreover, it is very unlikely, as Violante's testimony would have it, that Diego and Rolando Fernandez would have flagrantly disregarded an established rule calling for immediate discharge; it is implausible that Diego would have punched in Rolando's card in the presence of a plant manager with knowledge that he would thereby lose a job he has had for almost 6 years. Lastly, I note that Ricciardi did not testify to controvert Diego's testimony that Ricciardi discharged him when he said he would go the U.S. Labor Department to stop the harassment.

The credited evidence establishes that Diego Fernandez was an active supporter of SOLO; that Respondent was aware of his support of SOLO; that there never was a posting or other promulgation of any rule barring one employee from punching in the timecard of another employee solely as a convenience;[1] that Respondent conjured up a "rule" as a pretext to issue a warning to Diego Fernandez on 23 May in order to harass him because he supported SOLO, and particularly SOLO's negotiating demands; and that when Diego Fernandez made it clear to Ricciardi that he was not intimidated by that warning, but would protest the harassment, Ricciardi discharged him.

A separate issue exists whether the evidence supports a finding that Diego Fernandez was discharged also for a reason proscribed in Section 8(a)(4) of the Act. The complaint alleges that he was fired because he informed Respondent that he intended to file unfair labor practice charges with the Board. As just found, Diego protested on 23 May that if Respondent continued in its "behavior towards [him]" he "was going to go to the U.S. Labor Department and complain what they were doing to [him]." The most obvious thing to note, respecting his remark, is that the National Labor Relations Board is the agency responsible for investigating complaints by employees of harassment based on union activities. Also noteworthy is that the Board, only a few months before his discharge, had conducted an election among Respondent's employees and certified SOLO. Lastly, I note that the Board affirmed a finding by Administrative Law Judge Edelman, in a case with a similar fact pattern, that a Spanish-speaking employee's use of the term, "Labor Department" pertained to the Board. See Book Covers, Inc., 276 NLRB 1488 (1985). Also, the Supreme Court has held that Section 8(a)(4) is not to be read literally but is to be construed liberally in order to afford employees broad protection. See NLRB v. AA Electric Co., 405 U.S. 117, 122 (1972). All these factors support the finding, which I now make, that Diego Fernandez was discharged because he informed Respondent, in essence, that he intended to file an unfair labor practice charge with the Board to stop Respondent's unlawful harassment of him.

D. Warning and Suspension of Rolando Fernandez

Rolando Fernandez (Rolando) began working for Respondent over 5-1/2 years ago. He is the most senior employee in the acid department. He had distributed authorization cards for SOLO during its organizational effort and did so although he was then a delegate for a rival labor organization, as related above. A picture of a SOLO committee, which included Rolando, was published in a Hispanic newspaper. Vice President Walter Weil was given a copy of this newspaper at a negotiating session on 13 March. Weil saw the photo then and acknowledged that Rolando was an active supporter of SOLO.

Rolando was not disciplined by Respondent on 23 May, the day his brother was issued a warning and was discharged, as discussed above. On 29 May, Rolando was issued a warning. The General Counsel contends that the reason given by Respondent is baseless and that the warning was intended to discourage his support for

[1] Respondent adduced evidence that, in prior years, two employees had been discharged for incidents involving timecards. One of those employees had punched in the card of another employee who was absent from work that day; another had altered his own card. Those incidents do not establish that Respondent had a practice or rule requiring immediate discharge for punching in a card as was done in the instant case.

SOLO and to provide an excuse for Respondent to suspend him from work for a week, also to discourage support for SOLO. Respondent asserts that the discipline meted out to Rolando on 29 May was unrelated to his union activities.

Rolando's job in the acid department required him to remove parts that were submerged in an acid bath, rinse them in a water bath, shake off the excess liquid, and then to take these parts to his machine for processing. As the acid used is highly corrosive, the workers in that department wear protective clothing—rubber aprons, rubber gloves, and so on. Rolando, as the senior employee, trained new employees in that department.

Rolando's account of the events on 29 May is as follows. He was performing his job that day in a routine manner. His foreman, Joe Cirone, and Vice President Weil were standing about 10 feet from him. Cirone called out to him that he was spilling water on the floor. He responded that "this is not correct" and he told Cirone that he is the oldest employee there and is always careful, and that "the liquid doesn't spill." (It appears that the job involves minor dripping, hence the protective clothing. I construe the translations of Rolando's account, as they are quoted above, as his saying in effect that the dripping then was no more than normal.) Later that morning, Violante told him he was fired, and that it was not "his order." Violante told him to go with him to the office. He accompanied Violante to the office. Weil was there with an office employee. Rolando was told then that he was not going to be fired but was given a week's suspension. He was suspended a week. Later he volunteered to SOLO to be his brother's replacement on SOLO's negotiating committee and was present at the next two sessions—the one on 27 June and a later one.

As noted above, Violante testified in this case. However, he did not refer to the 29 May incident in his testimony. Supervisor-Foreman Cirone did not testify. Vice President Weil did end his account of the 29 May incident as follows. He was standing with Foreman Joe Cirone and observed Rolando take a piece out of the cleaning tray in such a way that the liquid ran onto the floor in "a nice, big flow." Weil told Cirone to tell Rolando to let the pieces drip properly. Cirone did so. A minute later Rolando again caused a spill. He did "the exact same thing just as if he were trying to be spiteful." Weil told Cirone to give him a warning. Cirone did so. Later, Cirone informed Weil that the warning he gave to Fernandez was his third and that he was due to be fired. Weil called Respondent's labor counsel and then decided on a 1-week suspension for Fernandez.

Other than what Weil testified to, there is no evidence in the record to indicate that Respondent had a policy of discharging employees summarily on the third warning. Nor is there evidence that Rolando had prior warnings, other than a notation to that effect on the 29 May written warning itself.

I credit Rolando Fernandez' account. While it may be possible, it is unlikely that an experienced employee wearing clothing to protect himself against a corrosive acid would splash it about. I note too that Supervisor-Foreman Cirone did not testify to challenge Rolando's account. In view of Rolando's support for SOLO, of which Respondent was aware, the pretextual nature of the warning given him and the union animus fairly to be inferred from it, and in view of the discrimination practiced less than a week before against Diego Fernandez and the other evidence bearing on that finding, I find that the General Counsel has made out a prima facie showing that Rolando Fernandez, a known supporter of SOLO, was disciplined on 29 May because of that support. As Respondent has not presented any probative evidence to negate this prima facie showing, I find that Respondent warned Rolando Fernandez on 29 May and then suspended him from its employ for a week in order to discourage him from supporting SOLO. See Industrial Agrico Processing, 274 NLRB 711 at fn. 2 (1985), for an analogous holding.

E. Alleged Unlawful Refusal to Bargain

The complaint alleges that Respondent has separately violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act by having engaged in each of four types of conduct and also by its overall conduct. Specifically, the complaint cites the following acts as distinct violations; canceling meetings and refusing to meet unless SOLO accepted Respondent's demands or because SOLO had filed an unfair labor practice charge; unilaterally changing terms of employment of unit employees; failure to furnish requested financial data; having issued warnings to employees on SOLO's negotiating committee; and its overall conduct. In the brief filed with me, the General Counsel set out four points of argument that pertained to the alleged violations of Section 8(a)(1) and (5)—the alleged unlawful refusal to provide financial data; "surface bargaining," the alleged refusal to meet because SOLO filed an unfair labor practice charge; and alleged unlawful unilateral changes in the employees' workweek. Respondent asserts it never claimed inability to pay and hence contends that it was under no duty to furnish SOLO with financial data. It contends too that it engaged in "hard," not "surface" bargaining. It denies having unilaterally changed the workweek or refused to meet because SOLO filed unfair labor practice charges or otherwise.

As noted above, the first negotiation session took place on 3 March at which SOLO presented Respondent with its demands that were framed as modifications of or additions to provisions of the last collective-bargaining agreement between Respondent and Local 298. For example, three additional holidays were sought as were a $1 yearly increase in the hourly wage rate (as contrasted to 20 cents in the last year of the Local 298 contract), and a pension fund contribution where there had been none previously. In addition, ventilation, heating, and sanitary issues were raised by SOLO. Respondent took those demands under consideration and agreed to meet again.

The second session took place 10 days later. Respondent's representative reported that the complaint SOLO had raised as to the facilities in the women's bathrooms in the plant had been taken care of. Agreement was reached on the substance of a safety committee. As to a question raised by SOLO concerning certain layoffs, Respondent produced a computerized employee list to satisfy SOLO that the layoff procedure it followed was correct. Respondent's representative stated also that in the absence of a new collective-bargaining agreement between SOLO and Respondent it intended to follow the provisions of its Local 298. The session ended with agreement on two more meeting dates, 27 and 31 March.

On 27 March, only Attorney Cole appeared for Respondent. He read a prepared statement. Its text follows:

> As you can see, I am alone here at this negotiating session. There is no one from the Company here today. Mr. Gruodis has returned from his recent trip to the Far East and has reviewed your demands over the life of the three year agreement. The total cost to Lustrelon of your current demands is $11,319,075. The wage increases demanded alone are $4,992,000. The medical and dental coverages demanded are $2,376,000. Given the enormity of these demands, it was felt that no constructive purpose would be served by having Company officials here at this meeting.
> We believe that SOLO does not understand the industry that Lustrelon operates in. The industry itself is a highly competitive industry and large profits per piece are practically non-existent.
> While many of our employees have skills that are important to us, there are many other people not employed by our Company who can work for us to the same degree of efficiency. The wages and increases that you have demanded in this contract would make any company in this industry unprofitable.
> We respect our workers who respect us. We furnish considerable work for a great many people. Solo has come into this negotiation after an election campaign where you raised the people's expectation levels so high that this Company will not capitulate to your demands.
> Lustrelon suggests that SOLO go back to the people and tell them that the Company will not meet their demands. I have here a set of demands that we have prepared that we believe to be more reasonable than yours. We request that you take these demands back to the people and discuss the realities of our business with them. We suggest further that you withdraw all of your demands from the table and come back with a new set of demands that take into account a wage freeze.
> We had previously agreed with you that we would negotiate in our next negotiating session on Monday, March 31, 1986. We believe that nothing can come out of this next meeting until after you have removed these outrageous demands of yours from the table and begun to negotiate in a more reasonable fashion. We, therefore, wish to cancel this meeting for Monday. We will be happy to return to the negotiating table after you have presented us with a new set of written demands that we can study. We will presume that these demands will be reasonable and will take into account the wage freeze and other items that have been discussed in the Company's demands.

Cole then handed SOLO's president, Perez, the following set of demands, which were referred to in the above statement:

> 1. Open Shop Provision.
> 2. Wage Freeze for three year collective bargaining agreement.
> 3. Eliminate three personal days currently in force.
> 4. Company contribution to medical coverages to be frozen at current level. Any increases in cost for individual or family membership shall be paid for by the employee.
> 5. Regular monthly meetings with groups of employees to discuss quality and productivity improvement and methods of improvement of working conditions and employees' suggestions. Union present if desired by SOLO.
> 6. In order to eliminate vandalism and theft from Company, the Company demands the right to conduct random searches of any employee automobiles on premises.
> 7. All vans shall not be permitted entry to the Company premises. Any employees traveling by vans shall be discharged at the guard check.
> 8. All union demands not previously agreed to are denied.

Regarding item 8, the only proposal by SOLO that may be said to have been previously agreed to by Respondent was to its proposal that a safety committee be established; Respondent agreed "subject to contract language."

When Cole concluded his reading of the prepared statement on 27 March, Perez translated his remarks into Spanish for the benefit of the employees on SOLO's committee. Perez then told Cole that he would be willing to go along with the freeze proposal provided Respondent produced its books and records to enable Perez to "justify to [the employees] the reason for this type of proposal." Cole denied the request. There is a conflict whether Cole elaborated on that response. Perez testified that Cole then said that there was no need to substantiate Respondent's denial for a wage freeze as the employees were "standing around doing nothing." Cole testified that he simply denied the request and did not say anything further because he did not want to go beyond the language of the typed statement he had just read. Cole denied that he told Perez that he could verify the need for a freeze simply by noting that the employees had nothing to do. I credit Cole's account as it is unlikely that he, having prepared a written statement to read at the session with no other representative for Respondent present to assist, would have made the off-hand comment attributed to him by Perez. Perez testified that he and Cole then discussed an impending layoff or a "shutdown of some sort." Cole, however, testified that he limited his discussion on 27 March to the statement he had prepared and read. Perez' account of a "shutdown of some sort" is too vague for what seems to be a subject of some importance, a plant shutdown. Perez' account is not persuasive. I credit Cole's.

There was no meeting held on 31 March. Letters were exchanged between Perez and Cole, which essentially restated their respective positions, as set forth on 27 March. Cole wrote Perez on 11 June to state that SOLO has yet to submit revised proposals and that Respondent would meet with SOLO when it was ready to resume negotiations with revised demands. Perez then called Cole and they set up a meeting for 27 June. In that telephone conversation, Perez told Cole that the employees had informed him that Respondent had introduced a 4-day workweek. Cole responded that he knew nothing about this and that Respondent would give Perez its position on it at the next session.

On 27 June, Perez presented Cole with a set of reduced proposals, e.g., a 50-cent hourly wage increase each year instead of a $1 increase; 7 sick days instead of 10. Perez testified that he then referred to the subject of the 4-day workweek. His account is as follows. He told Cole that he understood Cole to have said, at the outset of negotiations, that Respondent would follow the terms of the expired Local 298 contract until agreement on a contract was reached with SOLO. Perez then pointed out that the Local 298 contract provided for a 40-hour workweek, not a 4-day workweek. Respondent's vice president, Weil, testified in response to Perez' account that Respondent followed the management prerogative provisions of the Local 298 contract in reducing the workweek for some employees to 4 days and also in shutting down the plant for the week, 30 April to 6 May. He testified, and this without contradiction, that Cole had given Perez written notice of the shutdown. Weil testified further that Perez never asked to discuss the 4-day workweek. I credit Weil's account as there is nothing in the correspondence SOLO had with Cole, respecting its complaints as to the negotiations, that refers to the 4-day workweek, and particularly as Perez was not hesitant in that correspondence to state his complaints as to the negotiation processes.

The parties met again on 23 July. At that session, Cole handed Perez the following:

> Employer offer
> 1. Three (3) year agreement commencing on date of ratification by employees.
> 2. Wage increase of One (1%) per cent per year on signing and on the anniversary dates of the contract for all employees who have at least one year's seniority at that time.
> 3. Company contribution to medical coverages to be frozen at current level. Any increase in cost for individual or family coverage to be paid for by employee. No entry into SOLO funds-continuation with same provider (SOLO HAS NOT FORWARDED INFORMATION ON PLAN AS REQUESTED IN 6/27 MEETING).
> 4. Eliminate three personal days.
> 5. Open shop.
> 6. Regular monthly meetings with groups of employees to discuss quality and productivity improvement and methods of improvement of working conditions and employees' suggestions. Union present if desired by SOLO.
> 7. In order to eliminate vandalism and theft from Company, the Company demands the right to conduct random searches of any employee automobiles on premises.
> 8. All vans shall not be permitted entry to the Company premises. Any employees traveling by vans shall be discharged at the guard check.
> 9. All union demands not previously agreed to are denied.

Perez told Cole that he has "got to be kidding." Cole responded that the offer was serious and that it was more than Respondent could afford. Perez then asked for Respondent's books and records and Cole denied the request, saying Respondent had already made clear its position respecting such a request.

Parenthetically, I note that Respondent's contract with Local 298 had included union-security and dues-checkoff provisions and allowed unit employees 3 personal days a year.

Perez testified that later in July Cole telephoned him to say that since Perez had filed an unfair labor practice charge alleging that Respondent refused to bargain with SOLO, Respondent would not meet again with SOLO until the charge was resolved. Perez testified further that he told Cole that SOLO had not filed any refusal to bargain charge. Perez testified that he then checked with Region 22, which advised him that SOLO had filed a charge on behalf of Diego Fernandez.

Cole testified that he has no recollection of telephoning Perez in late July and that his diary, in which he records telephone calls and other business data, has no entry of any such call. He testified that the only phone calls he made to Perez in July were on 10 and 15 July, as reflected in his diary, and that resulted in the 23 July session discussed above.

Perez wrote Cole on 14 August to complain about Respondent's refusal to produce its financial books and records. He made no reference in that letter to a refusal by Respondent to meet while there is pending a refusal to bargain charge. I credit Cole's testimony, not Perez. The absence of any assertion in Perez' letter of 14 August of any such refusal to meet tends to support the import of Cole's testimony—that he never refused to meet because such a charge was pending. Further, it is unlikely that Cole would have made such a statement in the offhanded way recounted by Perez.

The General Counsel placed in evidence a copy of a Dun and Bradstreet report on Respondent that SOLO had obtained. That report did not have a rating for Respondent; it did contain statements that reflected slow payments by Respondent to some of its creditors between 1 October 1985 and 1 October 1986. There was also a notation on the report that Respondent's president had written on 15 October that "[p]rofits for the past six months were up."

The last negotiation session held between Respondent and SOLO took place on 6 November. Respondent then offered 1.6-percent wage increase for each year of a 3-year contract. SOLO reduced its demands further. There was discussion also of changing the method of paying unit employees. The meeting apparently ended on a strange note. It seems that sometime before 6 November SOLO had asked a Teamsters union to pretend to engage in an organizing drive among Respondent's employees; apparently SOLO was hoping that Respondent would react by increasing its offers to SOLO to frustrate a Teamster campaign. At the 6 November session, SOLO accused Respondent of bringing the Teamsters on the scene.

No further negotiation sessions were sought or held.

As outlined earlier, the complaint alleges that Respondent, by each of the following matters, violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act:

> (a) unilaterally implementing a four day work week.
> (b) cancelling meetings and refusing to meet unless SOLO accepted its demands or because SOLO filed charges under the Act.
> (c) issued warnings to members of SOLO's bargaining committee.
> (d) failing and refusing to furnish requested financial information.
> (e) its overall conduct.

Respecting the contention that Respondent unilaterally reduced the workweek, the evidence is clear that Respondent was committed to following the basic terms of the Local 298 contract until it reached agreement with SOLO on the terms of a new contract. The General Counsel notes that the Local 298 contract provides that the "normal" workday amounts to 8 hours and that the "normal" workweek consists of 5 days. The General Counsel argues then that the normal workweek consists of 40 hours and that Respondent, by having reduced the workweek to 4 days for some unit employees, thereby changed their terms of employment without notice to SOLO. Respondent points to the broad management prerogative clause in the Local 298 agreement as the basis for its claim that it had a contract right to reduce the workweek. I note too that the Local 298 contract states that it is not to be construed "as a guarantee of hours of work per day, or per week, or of days of work per week." Significantly, the record before me does not contain evidence of past practice to indicate that Respondent had been barred from implementing on its own a workweek reduction. Such evidence is an essential element of proof for the General Counsel. See Eazor Express, Inc., 238 NLRB 1165 (1978). I therefore find no merit to the General Counsel's allegation that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) by unilaterally reducing the workweek of some unit employees.

The major aspect of the second allegation is that that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) by refusing to meet because SOLO had filed charges under the Act. Based on the credibility determination above as to the conflicting accounts of Cole and Perez, that allegation lacks merit. Part of this second allegation is that Respondent canceled meetings; that contention is treated separately below.

The complaint refers to the unlawful warnings to members of SOLO's bargaining committee as unlawful conduct engaged in by Respondent, which established that it violated Section 8(a)(5). The complaint does not allege these warnings in a separate paragraph and by themselves to be violations of Section 8(a)(5). The General Counsel's brief treats them as evidentiary factors supporting the allegation that Respondent's overall conduct constituted bad-faith bargaining.[2] These warnings then will be treated below in conjunction with other factors in weighing Respondent's overall conduct in its negotiations with SOLO.

The next contention of the General Counsel is that Respondent unlawfully failed and refused to furnish requested financial data to SOLO and, in conjunction therewith, canceled negotiation sessions and refused to meet with SOLO. There is no factual issue on this point. Cole canceled the 31 March meeting and proposed a 3-year wage freeze after having informed SOLO on 27 March of Respondent's estimates of the total costs of SOLO's demands; he told SOLO that its demands would make it or any company "in this industry" unprofitable; and he notified SOLO of Respondent's intent to defer meeting again until SOLO takes into account, inter alia, the wage freeze. SOLO's representative made it clear that SOLO wanted to take into account the wage freeze proposal and he requested Respondent to give SOLO the necessary financial data to enable it to go back to the bargaining unit employees. Respondent refused to furnish the data.

In NLRB v. Truitt Mfg. Co., 351 U.S. 149 (1956), the employer there rejected a union's demand for a wage increase of 10 cents per hour and asserted that any increase of more than 2-1/2 cents per hour would put it out of business. When the union there asked it to produce evidence to substantiate that statement, the employer denied the request. The Court held that the Board's order should be enforced whereby the employer would be compelled to furnish the financial data requested. The Court noted that good-faith bargaining necessarily requires that claims made by either side should be honest claims and an asserted inability to pay an increase is important enough to require proof of its accuracy. Respondent's claims that a 3-year wage freeze is consistent with "the realities of [its] business" and that SOLO's demands would make Respondent unprofitable presumably were made in good faith. Respondent, under the rationale of Truitt, must be prepared to demonstrate that they are honest claims. Thus Respondent, by not honoring SOLO's request, failed to bargain in good faith. To the same effect, see California Nevada Golden Tours, 283 NLRB 58 (1987), and Teleprompter Corp., 227 NLRB 705 (1977), enfd. 570 F.2d 4, 8 (1st Cir. 1977).

As to the allegation that Respondent unlawfully canceled meetings and refused to meet with SOLO, the evidence discloses that Respondent canceled the 31 March meeting but that it did meet thereafter as requested. I find that the evidence fails to establish that Respondent's cancellation of the 31 March meeting, by itself, was aimed at preventing a resolution of the underlying disputes; the cancellation of the 31 March session was ancillary to, and subsumed under, the allegation that Respondent unlawfully refused to furnish requested financial data, discussed above.

[2] In the unlikely prospect that the warnings, by themselves, were intended to be alleged as a separate, distinct violation of Sec. 8(a)(5), I would dismiss such an allegation. Otherwise, every act of interference with Sec. 7 rights could be stretched into a separate 8(a)(5) violation simply because each such act can be said to have some impact on negotiations.

The last issue raised by the pleadings is the most difficult to resolve—whether Respondent engaged in surface or bad-faith bargaining. In making this determination, the Board looks to the totality of the circumstances in which the bargaining took place, at and away from the bargaining table. Hedaya Bros., 277 NLRB 942 (1985), and cases cited therein. More specific guidelines have also been set out. A party may lawfully stand firm on a bargaining position he reasonably believes fair or has the strength to achieve; other conduct may be indicative of bad faith. Atlanta Hilton & Tower, 271 NLRB 1600, 1603 (1984). There is no litmus test that can quantitatively decide the issue. Reasonableness or lack thereof of a party's proposals are not to be evaluated in determining whether a party has bargained in good faith. See Reichhold Chemicals, 277 NLRB 639 (1985). Section 8(d) of the Act does not compel an employer to make concessions. Nonetheless, an employer is obligated to make a reasonable effort to compose differences. NLRB v. Reed & Prince Mfg. Co., 205 F.2d 131, 134 (1st Cir. 1953), cert. denied 346 U.S. 887 (1953). Conduct indicative of bad faith includes delaying tactics, unreasonable bargaining demands, unilateral changes, efforts to bypass the union, failing to designate an agent with sufficient authority, withdrawal of agreed-on provisions, and arbitrary scheduling of meetings. See Atlanta Hilton & Tower, supra at 1603. Coercive conduct coupled with regressive proposal also can manifest bad faith. Heyada, supra.

The factual situation in the instant case places it between Reichhold Chemical, supra, where the Board found hard bargaining and Heyada, supra, where bad-faith bargaining was found. In Reichhold, the Board discounted 8(a)(1) statements by supervisors threatening discharge and the futility of bargaining. In Rescar, Inc., 274 NLRB 1 (1985), the Board also discounted a pre-10(b) statement of an inebriated vice president of the employer there that it had no intention of signing a contract.

On the one hand, I note that there is, in this case, a virtual absence of the types of conduct noted above that point towards bad-faith bargaining—bypassing a union and so on. On the other hand, the coercive conduct in this case was aimed directly at employees on SOLO's negotiating committee at the instance of Respondent's key officials, Weil and Ricciardi, and the timing thereof relates closely to SOLO's demands for financial data. Again, on the one hand, Respondent ultimately did make wage increase offers of 1 percent, and then 1.6 percent, and on the other, it unlawfully refused to produce data to substantiate its claim that SOLO's demands would make its operation unprofitable.

There are other factors to consider. I note that Respondent's contract with Local 298 contained not only union-security provisions but also a dues check-off clause. Yet Respondent repeatedly proposed an open shop to SOLO. The Local 298 contract, too, called for wage increases substantially more than the percentages that Respondent offered SOLO. By themselves, Respondent's proposals could be just hard bargaining and ploys to induce SOLO to lower its demands. In context with other factors, however, the regressive nature of Respondent's proposals could be considered in evaluating bad faith.

After weighing all the relevant factors and noting particularly the unlawful warnings to SOLO's negotiating committee, the discriminatory treatment of the Fernandez brothers, Respondent's refusal to produce financial data to back up its own representations to SOLO, and the regressive nature of the proposals offered by Respondent, I find that the evidence supporting the complaint allegation outweigh the factors pointing towards good-faith bargaining, e.g., its meetings with SOLO, and its exchanges of proposals. From the totality of the circumstances, as they are reflected in the record before me, I find that the General Counsel has shown, by a preponderance of the evidence, that Respondent entered into and participated in negotiations with SOLO with an essentially closed mind intent on forcing SOLO to capitulate to its dictates and disinterested in seeking a peaceful resolution of its differences with SOLO.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. SOLO is a labor organization as defined in Section 2(5) of the Act and the exclusive representative of the following unit appropriate for purposes of collective bargaining:

> All production and maintenance employees of Respondent, including shipping and receiving employees but excluding all office employees, clerical employees, administrative employees, executives, guards, maintenance men, professional employees, supervisors as defined in the Act and all other employees of Respondent.

3. Respondent, in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act, has engaged in the following conduct:

(a) Issued warnings on 16 May 1986 to employees on SOLO's negotiating committee in order to discourage support for SOLO.

(b) Issued a warning on 23 May 1986 to Diego Fernandez and discharged him from its employment on that day to discourage support for SOLO.

(c) Issued a warning on 29 May 1986 to Rolando Fernandez and suspended him from its employ for a week in order to discourage support for SOLO.

4. Respondent, in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (4) of the Act, discharged Diego Fernandez on 23 May 1986 because he informed Respondent, in substance, that he intended to file an unfair labor practice charge with the Board to protest the warning issued earlier to him that day.

5. Respondent, in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act, has failed and refused to bargain in good faith with SOLO and has failed and refused to supply SOLO with requested financial data needed to enable it to bargain with Respondent respecting Respondent's claim, in substance, that it cannot meet SOLO's bargaining demands and yet remain profitable.

6. In all other respects, the allegations of unlawful conduct set out in the consolidated complaint are without merit.

REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1), (3), (4), and (5) of the Act, I shall recommend that it cease and desist therefrom and that it take certain affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

Accordingly, Respondent shall be ordered to offer Diego Fernandez immediate and full reinstatement to his former position, or if it no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position without prejudice to his seniority or other rights and privileges and to make him whole for having unlawfully discharged him on 23 May 1986; and to make whole also Rolando Fernandez for having unlawfully suspended him from its employ in late May or early June 1986. Backpay shall be computed in the manner prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), with interest as computed in New Horizons for the Retarded, 283 NLRB 1173 (1987).

Respondent shall also be ordered to remove from its files all references to the unlawful warnings given on 16 May 1986 to employees on SOLO's negotiating committee to Diego Fernandez on 23 May 1986 and to Rolando Fernandez on 29 May 1986; to remove from its files, too all references to its discriminatory discharge of Diego Fernandez on 23 May 1986 and to its discriminatory suspension of Rolando Fernandez in late May or early June 1986 and to notify these employees that these steps have been taken and that the unlawful acts will not be used against them in any way.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[3]

ORDER

The Respondent, Lustrelon, Inc., Edgewater, New Jersey, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Warning employees to discourage support for Solidarity of Labor Organizations International Union (SOLO).

(b) Discharging or suspending employees because they support SOLO.

(c) Discharging any employees to discourage the filing of unfair labor practice charges with the Board.

(d) Refusing to bargain in good-faith with SOLO and refusing to furnish financial data requested and needed by SOLO to fulfill its obligations as exclusive representative in the unit described as certified by the Board.

(e) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affimative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Offer Diego Fernandez immediate and full reinstatement to their former jobs or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or any other rights or privileges previously enjoyed, and make them whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits suffered as a result of the discrimination against them, in the manner set forth in the remedy section of the decision.

(b) Make whole Rolando Fernandez for all loses of earnings and other benefits suffered as a result of his unlawful 1 week's suspension from employment, in the manner set forth in the remedy section above.

(c) On request, bargain collectively in good faith with SOLO as representative of the employees in the certified unit, with respect to their wages, liners of work, and all other terms and conditions of employment.

(d) Provide SOLO with the financial data it requested to verify Respondent's assertion that honoring SOLO's demands would render its operations unprofitable.

(e) Remove from its files any references to warnings given employees on SOLO's bargaining committee and to the separate warnings given Diego and Rolando Fernandez and notify them all in writing that this has been done and that the unlawful acts will not be used against them in any way.

(f) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

DECISION ON REVIEW AND ORDER

By Chairman Stephens and Members Johansen and Cracraft

On November 25, 1985, the Regional Director issued a Decision and Direction of Election in which he found that, under the principles set forth in National Transportation Service, 240 NLRB 565 (1979), assertion of jurisdiction was warranted. On December 18, 1985, the Board granted the Employer's request for review of that decision. On December 20, 1985, an election was conducted in the unit found appropriate by the Regional Director, and the ballots were impounded. On June 30, 1986, the Board issued an order remanding the case for further consideration in light of its decisions in Res-Care, Inc., 280 NLRB 670 (1986), and Long Stretch Youth Home, 280 NLRB 678 (1986), including, if necessary, reopening of the record. Subsequently, the Regional Director ordered that the record be reopened and, on November 5, 1986, a further hearing was held. On January 13, 1987, the Regional Director issued a Decision and Order to Open and Count Impounded Ballots in which he concluded that assertion of jurisdiction over the Employer was appropriate.

Thereafter, in accordance with Section 102.67 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the Employer filed a timely request for review of the Regional Director's decision, in which the Employer contended that the Board should decline to assert jurisdiction. By unpublished order dated April 8, 1987, the Board granted the request for review. The petitioner filed a brief on review.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

We have considered the entire record in this case, and conclude, in agreement with the Regional Director, that it is appropriate to assert jurisdiction herein.

I.

The Employer provides management consulting services to governmental agencies. In the instant case, the Employer, under a contract with the Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA),[1] provides personnel for functions that are necessary to maintain the DEA's Narcotics and Dangerous Drugs Information System, functions which include document review and data analysis. The Petitioner seeks to represent a unit of the Employer's full-time and regular part-time employees employed at the DEA headquarters.

The Employer, as a contractor providing services to the Federal Government, is subject to the terms of the Service Contract Act of 1965, as amended, 41 U.S.C. § 351; as such, the wages and fringe benefits it provides its employees must equal at a minimum the standard established in a wage determination set by the Department of Labor (DOL). The wage determination sets forth the minimum compensation rates prevailing in the locality for wages and benefits. See 41 U.S.C. § 351 (a)(1), (2); Dynaelectron Corp., 286 NLRB 302 (1987). In the instant case, the wage determination for 1985 set a minimum hourly wage for each of five classifications that ranged from $7.46 per hour for a coder/trainee to $12.30 per hour for a team supervisor. All service employees under the contract were to receive health and welfare benefits valued at 32 cents per hour, $12.80 per week, or $55.46 per month, a well as 2 weeks' vacation after a year of service and nine paid holidays each year. The dollar amounts required for wages and for health and welfare benefits in the wage determination are only minimum standards.

The contract is a labor-hours contract with fixed billing rates; the Employer bills the agency for each hour worked, at a rate up to the ceiling specified in the contract. The contract specifies the number and types of personnel required, the maximum number of hours required for each labor category on each shift, and the billing rate for each classification.[2] The billing rate includes overhead, general and administrative costs (G&A), and fringe benefits. The contract includes a total direct cost for each fiscal year, separated into direct labor costs for each job classification, and lists a maximum sum for all other direct costs, including, for example, such items as parking, local travel, and postage. The Employer bills the DEA both for direct costs and for G&A, overhead, and fringe benefits, at the billing rate. Thus, should an employee work 3 hours at a rate of $10 an hour, the Employer would bill the agency for $30, plus the percentage of the billing rate allocated for that particular classification. The Employer does not receive the projected total contract price should there be a slowdown in production; the DEA is billed only for the hours worked.

[1] The contract is between the DEA and the Small Business Administration (SBA), and the Employer is the subcontractor.

[2] The DEA has permitted the Employer to transfer funds allocated for two specific job classifications between the two classifications, so long as the combined hours for the two classifications equal the total required under the contract and the cost does not exceed the total dollar amount for both classifications.

The contract is for a 1-year period, renewable for a total period not to exceed 3 years. A price adjustment clause is included that provides that if the DOL issues a new wage determination during the term of the contract, the parties may negotiate an amendment to reflect that change at the next renewal period. If, however, nonlabor costs increase, the DEA will only pay the established rate.

Before the contract was awarded, the DEA or the Defense Contract Audit Agency (DCAA) audited the Employer to determine whether it had the capability to perform the contract. The DCAA examined the Employer's proposal for wages and estimated indirect cost items, from photoduplication costs to officers' salaries. If the DCAA disagreed with the Employer regarding the projected rate for a particular item, the DCAA would propose a rate it considered more reasonable, but under which the Employer would be able to operate without a loss.

The Employer must maintain accounting procedures that show all cost incurred, and the DEA may examine the Employer's records for accuracy of the cost and pricing data. The DEA may request an audit of invoices before final payment, and payments previously made are subject to reduction for overpayment or to increase for underpayment.

Certain Federal acquisition regulations (FARs) are incorporated in the contract that permit the DEA to terminate the contract in whole or in part if it is in the interest of the Government. These regulations also permit termination if the contractor fails to perform services within the times specified, fails to make progress on the contract, or otherwise fails to perform contractual provisions.

One of the Employer's vice presidents, Ilene Baylinson, testified that because the billing rate is fixed, the Employer has no flexibility to change wage and benefit rates once the contract is negotiated with the DEA, but she was unable to point to any section of the contract that bars increases or changes in wages and benefits. She also stated that, in practice, the FARs prevent the Employer from changing wages and benefits because such changes would be considered defective cost pricing; however, she conceded that the regulations do not expressly prohibit increases. Baylinson also acknowledged that certain employees were paid more than the minimums required by the wage determination. Furthermore, another vice president, Michael Bonner, testified that the Employer is free to award wages and benefits that exceed the minimum specified in the wage determination.

To receive payment under the contract, the Employer submits invoices twice a month to the DEA to show expenditures. After the Employer substantiates the hours worked, the DEA reimburses the Employer for all costs incurred within certain line items. If the Employer bills the DEA for nonapproved items or for amounts that exceed line items, the DEA may challenge the sum. Thus, if the Employer were customarily to submit an invoice for 100 hours for a particular classification and then submit an invoice for 500 hours, the DEA might reject it on the basis that it would be unnecessary to use that many employees in one category.

During negotiations for a final contract, the Employer complied with a DEA request to standardize wages. Initially, the Employer, which was then acting under a preliminary letter contract, set wages by awarding individual employees a certain percentage above a standard wage rate, which could result in increases varying between 5 and 17.5 percent. As a result, employees within the same classification received widely different wage rates. The Employer also complied with a DEA request that it set the hours for eligibility for a night-shift differential to correspond with those hours set by the DEA. Further, the Employer changed its basis for awarding increases on request of the DEA. The Employer at first based merit increases on productivity, time, and attendance, but it agreed to base awards solely on production so that its employees would not receive more awards than would the employees of the DEA.

In support of the Employer's allegation that its ability to bargain is limited, Vice President Bonner testified that the contract specifies that the employer may expend $3000 each quarter for merit increases, although to support this statement, he pointed to contract language prohibiting total other direct costs from exceeding that amount. Moreover he also testified that there is nothing in the contract to prevent the Employer from expending more than the amount specified.

The cost of the components of the fringe benefit package are incorporated into the fixed billing rate. Baylinson testified that the Employer is unable to make financial changes in the fringe benefits package because the DEA would find it to be defective cost pricing, but again, she was unable to cite to particular regulations that prohibit such changes. She also testified that the Employer could in effect award greater benefits out of corporate profits, but she stated that its profit margin was too slim to support increases and, moreover, that the agency might conclude after a capabilities audit that the Employer was unable to perform the contract. Bonner, however, testified that the Employer may, within the limits prescribed by the contract, modify the types of fringe benefits it provides employees. That is, beyond meeting at a minimum the wage determination and staying within the billing rate agreed on with the DEA, the Employer may change benefits, including changing health plans. The contract does not prohibit the Employer from increasing benefits or bar changing the components of the benefits package;[3] the Employer simply cannot reduce the value of the benefits below that specified in the wage determination.

The contract requires that the Employer maintain two daily shifts and specifies that the size of the work force be equivalent to a certain number of full-time employees, although the Employer may use part-time employees to achieve the manning level. The contract provides for an effective work force of a certain number of person-weeks, with a 10-percent variance permitted over a 3-month period. The contract also specifies the time an employee must spend in a particular classification before advancement. Any changes in promotion criteria must be approved by the DEA before incorporation in the contract.

The Employer interviews and hires applicants; although the DEA interviews applicants, its focus is on security matters. The Employer's employees work in a secure facility alongside the DEA's employees, and thus need a security clearance; the Employer's employees wear identification badges issued by DEA security. In the past, the Employer has terminated an employee on notification by the DEA that he had breached security.

The Employer determines who is eligible for merit increases. The Employer also assigns work and schedules vacations, and selects employees to work overtime, subject only to the contractual restriction that such employees must have maintained a certain production rate. The Employer evaluates employees, and it weighs employees' error rates in evaluating performance.

Both the DEA and the Employer maintain procedures for quality control. If the DEA uncovers employee errors in the course of monitoring performance, the employer's supervisors decide whether an individual employee is chargeable with the error. The Employer has removed an employee from quality control functions who was not performing properly after the DEA warned that unless the Employer did so, the agency would seek to modify the contract to eliminate the position.

When employees perform functions in classifications not covered by a wage determination, the Service Contract Act's accompanying regulations provide a conforming procedure for establishing pay. See 29 CFR § 4.6(b)(2)(i). For those job classifications not included in the wage determination, wage rates are established by interested parties or employer-represented groups, and the Employer must report to the exempt entity on what wages and benefits those employees will be paid. Compensation must bear a rational relationship to that listed in the contract's wage determination. See 29 CFR § 4.6(b)(2)(ii). Thus any change, including adding a new classification, must be done by agreement of the Employer, the employees, and the DEA. To meet this requirement, an Employee Advisory Committee (EAC) was established to meet four times each year; it consists of six or seven elected employee representatives, as well as a project director, team supervisor, and vice president. As an example of the EAC's input, in the past the EAC has petitioned the DOL for a reclassification of wage rates, and in May 1983, the DOL issued a reclassification with wage increases and backpay. The EAC has also dealt with such matters as problems with work supplies or the general work environment, and has considered the use of error rates in evaluations, On the other hand, there was testimony that employees did not participate in establishing the wage determination issued for the 1985 fiscal contract year, and that the EAC did not meet between the dates of the two hearings, November 1985 and November 1986.

II.

In Res-Care, the Board clarified its test for whether an employer shares a governmental entity's exemption from the Act. The test evolved from that set forth in National Transportation Service, 240 NLRB 565 (1979). Res-Care explained that whether the Board asserts jurisdiction is based on the extent of control retained by the employer over essential terms and conditions of employment and on the degree of control exercised by the exempt entity over the employer's labor relations policies. Thus, jurisdiction is asserted when the employer has the "final say on the entire package of employee compensation, i.e., wages and fringe benefits." Id. at 674.

The exempt entity in Res-Care placed direct limits on employee compensation and, as a consequence, the employer did not have the ability to bargain over economic terms and conditions of employment. The DOL approved the initial wages, wage ranges, and benefits that were included in the proposed operating budget. Once the employer's budget was approved by the exempt entity, the contract price was based on the budget, and the employer effectively was prevented from increasing wages and benefits. Changes in approved amounts needed DOL clearance, and expenditures over budget were disallowed. The contract placed a ceiling on wages; employees could not receive more than that prevailing for other employees in the locality, wages were held to a top level of less than 10 percent over the wages that employees received at their former employment, and wage increases were limited to less than 10 percent. Personnel policies were also subject to DOL approval.

[3] Although the Employer asserted that it needed DEA approval to implement a change in the vesting schedule for its pension plan, the pension plan itself provides that the Employer has the right to amend, modify, or discontinue the plan at any time. The record does not show that DEA's authority to approve or disapprove amendments to the pension plan extends beyond any effect on the billing rate; the Employer contributes a percentage of each employee's salary into the pension fund and that sum is included in the fringe benefit total. In any event, the modification proposed would have no financial impact on the Employer's contribution rate and no effect on the billing rate.

By contrast, the Board asserted jurisdiction in Long Stretch because the employer was able to engage in meaningful bargaining; although there was a ceiling on the employer's total budget, there were no specific limits on employee compensation. Id. at 682 fn. 14. The exempt entity set minimum standards and qualifications for employees and suggested minimum and maximum salary ranges. The employer, however, was free to pay more or less than what the exempt entity suggested. The employer also submitted its proposed operating budget to the exempt entity, but the proposal was not the basis for the contract; instead it often varied from the actual budget.

The Employer here is less restricted than the employer in Res-Care, first, because there are no limits on the wages or compensation that the Employer proposes in submitting its operating budget. Beyond the wage determination's imposed minimum standards, the Employer may set forth its own compensation levels in the proposed budget. Unlike Res-Care, the DEA does not establish maximum levels at the outset; no ceiling was placed on wages or benefits in establishing contract terms. Bonner stated that the Employer could exceed the minimum specified in the wage determination, and wages under the contract have exceeded the wage determination. Res-Care is further distinguishable because here the Employer is not bound to keep wages under 110 percent of prior wages. Furthermore, the Service Contract Act provides for substitution of collectively bargained wages and benefits for the prevailing compensation rates set forth in wage determinations. Dynaelectron, supra at 303, citing 41 U.S.C. § 351(a)(1) and (2).[4] In Dynaelectron, the Board held that the terms of the Service Contract Act alone do not bar meaningful bargaining. Thus, because under the Service Contract Act, the rates in a collective-bargaining agreement would be incorporated as the wage determination in the contract, in the absence of other contractual limits, the Employer, through the process of bargaining, may set the compensation levels in the initial contract.

Once the contract is awarded, the Employer's budget does place some limits on changes in compensation. The limits are not such, however, that prevent bargaining over terms and conditions of employment. As in Res-Care, the budget becomes the basis for the contract and, moreover, the Employer may not bill the DEA for anything the DCAA has disallowed. Postaward, if the agency believes the Employer changed the components of the pricing structure, it may audit the Employer to determine whether it has the continued financial capability to perform the contract. If the Employer pays employees significantly more or less than what was recommended initially, the agency may conduct another audit with recommendations for wages and benefits that the Employer might pay under future contracts.

Payment methods here display more similarities to those in Res-Care than to those in Long Stretch. In Res-Care, to receive contract funds, the employer periodically submitted vouchers to the exempt entity, and the agency, which made payment monthly, had the discretion to reduce the contract payment by the amount of any costs it disallowed. The payment method under the contract in Long Stretch differed markedly. State funding was not tied to employee compensation and, instead, the employer received funds through the exempt entity from the state legislature based on reimbursement per resident. Here, the Employer submits specific invoices to the DEA, which reimburses it on review of the vouchers. The testimony indicates that if an invoice for a job classification shows a great increase, the DEA might question the basis for it and may refuse payment. The record does not show that the DEA would disallow payments for increased labor costs, unless, as with other items, they would exceed the contract price or undermine the Employer's ability to perform.

The record shows, however, that the Employer retains control over several crucial elements. The Employer's contract established only minimum rates, and the Employer's wage rates for its employees have exceeded those set by the DOL.[5] The [4] If the wages and benefits agreed on are shown, however, to be substantially at variance with those prevailing in the locality, or if reached after less than arm's-length negotiations, the DOL will not adopt those in setting a wage determination. 41 U.S.C. § 353(c); see Dynaelectron, supra at 304.

[5] Old Dominion Security, 289 NLRB 81 (1988), a somewhat similar case to that presented here, also involved an employer that was subject to the

DOL's wage determination only sets a minimum dollar amount for all benefits, and the Employer is free to negotiate a higher fringe benefit dollar value with the DEA. In PHP Healthcare Corp., 285 NLRB 182 (1987), a case in which the Board did not assert jurisdiction, the employer was more constricted by a contract that set maximum as well as minimum wage limits and established percentages for increases. As we noted in Dynaelectron, supra at 304, the Service Contract Act does not require the Employer to agree to provide higher wage rates or benefit levels than those prevailing in the locality.

The Employer asserted that the DEA's control over employee compensation is shown by restrictions concerning merit increases. However, the testimony regarding merit increases does not show that the Employer cannot determine what amounts, if any, to award to its employees. The record indicates that included in the line item budget for total "other direct costs" is a specified sum for merit increases. A reading of the contract does not show that the sum for "other direct costs" is broken down to separate amounts, including a sum for merit increases. Apparently, nothing in the contract limits the Employer's ability to award increases as it believes warranted.

If, during the term of the contract, the Employer were to enter into a collective-bargaining agreement with the Petitioner, because of the operation of the Service Contract Act, as stated above, the collectively bargained rates would become the new wage determination at the next renewal period.[6] Any wage or benefits increase resulting from bargaining would be incorporated in the contract. Thus, unlike Res-Care, should the Employer and the Petitioner negotiate a collective-bargaining agreement that increases compensation levels, such increases would not be disallowed, although under the contract the DEA still may ensure that the contract is performed and that the Employer is capable of performing it.[7] Hence, the Employer's contract with the DEA is less restrictive than that in Res-Care.

Based on the above, we find that the Employer does have the ability to engage in meaningful bargaining with a labor organization. The Employer has greater ability than in Res-Care to set initial compensation rates and, under the Service Contract Act, collectively bargained wages become the new wage determination. There are some factual similarities between the instant case and Res-Care; the Employer's submitted budget is the basis for the contract price, and the Employer submits vouchers periodically to receive payment. Unlike Res-Care, however, here there are no restrictions imposed by the DEA on the maximum wages and benefits, and the Employer determines the compensation its individual employees will receive, subject only to the minimums specified in the contract. Also unlike Res-Care, the contract does not specify employees' wage ranges. There is no evidence that the exempt entity possesses authority to approve or disapprove any changes in wages, aside from ensuring that the Employer continues to be capable financially to perform the contract. With regard to benefits, the Employer is limited only by the minimum standard, beyond that specification, the Employer is free to design a benefits package and to bargain over it with a labor organization.[8] The Employer, as in Long Stretch, does not operate under any specific limits on employee compensation expenditures beyond adhering to the minimum standards required under the Service Contract Act.

With respect to the exempt entity's involvement in day-to-day operations and labor relations, the DEA maintains certain security measures that require some input in hiring, and security breaches found by the DEA result in discipline. The use of a DEA facility and equipment requires that the DEA establish the hours of work and the number of em-

Service Contract Act. There, the Board asserted jurisdiction over the employer, observing, inter alia, that although the levels of employee compensation did not exceed the wage determination's minimum standards, the employer was not limited to those levels.

[6] The Petitioner points to the existence of the EAC as evidence of the Employer's ability to bargain, and the Employer, by contrast, contends that the EAC is currently inactive. Neither position affects the outcome of this case. DOL regulations contemplate employee involvement in setting wages. Any contractor who wishes to employ a class of employees not included in the contract's wage determination must first comply with a conformance procedure that requires the employer to submit a proposal regarding wages and benefits for review. The employer must indicate whether the employees' authorized representative agrees with the wage proposal or, in the absence of such an authorized representative, whether the employees themselves approve the proposal. 29 CFR § 4.6(b)(2)(ii). Thus, if circumstances warrant, the EAC would be required to meet.

In Res-Care, the Board stated that whether an employer and a labor organization have entered into a collective-bargaining agreement is not determinative of its jurisdictional decision. Id. at 674 fn. 22. There, unlike the present case, the exempt entity had approval authority over all the terms in the collective-bargaining agreement and thereby controlled all economic terms and conditions of employment. Here, however, the negotiated compensation levels automatically become the wage determination without agency participation. See 41 U.S.C. § 351(a); Dynaelectron, supra at 303–304.

[7] Although the Employer has complied with DEA requests regarding certain factors that affect compensation, such as overtime differential eligibility and standards for merit increases, these requests for some uniformity on matters that also affect DEA employees at the same site do not limit the Employer's ability to engage in meaningful bargaining over its employees' essential economic terms and conditions of employment.

[8] Although Baylinson testified that the Employer was not free to alter components of the benefit package, the record as a whole does not support this conclusory statement; the contract merely provides what the Employer must, at a minimum, expend per employee on an hourly, weekly, or monthly basis. Baylinson, on being asked what contract provision prevented the Employer from altering the fringe benefits package, stated that regulations required that the cost and pricing data must be certified as accurate, but she did not point to any contract provision or regulation that prevented the Employer from allocating fringe benefits as it wishes.

ployees per shift, and the DEA approves the qualifications for positions. Citing these facts, the Employer contended that it lacked control in such matters as hiring, setting staffing levels, holidays, quality control, hours of work and overtime, promotions, demotions, and terminations, and work environment, and that therefore our assertion of jurisdiction is not appropriate. We do not agree.

Because of the type of work contracted for, the DEA sets the number and type of personnel, and because the DEA performs a security-related function, it controls certain aspects of the work environment. The Employer, however, remains responsible for hiring, evaluating, and directing employees, not the DEA, and the decision to discharge rests with the Employer. In Long Stretch, id. at 682 and fn. 15, the fact that the agency set minimum qualifications and could veto hires that did not meet these standards did not defeat jurisdiction, and in Res-Care, id. at 674 fn. 22, the Board specifically disavowed reliance on operational controls in declining to assert jurisdiction. Here, the DEA's involvement in day-to-day operations and personnel matters to ensure contract compliance and security does not impinge on the Employer's ability to bargain. The Employer's employees are subject to the DEA's regulations, and the DEA may suggest discipline, but the Employer remains responsible for personnel decisions. See Dynaelectron, supra at 305; Old Dominion Security, supra at 82. Operational controls may permit monitoring of contract compliance, but they do not limit the Employer's ability to bargain. Long Stretch, id. at 682 fn. 15; see Res-Care, id. at 674 fn. 22; Rustman Bus Co., 282 NLRB 152 (1986); see also Champlain Security Services, 243 NLRB 755 (1979); Atlas Guard Service, 237 NLRB 1067 (1978).

In sum, we find that the Employer retains sufficient control over its employees' terms and conditions of employment to engage in meaningful collective bargaining, and that neither the DEA nor the DOL exercises any controls that affect the Employer's ultimate discretion over wage and benefit levels. ARA Services, 283 NLRB 602, 604 (1987): Long Stretch, id. at 682. We therefore hold that it will effectuate the purposes and policies of the Act to asset jurisdiction over the Employer. Accordingly, the Regional Director's conclusion is affirmed, and we shall remand the proceeding to the Regional Director for further appropriate action.

ORDER

The Regional Director's decision is affirmed and the case is remanded for further appropriate action.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS BABSON AND CRACRAFT

On January 15, 1987, Administrative Law Judge Thomas A. Ricci issued the attached decision. The General Counsel filed exceptions, a supporting brief, and a motion to strike portions of the Respondent's answering brief. The Respondent filed an answering brief, cross-exceptions, a supporting brief, and a response to the General Counsel's motion to strike.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions as modified[3] and to adopt the recommended Order as modified.[4]

AMENDED CONCLUSION OF LAW

Substitute the following for Conclusion of Law 2.

"2. The Company violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by threatening employees with loss of jobs and benefits in retaliation for their union activities, telling employees that management would find a way to discharge prounion employees, and telling employees not to listen to an employee because he was a troublemaker and caused trouble for his previous employer by filing grievances."

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, Corry Contract, Inc., Corry, Pennsylvania, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Discharging employees in retaliation for their protected union activity.

(b) Threatening employees with loss of jobs and benefits in retaliation for their union activities, telling employees that management would find a way to discharge prounion employees, and telling employees not to listen to an employee because he was a troublemaker and caused trouble for his previous employer by filing grievances.

(c) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Offer Thomas Eberle immediate and full reinstatement to his former position or, if such position no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent posi-

[1] On July 2, 1987, the Board granted the Petitioner's motion to sever Case 16–RC–9694 from the unfair labor practice case before us. In addition to severing the representation case, the Board granted the Petitioner's request to withdraw its election objections, and to certify the election results.

[2] The parties have excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

The judge stated that one-half of Respondent's work force was released because of a decline in business. The record reflects that only one-third of the work force was laid off during the beginning of 1986. The judge also stated that a conversation between Supervisor McFate and employee Sellon occurred the day before the election. The record reflects the conVersation occurred Tuesday of the week preceding the election on June 10, 1986. We correct these errors. These errors do not affect the ultimate determinations of the judge.

We deny the General Counsel's motion to strike portions of the Respondent's answering brief because, rather than objecting to the introduction of new evidence, the General Counsel is objecting to purported mischaracterizations of record evidence.

[3] We find the judge improperly went beyond the scope of the complaint by finding 8(a)(1) conduct in President Bill Kafferlin's statements that he would be hard to bargain with if the employees chose to be represented by a union and that the Respondent would not be obligated to bargain with a union selected by the majority of the employees, and Supervisor McFate's comments to Sharon Sellon that the Respondent was receiving union busting information from a law firm. The complaint did not allege these incidents, the General Counsel did not amend the complaint at the hearing, and the General Counsel did not either at the hearing or in her brief to the judge argue that these incidents were violations. Hence, the allegations were not actually litigated.

We agree with the General Counsel that Plant Manager Anthony's statement to employee Eberle that, if employees were listening to employee Spoveri, the latter was a troublemaker and had caused trouble for his previous employer by filing grievances, constitutes 8(a)(1) conduct. The statement was made in the context of threats by the plant manager of loss of jobs, benefits, and overtime and would plainly tend to impinge on employees' Sec. 7 rights. See Garrison Valley Center, 246 NLRB 700, 708–709 (1979). The judge found that the General Counsel failed to establish a prima facie case with regard to the layoffs of employees Rogers and Miller. While we adopt the judge's findings in this regard, we do not rely on the inferences the judge made relating to the employees named in the original charge.

Given the judge's finding that the Respondent threatened loss of employment in retaliation for union activity and other 8(a)(1) conduct, we find it unnecessary to pass on the allegation that the Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(1) by employee Kraft's statement that employees could be fired for wearing a union button because finding the additional violation would essentially be cumulative and would not materially affect the Order.

[4] The judge recommended a broad remedial order. Such an order is warranted only when a respondent is shown to have a proclivity to violate the Act, or has engaged in such egregious or widespread misconduct as to demonstrate a general disregard for employees' fundamental statutory rights. Hickmott Foods, 242 NLRB 1357 (1979). Inasmuch as the Respondent's unlawful acts are not of such nature, we shall modify the recommended Order and notice to provide the narrow cease-and-desist language.

We shall modify the recommended Order to require that the Respondent remove from its files any reference to Eberle's unlawful discharge and notify him, in writing, that it has done so and that evidence of the unlawful discharge will not be used as a basis for future personnel actions against him. See Sterling Sugars, 261 NLRB 472 (1982).

tion, without prejudice to his seniority or other rights and privileges previously enjoyed.

(b) Make whole Thomas Eberle for any loss of pay or benefits he may have suffered by reason of the Respondent's discrimination against him with interest thereon to be computed in the manner prescribed in New Horizons for the Retarded.[5]

(c) Remove from its files any reference to the unlawful discharge and notify the employee in writing that this has been done and that the discharge will not be used against him in any way.

(d) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(e) Post at its place of business in Corry, Pennsylvania, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[6] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 6, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(f) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order that steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

THOMAS A. RICCI, Administrative Law Judge. A hearing in this proceeding was held on 8 and 9 October 1986 at Corry, Pennsylvania, on a complaint issued by the General Counsel against Corry Contract, Inc. (the Respondent or the Company) and on objections to an election held by the Board. The complaint issued on 6 August 1986 on a charge filed by United Steelworkers of America, AFL–CIO–CLC (the Union) on 6 June 1986. The principal issue presented is whether the Respondent unlawfully discharged three employees in violation of Section 8(a)(3) of the Act. Briefs were filed after the close of the hearing by the General Counsel and the Respondent.

On the entire record, and from my observation of the witnesses, I make the following[1]

[5] In accordance with our decision in New Horizons for the Retarded, 283 NLRB 1173 (1987), interest on and after January 1, 1987. Shall be computed at the "short-term Federal rate" for the underpayment of taxes as set out in the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621. Interest on amounts accrued prior to January 1, 1987 (the effective date of the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621), shall be computed in accordance with Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

[6] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

[1] A motion by the General Counsel to correct certain inadvertent errors in the transcript, unopposed, is granted.

I. THE BUSINESS OF THE RESPONDENT

Corry Contract, Inc., a Pennsylvania corporation, is engaged in the production and nonretail sale of office furniture. During the 12-month period preceding issuance of the complaint in the course of its business it purchased and received at its Corry, Pennsylvania facility products, goods, and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from points outside the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania. I find that the Respondent is an employer within the meaning of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

I find that United Steelworkers of America, AFL-CIO-CLC is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES ALLEGED

Whether the Respondent, in its campaign to defeat the Union's June 1968 election, exceeded the bounds of permissible Board law is a minor question in this overall case. In the event, that election will be set aside and a new one ordered. By the time this proceeding is decided by the Board it will be quite a full year since the last election, and therefore the Union would be entitled to another election in any event.

The real question of substance is whether the Respondent illegally "discriminated" against three named employees—Sheila Rogers, Richard Miller, and Thomas Eberle. I used the word "discriminated" advisedly, because the complaint says the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) of the Act as to these persons, and the statutory prohibition there literally reads not to "discriminate." The complaint says the Company "discharged" these three employees on 8 May 1986. It then goes on to allege further that "since that date" the Company refused to "recall" them. If a man is fired or discharged from his job, and the motive was illegal, what matters that he was never thereafter "recalled"? How does that failure constitute another unfair labor practice? The fact that the man stays "discharged," day after day, and is not "recalled," adds nothing to the case in support of the complaint. Unless, of course, the complaint was intended to allege two separate acts of illegal discrimination, one in the initial "discharge," and another in the later "refusal to recall." Which is it? There is no proof in this record about anyone trying to come back after the layoffs and being refused. I have difficulty following the reasoning of the complaint, especially in the light of the undisputed and clear relevant facts of record.

At the beginning of the year 1986 there were about 100 production and maintenance employees in this plant. About 20 of them were released in March because of a decline in the volume of business, about 20 more were laid off in April for the same reason, and 11 or 12 more were laid off on 8 May. That all these people were sent home, half the total complement of 100, because the Respondent had no work for them is not disputed on this record. There is not only documentary evidence proving the decline in the volume of business, but the General Counsel's own witnesses admitted they were told before it happened that such a reduction in force was being planned. In fact the Company held a special meeting of all employees in March—before any indication of union activity at all—expressly to inform them that this was exactly what was going to happen. Also, a notice to all employees was posted in "January or February," as Ms. Rogers recalled, telling them the reduction in force was imminent.

Of all the people sent home in these mass layoffs, the complaint here selects two—Rogers and Miller—and says they were "discharged" on 8 May because they were unioneers.[2] Considering the record in its entirety, the evidence does not suffice to prove the complaint allegation of illegal motive in the release of these two employees. Although it is clear the Respondent was at the time of the events opposed to having the Union represent its employees, and although it is true it had knowledge of practically all those employees who favored the Union, there is no convincing evidence the Respondent selected Rogers and Miller for layoff because of their union feelings. I do not think the record proves a prima facie case for these two persons. Moreover, the facts of record suffice to establish a perfectly proper reason why the Respondent joined these two workers, among others, that day in the general layoff. I shall therefore recommend dismissal of the complaint as to these two employees.

Rogers signed a union card on 11 April, and testified that she attended union meetings regularly thereafter at the union hall, that she wore a union button and T-shirt at work, and that she distributed union literature at plant entrances. But Rogers also testified that no one ever threatened her because of her wearing the union insignia, and that no one ever made any comment about it at all to her. In short, this was the alleged discriminatee herself admitting the Respondent never gave any indication of animosity against her because she was one of the many employees who behaved as she did. In other words, the complaint as to her therefore becomes: Rogers favored the Union; the Employer knew it; the Employer was opposed to having the Union represent its employees; it fired Rogers; ergo—the reason why it fired Rogers was because of her union activity. In my considered judgment, I do not think that reasoning suffices to prove a prima facie case. When an employer fires 30 employees during an active union campaign, and only 1 of them is alleged to have been selected because of such activity, there must be at least some evidence that the employer picked her for such reason. There is no such evidence here as to Rogers.

The case in support of the complaint as to Richard Miller is not much different. He signed a union card on 29 April and testified he wore a union button, gave out leaflets, and went to union meetings. This man also testified that he attended the union meetings after he had left the Company on 8 May, and that he distributed the leaflets also after being laid off that day. As to Miller's activities in aid of the Union's organizational campaign—going to meetings and distributing union leaflets—which he engaged in after his layoff, or "discharge," they could hardly have been a motivating cause for what the Respondent did before those things happened. Could this be the reason why the complaint doubletalks and says the unfair labor practice was in the refusal to recall?

[2] The complaint also says employee Eberle was discharged on 8 May, but that is wrong. Eberle was discharged on 15 May.

Although the General Counsel made much of the fact all three of the employees involved in the complaint signed union cards before their release, there is no evidence, indeed it is not even claimed, that the Respondent had knowledge of those particular facts before those cards were entered as evidence at the hearing in this proceeding, 5 months later.

Miller testified about conversations he had with management representatives concerning the union activity that was going on. During the years he worked for this Company he was absent a number of times for illnesses, some of them for very long periods. The last such absence took place when he was hospitalized from 7 December 1985 to 5 May 1986. The day after 5 May, when he was put back to work, George Valletti: a supervisor, said to him: "I didn't know you were wearing that badge . . . that's all he said." With 50 percent of the employees wearing union buttons at work, of what significance was it for the supervisor to have said he noticed a button on a particular employee? The reason why all of them wore those buttons was precisely so that everybody in sight in the plant would become aware of them!

Miller also testified that when, on 13 May, 5 days after he had been laid off, and the only day he distributed union leaflets near the plant, he saw Bob Anthony, the factory manager, come out of the plant, and that he, Miller, told the supervisor: "[H]ere Bob, take one of these. He says no. I said come on take one. He says all right. So, he walked over and took one . . . and he said, goddamnit, Dick, you know better than this . . . . You been in a union before . . . they never done nothing for you." This was the alleged discriminatee himself admitting that the Respondent did not even know, before the discharge, that he was in any way involved with the Union. This is not surprising, for he had only been back on the job for 3 days before he was laid off. With this from the witness, can I find he was released because of his subsequent union activity?

As already stated Rogers and Miller are the only employees said to have been laid off on 8 May because of their union activities. But the record also shows, as the General Counsel's own witnesses conceded, that about half the total group at work at the time wore union buttons and T-shirts. That reality is also indicated by the results of the election the following month, when 43 voted for and 45 voted against the Union.

I think it fair to assume—certainly in the absence of any contrary evidence—that the hand of destiny fell as heavily on the prounion employees as it did on the antiunion group. The General Counsel does not contend that there was a top heavy selection of unioneers to support the present allegation of discrimination in general. If on 8 May Rogers and Miller were the only T-shirt wearers who were laid off while all the rest were known antiunion employees, a different picture would be presented. Instead, there is positive indication that even that day, as I presume also happened at the April layoff of 20 people, other known unioneers were sent home. The charge, filed by the Union on 6 June, lists nine employees (not including Eberle) as having been discharged on 8 May in violation of Section 8(a)(3) of the Act. The complaint then reduces the number to five. At the start of the hearing the General Counsel removed two more names from the complaint. As it stands only Rogers and Miller are now said to have been illegally selected that day. But if the Union charged that nine suffered illegally, it necessarily means that the Union knew they were open adherents of the union movement, and that the Company knew that to be so. The same inference must be made with respect to the General Counsel's having listed four employees in his complaint; if he did not know he could prove they were, all four unioneers to the knowledge of the Company, he would never have included them in his pleadings.

All this adds up to is a perfect affirmative defense of discharge for just cause. There is no contention that the Company was not justified, for business reasons, in releasing 11 or 12 employees on 8 May. Absent evidence of deliberate selection of any one of them for illegal reason, nothing wrong can be found with the fact it sent Rogers and Miller home that day.

There are two reasons why this part of the complaint fails on this record. The first is that with so many unioneers having been laid off on 8 May, to say nothing of an equal percentage laid off earlier, practically none of the whole bunch ever recalled, what was so special about Rogers and Miller that day that only they of the whole group can be said to have suffered "discrimination"? Nothing! They were but two of many unioneers, all in the same position and all treated alike.

A second argument by the General Counsel rests on what the Respondent's witnesses described as an established practice of permanently removing from its payroll any employees in layoff status for 60 days. Sixty days after 8 May—by 8 July—the Company altered its records to Mark Rogers and Miller as no longer having employee status. This meant all benefits ceased to apply to them, and that in the event they were ever offered an opportunity to return, or invited to come back, they must return under the usual routine examination and considerations that are applied to all new employees—probationary period, physical examination, qualifications, etc.

Rogers testified she had never heard of such a rule throughout her employment. Eberle said he first saw the rule when he received it as a printed copy with his termination notice 60 days after his layoff. He said the rule was enclosed with his termination notice. Sharon Sellen, another witness, gave like testimony.

Barbara Kimmey, the Company's personnel manager, testified the posted rule had been in effect since 1982, when it was first posted for all employees to see. She said the practice of sending a copy to laid-off employees when the 60-day layoff status ended was instituted to clear any misunderstandings about continuing benefits. The Company placed into evidence a copy of the rule, dated 1982, from its regular records. William Kafferlin, the Company's president, corroborated Kimmey. On the question of whether the Company in fact had in the past removed laid-off employees from its records, I must believe the management witnesses.

After the Respondent had rested its case, the General Counsel recalled Richard Miller as a rebuttal witness. He testified that in 1980–1981 he was on disability for a lengthy period, and that when he returned he resumed work on the same basis as when he had left. Then came the following from the witness:

> Q. Mr. Miller, you were rehired as a new employee, of May of 81, when you returned from this illness, weren't you?
> A. No, I wasn't rehired.
> Q. You were not rehired?
> Q. What happened to you?
> A. I brought a doctor's slip back from the VA Hospital. They let me work, I came right back to work, was on the same job as when I left.
> Q. Okay, what about your pay?
> A. My pay was dropped. I worked there, I would say, probably, a week, when they dropped my pay and they said then, at that time, that they would, had to do something about a plan or something.
> Q. What?
> A. A plan, some kind of a plan, where they—they had to start a new plan. They never had a plan before, in the shop, until—they told me at the time, there was never a plan in the shop. When I was off that year, they said there was no plan where you could be off 6 months and you started all over as a new employee. When I came back from that hospital, I started with the same pay and everything I left there with. And, then, after I worked there for a while, then they were going to start a plan, but I'd never seen the plan.
> Q. Okay, did you receive accident, sickness insurance benefits, when you were off?
> A. Accident and . . . .
> Q. Yes, 26 weeks worth.
> A. I've let's see, 26 and that, I believe, I did.
> Q. Then they ended after 26 weeks, right?
> Q. You say they told you about the plan. Who is they?
> A. That was Bob Anthony and Bill Kafferlin. When I came back to work and that, I didn't know how to discuss and come out with a ballot. But, Bob Anthony came back to me and told me that they would have to start me all over again. And, I had already come back and started working with, what I left with.
> Q. So, he did tell you you have to start all over again?
> A. Right. After I already came back and got my own pay, when I left.
> Q. Right. But, you already back you were told that you would be started all over again?
> A. Right.

This testimony by a Government witness comports with the present assertion of the Respondent's witnesses that a rule on returning employees was established in 1982. I therefore find nothing wrong with the Company, in 1986, recording its laid-off employees as "terminated" after 60 days of a layoff period.

Actually, all the testimony about employees knowing or not knowing about the rule and its meaning dies in this case in view of the company records. There was received a prepared summary of information from the original records about people having been terminated exactly 60 days after their layoff. All parties agreed the prepared summary correctly reflects the records themselves, which were always available to the parties throughout the hearing. One exhibit alone shows that 36 employees who were laid off were permanently terminated precisely 60 days after their layoff during the years 1984 and 1985. This was before any union activity occurred. One man, listed on the exhibit, was laid off in 1982 and marked "terminated" 60 days later. Enough!

With respect to Thomas Eberle, a totally different picture is presented. He was not laid off with others, as a group, unioneers and nonunioneers. He was singled out for discharge. The work he was doing—maintenance—was not reduced in the overall lessening of the volume of business. His release had nothing to do with the general reduction in force. His work was simply given to another man, more junior than him in tenure, and not even claimed to have been more qualified. Indeed, there is no question of Eberle's desirability as an employee for he was retained many times despite forced absences.

Eberle was fired on 15 May. As to him, too, the defense is economic necessity, the importance of replacing him with another man whose skills were more diversified and would cost the Company less. Unlike the picture presented concerning Rogers' and Miller's release, Eberle's dismissal followed direct threats to him intended to stop his prounion activity.

He signed a union card at the 29 April meeting of the Union, attended all weekly meetings, and immediately started wearing a union button marked "organizer." He also distributed union literature about the plant. At one meeting he spoke up about several of the needs of the employees that could be obtained through the Union—such as safety equipment, which was lacking, and merit raises. Some employees who were opposed to having a union also attended the meetings, prominent among them an employee named Rick Kimmey, the son-in-law of the owner of the Company, and the husband of the Company's personnel manager. A few days after the meeting where Eberle spoke up about the need for safety devices, Bob Anthony, the plant manager, told him at work that "the safety equipment is ordered for the acid tank. It should be in shortly." That management was aware of Eberle's pronounced activities in favor of the Union is the clearest fact on this record.

Eberle also said that later that same week Anthony looked at him, saw the union button on the employee's hat, and called him a "shithead." Eberle continued to testify that the following Saturday, also at work, Anthony started another conversation with him about the Union, and said "that if we were going to get a union in, that the union would cost us jobs, and benefits, and overtime." When Eberle came back saying that if the Company put the benefits for the employees in writing the employees would not vote for the Union, Anthony responded:

> [I]f we were listening to Terry Sproveri, he was nothing but a troublemaker. That he had filed a grievance with Corry-Jamestown, and he just caused the Company a lot of trouble.
> Q. Do you recall anything else about the conversation?
> A. Yes. After that, he said that if—with getting the union, we were just skinning our own necks.

At the hearing Anthony testified it was Eberle who first brought up the subject of the safety equipment in conversation with him. He then admitted having made the derogatory remark to the man. I see no reason for him to have spoken so offensively to the employee right after mention of the complaint Eberle had voiced at the union meeting only a few days earlier, except it be resentment by the manager towards the man's instigation of others towards getting a union in the workplace. I do not believe Anthony's testimony that it was Eberle who spoke to him first about the lack of safety equipment. I can only find that the manager learned about what took place at the union meeting from the husband of the personnel manager. Rick Kimmy was not only outspokenly antiunion, but persisted in being present at one union meeting after another despite repeated protests by the regular employees for him to stay away from there. In the end they were forced to expel him from their meetings.

Anthony denied having voiced any of the threats as testified by Eberle. I credit Eberle against the plant manager. This finding rests not only on the demeanor of the witness, and his admitted animosity towards the man, but also on the fact—as will appear below—that one of the main points urged by Kafferlin, the owner, in his campaign against the Union, was a repeated assertion that unionism was a danger to their jobs. I find that by his statements to Eberle that if the Union prevailed in the scheduled election employees would lose their jobs and other benefits, by his threats constituted violations of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act chargeable to the Respondent.

Eberle also testified that before his discharge on 15 May, Sam Smith, another supervisor, said to him, "[I]f we were going to get the union, it was going to cost us jobs. And, that if the union did come in, Bill [Kafferlin] would find some way of getting rid of the union organizers." Smith also denied having made these statements. Again, I credit the employee against the supervisor, and I find that Supervisor Smith's threat to Eberle that employees, and union organizers, would be discharged by the boss if the Union prevailed in the election to take place, the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

It is admitted that from the end of April to the election held by the Board on 19 June the Respondent tried continuously to convince the employees they would be better off voting against union representation. It sent letters regularly to individual employees urging its view. On 17 June, 2 days before the election, Kafferlin held a number of meetings with the employees, gathering from 15 to 20 at a time from the various departments, where he spoke to them about the coming election. From the testimony of Sharon Sellen, an employee in the press department: "[H]e started out by reading off his statement and telling us pretty much why we did not need the union, and that . . . what the union was going to cause, like, the union was going to put us out on strike, or that they couldn't help us . . . . He said that if the union got in, that the union would put us out on strike. He said that we wouldn't have any choice, that if the union voted strike, we would have to go out on strike. He said that if we got the union in, he would be hard to bargain with, and it will be difficult to get a contract with him. . . . he said that companies that we were dealing with now, don't want to deal with a union, and we'd lose business, and he stated that IBM, which is stationed, or situated at the Steelworkers Union, would be one company which would not want to work with a union company . . . . He said people that were laid off would be terminated and not called back."

Sproveri, from the assembly department, testified about what Kafferlin said to his group at a meeting the same day. From his testimony: "[W]e got to discussing the Union. And, he had informed us that he was—had experience with negotiating with Unions, and that he could be hard to deal with, just as hard to negotiate with as the Union people could. And that through negotiations we could eventually lose some of the benefits that we have. . . . And, he said, that IBM would—in essence, he said, that IBM would rather not deal with a Union shop."

Employee Glenda Bounds also testified about the meeting she attended:

> He told us that he didn't have to bargain with the union if he didn't want to. He told, at that time, that the people that were on layoff, and that were terminated, were not to be called back at all. He said—told us that the union couldn't do anything for us, and that the union was taking our rights away, they were making our decisions for us. And, he said that the Union could make us go out on strike, and then he would hire other people, that we wouldn't have any rights for anything if we had a union.

After this came Kafferlin's testimony. He started with a negative response to a purely leading question, by denying having said "the Company would not agree to give the union anything if it won the election or words to that effect." Then came the following from the witness:

> Q. Did you, during the course of these meetings, discuss whether or not the company would refuse to bargain or refuse to negotiate with the union?
> A. We did discuss it, yes, sir.
> Q. What did you say about it?

> A. I said that we would negotiate, but that we would negotiate as hard bargainers.

The witness' testimony was evasive and therefore not really credible. For example:

> Q. Did you ever say that it would be hard for the union to get a contract from you?
> A. I said we would negotiate.
> Q. Did you ever say that specific statement that I said?
> A. I don't recall that I said that it would be hard to get a contract.

Again:

> Q. Did you ever say that the union was taking the employees' rights away?
> A. I didn't say they were taking their rights away, I said they were acting without their approval.
> Q. You made that statement?
> A. I did make that comment, that they were already acting without their approval.

Kafferlin denied telling the employees the Union would call them out on strike, and then added: "I said that we had been reviewed by customers, they had asked about our union status, and that we had our contract under negotiation, that the customer was sensitive to the fact that we did or did not have a union, and that that was one of the conditions under which we would be given an opportunity to bid."

Between Kafferlin and the employee witnesses I credit the testimony of the latter group. The owner's message was clearly one to intimidate the employees, to create a fear in them that if they voted in favor of the Union 2 days later, they ran the risk of losing their jobs. The message could not have been clearer. Kafferlin's explanation of his statements that loss of jobs was a probability if the Union prevailed rests on his unsupported assertion that his customers, or at least prospective customers, would refuse to do business with him if there were a union representing his employees. There is no evidence to that effect, nor did the Respondent come forth with objective proof of its present assertion. See Long-Airdox Co., 277 NLRB 1157 (1985). I believe the employees who testified he said he would refuse to bargain in good faith with the Union in the event. I therefore find that by the owner's telling the assembled employees he would not bargain fairly with a union, that they would lose their jobs if the Union should prevail, the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

This, coupled with the direct threats of retaliation spoken to Eberle personally by more than one supervisor as they saw him pushing for the Union as an organizer while still at work, the finding is fully warranted that a prima facie case in support of the complaint as to that man is proved.

The now advanced defense of discharge for cause does not suffice to offset the case in support of the complaint. Wright Line, 251 NLRB 1083 (1980). Eberle's work continued as it always did; it all had nothing to do with the economic changing conditions of the Company. The testimony is not quite clear as to just who was used in his place beginning on 15 May. Anthony, the supervisor who had directly threatened Eberle with loss of employment and who also said it is he who decides which employee must be laid off now and then, testified he replaced Eberle with a man named Robert Nichols, because Nichols was also capable of doing inspection work. But the company records, offered into evidence by the Respondent, show Nichols was in laid-off status at the time Eberle was sent home. He had been laid off on 9 May and was recalled on 27 May, according to the records. Eberle was fired on 15 May!

This fits into Eberle's testimony that Anthony told him, on 15 May, that his job was being eliminated. Eberle also testified that a man named Bruce Pierce, a maintenanceman as he was, was doing his work later. This testimony is supported by that of employee Sharon Sellen, who said Pierce has been doing Eberle's work on a regular basis since the release of Eberle. Pierce, who testified for the defense, was not convincing. From his testimony:

> Q. Isn't it true that since the time that Eberle was laid off, you're doing the same work that he did prior to his layoff, is that correct?
> A. No.
> Q. What job are you doing now?
> A. I am doing his job now, but before I was working in the new building.
> Q. My question was, since Eberle was laid off, you, after—since the time Eberle's been laid off, you were the one who's doing the work that he did prior to the time he was laid off?
> A. Right.

Eberle had been on the job 5 years. The Company was glad to take him back every time he could not avoid an absence. Except for a single warning about a drawer falling to the floor accidentally in 1985, he was never given any disciplinary notice or warning of any kind. And even if Anthony did use employee Nichols to do Eberle's work later, for a while, it is still a fact the job was given to another regular man, Pierce, instead of recalling Eberle. Against the very convincing affirmative evidence of illegal motivation in the discharge of the man, I find the so-called defense of just cause unpersuasive, I conclude that Eberle was discharged on 15 May because of his persistent prounion activities, and that by such action the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) of the Act.

There is also testimony of unfair labor practices committed in violation of of Section 8(a)(1) by Charles McFate, an admitted supervisor. One day, before the election, McFate called employee Sellen into his office where he talked to her "an hour and 45 minutes," according to Sellen. She testified the supervisor told her that "we'd be better off if we went, you know, if we didn't have a union . . . that he knew that we wouldn't get anywhere by . . . voting in the union." Asked on cross-examination to repeat her testimony, Sellen did so: "he said he had family who worked in a law office in Oil City. And, he gave me this long name of people, or names, for a lawyer firm. And, he said that that was where he was getting his information for union busting."

As to this conversation in his office, McFate was evasive at times, and therefore not credible to me against the employee's testimony. He denied having said to her that he was getting "union busting" information. Then came the following cross-examination:

> Q. I have a question, the reason you called MS Sellen into your office, was to just talk to her and attempt to discourage her from supporting the union, is that correct?
> A. Not, entirely. It's nothing unusual to have, call people in and discuss work, work attitudes, and that type of thing.
> Q. Work attitudes?
> A. You know, thinking of, you know, work related.

I find that by calling an employee into his office in private conversation to tell her the employees would be "better off" without a union, and that he, the supervisor, was obtaining "union busting" information, McFate, on behalf of the Respondent, violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

The complaint also alleges certain other violations of Section 8(a)(1) said to have been committed by three employees—Roger Mimmick, Lynn Mokwa, a receiving clerk, and Paul Kraft, a layout employee. One witness said she heard Kraft tell another employee he, or she, could be fired for wearing a union button. The only other significant misconduct charged to these three persons is the fact that Mokwa went about the plant polling the employees about their union sentiments before the election. He kept a chart with names and checked off those in favor and those against the Union. The Respondent disputes the alleged supervisory status of all three of these employees at the time of the events. I do not think the evidence sufficient to prove any one of these three men was in fact a supervisor at the time, or an authorized agent of the Respondent, and shall therefore ignore the relateo evidence there is on this record about their antiunion activity.

Apart from the testimony of the personnel manager that none of these three men exercised any of the authority listed in the statutory definition of a supervisor, the Government witnesses themselves conceded they had not themselves seen these men act with authority in a supervisory capacity. Some of them voted in the election, without challenge. What the witnesses offered to prove the asserted supervisory statues are claims of such authority voiced by the disputed employees themselves. But agency is not proved out of the mouth of the agent. None of the three men was called as a witness.

It is a fact the real supervisors were aware of Mokwa's going about the place asking one employee after another how he felt about the coming election. Maybe the Respondent should have stopped him from doing that. But then, it did not, as indeed it could not, stop the prounion people from advertising their contrary attitude by the buttons and T-shirts half of them wore throughout the place of work. Mokwa's activity was of the same nature as the the publicity activities of the prounion employees.

There is one more allegation in the complaint that I find unsupported by the evidence. About a week after his discharge, Eberle came back to the plant for his final check. He accepted union leaflets from a professional union organizer before entering the building. He did not go to the office but went into the regular workplace, in the maintenance department. Kafferlin happened to see him there. He took Eberle by the arm and urged him in the direction of the office. In the words of Eberle himself "he [Kafferlin] escorted me to the front office." The complaint characterizes this incident as "physical assault" by the owner. I do not agree. Eberle had no business being inside the plant that day, especially in view of his then activity as an organizer and distributor of union literature. He was not denied his right to go to the office for whatever was due him. I therefore make no finding adverse to the Respondent based on that visit to the plant.

IV. THE REPRESENTATION PROCEEDING

As the result of the 19 June 1986 election now stands, the Union lost by a very narrow margin. It filed timely objections, claiming improper interference with a fair election by the Company before the voting took place. On investigation the Regional Director decided a hearing should be held on some of the objections. And because at the same time the Union filed its charge in Case 6-CA-19180, and the Regional Director decided to issue a complaint in that case. He then consolidated the two proceedings for a single hearing.

As explained, and as found above, the Company committed a number of unfair labor practices before the election date, including the outright discharge of one of the union organizers. Some of the unfair labor practices found involved certain aspects of the objections filed by the Union; there is even a certain overlap between the two kinds of improper conduct by management officials. Whether the unfair labor practices found fall within the scope of the objections or within the area of the complaint is of no moment. Indeed, if by chance there may have been minor additional incidents not clearly shown on the record in support of the objections, there is no need to belabor them here. Without doubt the election must be set aside and a new one ordered. Unfair labor practices committed so shortly before an election, aimed exactly at restraining the employees who felt prounion from so voicing their choice in the election, demands that the results be set aside, regardless of whether the more grievious misconduct was listed in the Union's objections.

V. THE EFFECT OF THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES ON COMMERCE

The activities of the Respondent set forth in section III, above, occurring in connection with the operations of the Respondent described in section I, above, have a close, intimate, and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States, and tend to lead to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce and the free flow of commerce.

THE REMEDY

Respondent must be ordered to cease and desist from again committing the unfair labor practices found herein. Thomas Eberle must be reinstated to his former position, and he must be made whole for any loss of earnings he suffered in consequence of the illegal discrimination against him. In view of the nature of the unfair labor practices committed, the Respondent must be ordered to cease and desist from in any other manner violating the statute hereafter.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. By discharging Thomas Eberle on 15 May 19867 the Respondent has violated and is violating Section 8(a)(3) of the Act.

2. By the foregoing conduct, by threatening employees with loss of employment in retaliation for the union activity, by threatening employees with loss of benefits because of their union activity, by telling employees that management would find a way to discharge prounion employees, by telling employees Respondent would be hard to bargain with if it choose to be represented by a union, by telling employees that collective bargaining with the Union of their choice would mean loss of benefits being enjoyed, by telling its employees the Respondent would not be obligated to bargain with a union selected by a majority of the employees, and by telling employees that management was obtaining union busting information, the Respondent has violated and is violating Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

3. The above-described unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS JOHANSEN, BABSON, AND CRACRAFT

On November 27, 1987, Administrative Law Judge William N. Cates issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed a brief in support of the judge's decision.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings,[1] findings,[2] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order, as modified.[3]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge as modified below and orders that the Respondent, Horton Automatics, Corpus Christi, Texas, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the order as modified.

Insert the following as paragraph 1(n).

"(n) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act."

[1] The Respondent excepted to the judge's failure to admit G.C. Exh. 22, the notes of Plant Manager Carrier, as evidence of a prior consistent statement to corroborate Carrier's testimony that since he began working at the Company, he had expressed his view to then Plant Superintendent Castillo, among others, that the plant was overstaffed. We find it unnecessary to pass on this exception to the judge's evidentiary ruling because, even if admitted, the evidence would not affect the outcome in this case.

[2] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[3] The judge inadvertently omitted the cease-and-desist paragraph in the recommended Order. Accordingly, we shall modify the recommended Order.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

WILLIAM N. CATES, Administrative Law Judge. I heard this matter on 23 and 24 April and 27 and 28 May 1987 at Corpus Christi, Texas. The cases arose when International Union of Electronics, Electrical, Technical, Salaried and Machine Workers, AFL–CIO, District 11 (Union) filed unfair labor practice charges against Horton Automatics (Company), on 12 January 1987. Acting on behalf of the Board's General Counsel, the Regional Director for Region 23 investigated the charges and issued an order consolidating cases, consolidated complaint and notice of hearing (complaint) on 20 February 1987. The complaint was amended on 17 March 1987 and at trial. The Company answered admitting many background and jurisdictional contentions made in the complaint but denied all claimed wrongdoings.

The General Counsel makes extensive claims in the complaint. It is claimed that the Company starting as early as October 1986[1] engaged in conduct prohibited by Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.[2] It is also alleged that the Company violated Section 8(a)(3) of the Act, by on or about 10 November laying off 10 of its employees and thereafter on 26 November discharging them.[3]

All parties were given full opportunity to participate, introduce relevant evidence, examine and cross-examine witnesses, argue orally, and file briefs. Briefs filed by the Company and counsel for the General Counsel have been carefully considered.

I conclude below, after examining the relevant evidence and applicable legal principles, that the Company violated the Act substantially as alleged in the complaint.

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

The Company is a division of Overhead Door Company, which is a wholly owned subsidiary of the Dallas Corporation, which is and has been at all times material an Indiana corporation with an office and place of business located in Corpus Christi, Texas, where it is engaged in the manufacture of glass and automatic doors. During the calendar year preceding the issuance of the complaint, a representative period, the Company in the course and conduct of its Corpus Christi, Texas operations purchased and received goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from points outside the State of Texas. During the same time period the Company derived gross revenues in excess of $500,000 from its Corpus Christi, Texas operations. Further, during the same time period the Company sold and shipped from its Corpus Christi, Texas facility goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly to customers located outside the State of Texas. The parties admit and I find the Company is, and at all times material has been, an employer engaged in commerce and in a business affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. LABOR ORGANIZATION

The parties admit and I find the Union is, and at all times material has been, a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

In attempting to establish, or defend against, the claims set forth in the complaint, the parties called some 21 witnesses and presented numerous documents. The testimony and responses are set forth below, essentially in the order established by the complaint with the exception that I have attempted to address all 8(a)(1) allegations before addressing the 8(a)(3) allegations.

Inasmuch as credibility is a material issue in the instant case, I deem it appropriate to make some preliminary comments thereon. In deciding which of the conflicting versions of events is more credible I have given considerable weight to the demeanor of the witnesses while they were on the stand. I have considered each witness' testimony in conjunction with established or admitted facts, inherent probabilities, and reasonable inferences that may be drawn from the record as a whole. With respect to the testimony I have borne in mind the tendency of witnesses in general to testify as to their impressions or interpretations of what was said or done, rather than attempting to give a verbatim account of what they heard, saw, or did. Further, I am not unmindful that even in the case of persons testifying about their own remarks or actions, they may well tend to express what they said or intended to say in clearer or more explicit language than they actually used in their discussions or conversations. As to any witnesses having testified in contradiction of the findings, their testimony has been discredited either as having been in conflict with the testimony of credible witnesses or because it was in and of itself unworthy of belief. All testimony has been reviewed and carefully weighed in light of the entire record. As specific credibility conflicts arise, I will state more specifically my reasons for crediting or discrediting any particular witness on any particular portion of his or her testimony.

A. Background and Undisputed Facts

It is admitted that President Lew Hewitt (Hewitt), Plant Manager Robert Carrier (Carrier), Plant Superintendent David Castillo (Castillo), Supervisor Jose Elizadle (Elizadle), Supervisor Hank Howski (Howski), Supervisor Antonio Cruz (Cruz), Supervisor Gerald McKane (McKane), and Sales Manager Renaldo Salinas (Salinas) are and were at all times material supervisors and agents of the Company within the meaning of Section 2(11) and (13) of the Act.[4]

It is acknowledged that at all times material herein: Allen Bashor (Bashor) was vice president of human resources for the Dallas Corporation, David Hewitt (D. Hewitt) was engineering manager for the Company, and Jeff Williamson (Williamson) was division comptroller for the Company. It is likewise undisputed that Christine Aloquin (Aloquin) is the daughter of Plant Manager Carrier and Jamie P. Martinez (Martinez) and is and at all times material has been an International representative of the Union.

It is undisputed that President Hewitt was notified by the Union on 9 October that it wished to organize the employees at the Company. On 21 October the Union provided the Company a list of those serving on its employee voluntary organizing committee.

In a memorandum dated 3 November, President Hewitt notified all employees at the Company that a layoff was imminent and that the Company would follow its handbook with respect to layoff and recall procedures. In a memorandum dated 4 November, President Hewitt advised all employees that 10 of them had been specifically selected for and would be temporarily laid off effective 10 November. The 10 employees temporarily laid off on that date were: Rene Carreon (Carreon), Jon Eric Davis (Davis), Roy DeLeon (DeLeon), Carlos Garcia (C. Garcia), Joe Garcia (J. Garcia), Franklin Gonzalez Jr. (Gonzalez), Rolando Gutierrez (Gutierrez), Abe Herrera (Herrera), Manuel Mendez (Mendez), and Leonard S. Hoyt (Hoyt). On 26 November President Hewitt notified each of the laid-off employees in writing that they were permanently laid off, as of that date.

On 12 December the Board, in Case 23–RC–5318, conducted an election by secret ballot among the employees of the Company. All the laid-off employees except Hoyt, who did not vote, were challenged by the Company at the election on the basis they were permanently laid off with no reasonable expectancy of recall.

B. The 8(a)(1) Allegations

1. Supervisor Elizadle's alleged comments regarding the rumor of a layoff

It is alleged at paragraph 11 of the complaint that about 31 October Supervisor Elizadle told an employee that he and other employees should be careful because the Company was planning to lay off employees because of the Union and other activities engaged in by employees.

Voluntary organizing committee member Antonio Licon (Licon), a fabricator in the header department under Supervisor Elizadle, openly demonstrated his support for the Union by, among other things, wearing a union button and T-shirt at work. Licon testified Elizadle told him in Spanish at his work station that he should "be careful because there was a layoff coming around because of union activities." Licon placed the conversation somewhere between the time the Union notified the Company on 21 October of the existence of its voluntary organizing committee and the 10 November layoff.[5] Licon said he had not heard any rumors about a pending layoff prior to the time Elizadle spoke to him about an upcoming layoff.

Supervisor Elizadle testified that approximately 2 weeks before the November layoff some employees who were gathered in the framing area asked him if there was going to be a layoff. Elizadle told them as far as he was concerned it was just a rumor but if a layoff did occur he would be the second person to know about it and they would be the next ones to know. Elizadle said he cautioned the employees to keep busy because business was slow. Elizadle remembered there were approximately six or seven employees present in the group but he did not state if one of them was Licon.

I credit Licon's testimony as outlined above. I am persuaded his apparent and admitted nervousness while testifying was as a result of his anxiety about having to testify and not as a result of any willful attempt on his part to misstate the facts. Likewise, his confusion as to dates and whether others were present appeared to have been honest and not caused by any deliberate intent on his part to fabricate facts. Some of Licon's confusion while testifying appeared to have resulted from the fact the conversation he was testifying about had been in Spanish and he was attempting to testify about it in English.[6] On the other hand, Elizadle was not an impressive witness. His recollection on cross-examination was selective and poor.[7]

I find Elizadle's statement in late October or early November that a layoff was coming because of the employees' union activities constituted an unlawful threat of layoff in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

2. Supervisor Elizadle's alleged comments regarding recall of laid-off employees

It is alleged at paragraph 12 of the complaint that about 7 November Supervisor Elizadle informed DeLeon that (a) Elizadle doubted DeLeon and the other employees would be recalled in accordance with the Company's handbook as to layoffs and recalls, as in prior years, and (b) the employees would not be recalled in accordance with the Company's handbook as to layoffs and recalls, as in prior years, because of the Union.

DeLeon an active supporter of the Union[8] worked, from November 1985 until he was laid off in November 1986, for his friend, Supervisor Elizadle.[9] DeLeon testified Elizadle told him and J. Garcia[10] on 8 November that they were going to be laid off on 10 November. DeLeon stated he asked why and Elizadle told them the layoff was not up to him and he had not made out the list of those slated for layoff. Elizadle stated the list had been prepared by Plant Manager Carrier. According to DeLeon he asked if he could be transferred to the shipping and receiving department. Elizadle told him no, that he was going to get someone else to do DeLeon's job. DeLeon then asked if Plant Manager Carrier's daughter was going to be laid off because he had more seniority than she did. Elizadle responded that DeLeon knew very well Plant Manager Carrier's daughter would not be laid off. DeLeon asked Elizadle if anything could be done, or if anything could be worked out about the layoff. Elizadle told him he was sorry he had not made the list out and had not wanted to lay him off. DeLeon asked Elizadle: "[I]f we were really going to get called back and he said I doubt it. And I said why, and he said union. And turned around, and walked away from me." DeLeon stated he was wearing a union hat, button, and sun visor at the time.

Supervisor Elizadle testified he had a conversation with DeLeon on the Friday DeLeon received notification he was going to be laid off effective 10 November. The notification of layoff was in his paycheck envelope. Elizadle testified DeLeon was "pissed off" and said to him: "[H]ey Joe, what the fuck man, what is this shit, you know . . . am I going to be laid-off a day, a year, what the fuck man." Elizadle further testified: "I told him as far as I'm concerned it's just the way the memo states. It's just a temporary layoff. Business picks up I'm pretty sure they'll call you back." Elizadle asserts at that point he left the area where DeLeon was.

Elizadle first testified he could not recall if any mention was made about the Union or union activities during the conversation. However, when pressed further by company counsel he dutifully stated the Union was not mentioned.

I credit DeLeon's above outlined testimony. Elizadle's demeanor and the full record convince me he was not fully candid in his recall of this conversation.

An employer violates Section 8(a)(1) of the Act when it tells employees, as I find Elizadle did, that they will not be recalled from layoff because of their union activities. Compare United Beef Co., 277 NLRB 1014, 1027 (1985).

3. Alleged comments of Superintendent Castillo regarding the layoff

It is alleged at paragraph 13 of the complaint that on or about 5 November Superintendent Castillo informed an employee that the scheduled layoff of 10 November, unlike prior layoffs, would include employees of the Company whom it considered to be "bad ones."[11]

[5] Licon was somewhat confused as to when Elizadle talked to him and somewhat uncertain or confused with respect to whether anyone else was present during the conversation.

[6] Licon stated that approximately 80 percent of the work force spoke Spanish.

[7] E.g., when counsel for the General Counsel asked Elizadle about a conversation he admitted having with Supervisor McKane in 1986 he could not recall in what month it took place and even suggested to counsel for the General Counsel that she "pick [her own] month" as to when it occurred.

[8] DeLeon commenced his union activities in October. He thereafter handbilled at the plant approximately once or twice a week for 4 to 6 weeks and he also wore union hats, buttons, and T-shirts at work.

[9] DeLeon stated he considered Elizadle a friend and that Elizadle coached the softball team he was on. He said Elizadle had visited in his home and had even visited him when he was in the hospital. DeLeon on one occasion sold Elizadle a pet.

[10] DeLeon acknowledged on cross-examination that there was no mention made in his pretrial Board affidavit about J. Garcia having been present for the conversation. Although called as a witness by counsel for the General Counsel, J. Garcia was not questioned about nor did he mention being present at any conversation between Elizadle, DeLeon, and himself.

Voluntary organizing committee member Alonzo Gonzalez (A. Gonzalez) testified that on 5 November Supervisor Elizadle read a paper to his employees about declining sales and the pending layoff. Superintendent Castillo was also present at the time. Gonzalez testified some of the employees asked why the Company could not, as it had done in the past, go to a 4-day workweek and thus avoid a layoff. According to Gonzalez, Castillo responded they had done that in the past out of the goodness of their hearts but for them to "remember . . . we are now the bad guys." Gonzalez testified the conversation ended after Castillo's remarks.[12]

Supervisor Elizadle acknowledged reading a memorandum to the fabrication and door assembly employees on 5 November about the pending layoff. He stated that after he read the memorandum the employees asked Superintendent Castillo "if it was possible for them to . . . scatter the days [off] like they [had done] in the . . . past." Elizadle asserts Castillo replied, "last year it was done by the goodness of his heart, that we're the bad guys remember."[13]

The evidence is very conclusive and I find Superintendent Castillo not only told the fabrication and assembly employees that he had allowed the layoffs to be scattered over a number of days last time out of the goodness of his heart, but that he also told them this time the Company was the "bad guys."

The critical question is whether his comments violated the Act. Viewed in context, I find they did. The Union's campaign was active at the time. Supervisor Elizadle had a few days earlier told employees a layoff was coming because of the employees' union activities. Prior to the advent of the Union there had been at least one layoff that had been accomplished by employees' taking days off spread over a period of time. When Castillo told the employees this past practice with respect to layoffs could not be followed because the Company was the "bad guys," he clearly conveyed to them the message that the layoff was tied to their union activities.[14]

4. Washup rule and parts retrieval restrictions

It is alleged at paragraph 16 of the complaint that about 17 November Supervisor McKane informed employees working in the machine shop that effective that date, they could no longer wash up before breaks or lunch or at the end of the workday, as they had in the past.

Employees at the Company are daily given 15 minutes in the morning, 30 minutes at lunch, and 10 minutes in the afternoon for breaks. All employees take their breaks at the same time. Bells signal the beginning and ending of all breaktimes. Machinist Kendall Lewis (Lewis) testified that at least from May 1984 until November 1986 the employees, with company knowledge, stopped work 2 to 3 minutes before their breaktimes to go to the restrooms and clean up. Lewis stated Supervisor McKane, Superintendent Castillo, and Plant Manager Carrier had observed this practice without saying anything to the employees prior to November 1986. Lewis testified that on 17 November he observed:

> Jerry McKane start on the north end of the machine shop and approaching individuals, talking to each one of them for a minute or so. And when he got to the milling area he called the people that were working on the mills, and the people that were running the saws [Xavier Cisneros, Tony Barrera, Genero Perez, Ron Russel, and Lewis], together. And told us that we would no longer be able to wash our hands before the break bell rang.

According to Lewis, McKane did not mention the Union when he announced the restrictions. Lewis stated that "a few weeks" after the 12 December Board-conducted election was held, McKane told the employees they could wash their hands before quitting time but the restrictions on cleaning up before break-and lunchtimes would continue.

Supervisor Elizadle testified the Company had a written rule that employees were only allowed 5 minutes washup time before the end of each work shift.[15] He, however, said he had never enforced the rule with any of his 30 or so employees. Elizadle said Foreman McKane complained to him in November about his allowing the employees under his supervision to wash up 5 minutes before the noon break. According to Elizadle, McKane said his (McKane's) employees were complaining to him about the disparate enforcement of the rule. Elizadle said he thereafter met with the employees under his supervision and reminded them of the rule. He stated he told them he wanted them to start washing up at noon not 5 minutes before that time, however, he added he never enforced the rule and still does not pay much attention to whether it is adhered to.

It is alleged at paragraph 22(a) of the complaint that on or about 23 October Supervisor Elizadle informed employees that they would no longer be permitted to leave the department to secure parts in other plant departments.

Licon testified Supervisor Elizadle told the employees in his department, right after the Union notified the Company of the existence of its voluntary organizing committee,[16] that they could no longer leave the department to get parts or for any other reason. Elizadle told the employees he had assigned one employee (Davis) to "run parts" and "deliver headers."

[11] I note the language of this paragraph of the complaint does not conform to the findings I have made on this allegation, however, the matter was fully litigated.

[12] Voluntary organizing committee member John Champion corroborated Gonzalez' testimony as outlined above. Champion stated Castillo did not specifically mention the Union when he made his comments.

[13] Castillo recalled telling the employees he had done it in the past out of the goodness of his heart but he contends he added the situation was different this time around. Castillo could not recall referring to himself or the Company as the "bad guys."

[14] The coerciveness of Castillo's comments was not lessened by the fact he made them in response to questions from the employees or that he did not use the word "union" in his comments.

[16] The Union's letter notifying the Company of the existence and makeup of its voluntary organizing committee was mailed to the Company on 21 October.

Supervisor Elizadle testified that around the first of November he was instructed by Plant Manager Carrier and Superintendent Castillo to keep his employees at their work stations in order "to keep them from wandering around and talking to much about the Union."[17] Elizadle stated he told the employees under his supervision that they were to remain at their work stations and if they needed anything to have Davis get it for them. Elizadle stated Davis was assigned the newly created parts runner position approximately 1 month to 6 weeks before he was laid off. Elizadle stated Davis was required to perform his normal fabricator duties when he was not involved in running parts. Elizadle acknowledged that the Company had never previous to the time in question had a parts runner position in his department. He further acknowledged the position was eliminated after Davis and the others were laid off on 10 November. Elizadle asserts the parts runner position was created in order to keep Davis busy and was eliminated when he no longer had a surplus of employees in his department.

The Company contends that because both the washup rule and parts runner position dealt solely with employees worktime not their break or lunch times its enforcement of these rules, restrictions, and assignments was lawful. I reject the Company's contentions.

First I note the Act does not prevent an employer, such as the Company in this case, from making and enforcing reasonable rules addressing employees conduct during worktime. Republic Aviation Corp. v. NLRB, 324 U.S. 793 (1945). However, the Board in Brigadier Industries Corp., 271 NLRB 656, 657 (1984), held:

> When faced with a union organizing campaign an employer may not for union reasons promulgate a no-solicitation and/or no-distribution rule or place other restrictions on employees. Nonetheless, during the union campaign, an employer maintains a legitimate interest in preserving production and discipline. When an employer adopts a rule during a union campaign, it does not automatically follow that the rule is invalid. If the employer has acted for legitimate business interests—rather than for union reasons—its promulgation of a rule cannot be deemed unlawful [emphasis added].

The Board's principle that otherwise valid rules or restrictions violate the Act when such are promulgated to interfere with employees' rights to self-organization rather than to maintain production and discipline have been upheld by the courts. (See, e.g., Harry M. Stevens Services, 277 NLRB 276 (1985), enfd. mem. 793 F.2d 1288 (5th Cir. 1986), and Hunter Douglas, Inc., 277 NLRB 1179, 1185 (1985), enfd. 804 F.2d 808 (3d Cir. 1986).) In the instant case the Company's rule (if in fact one existed) against washing up before break, lunch, and quitting times had not been enforced prior to the advent of the Union.[18] The rule, as announced and enforced by Foreman McKane, took effect in the midst of the Union's campaign and was, in part, rescinded after the Board-conducted election was held. In light of these facts, I am persuaded, in agreement with counsel for the General Counsel, that the rule was announced and for a period of time thereafter enforced, at least by Supervisor McKane, for the purpose of limiting the time employees would have off the work floor for discussing union matters. There is no showing that the long practice of allowing employees to wash up before all breaks had suddenly become a disciplinary or production problem for the Company. Accordingly, I find the Company's purpose in promulgating (or suddenly enforcing) the rule in question was to interfere with its employees' right to self-organization and as such violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

With respect to the newly created parts runner position, I find the evidence is overwhelming the Company was unlawfully motivated in establishing such a position. First, the parts runner position was created immediately after the Company received notification of the creation and composition of the Union's voluntary organizing committee. Second, the parts runner position was specifically intended to keep employees from "talking too much about the Union." Third, there is no conclusive evidence that production or discipline was suffering as a result of employees talking while they worked. Fourth, the position was abolished after the 10 November layoffs took place. The timing of the creation of the parts runner position coupled with its stated purpose and in the absence of evidence of any disciplinary or production problems compels a finding that the rule against employees leaving their work stations was discriminatorily motivated in that it was intended to prevent employees from discussing the Union.

Accordingly, I find the Company's newly established rule of restricting its employees to their work stations by utilizing a parts runner position was motivated by the purpose of interfering with its employees right to self-organization in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

5. Confrontation between President Hewitt and International Union Representative Martinez and Plant Manager Carriers' comments

It is alleged at paragraph 17 of the complaint that about 10 December, 2 days prior to the election scheduled to be conducted in Case 23-RC-5318, outside of the plant, while employees were engaged in handbilling activities on their own time, and in the presence of the employees laid off and discharged and other employees, President Hewitt and Plant Manager Carrier in the presence of company agent Roy Blankenship and President Hewitt's sons David and Daniel Hewitt confronted International Union Representative Martinez whereby: (a) President Hewitt asked Martinez if he was going to call Hewitt a liar to his face; (b) International union representative Martinez stated that the handbilling was nonviolent and employees had Section 7 rights to solicit and distribute literature outside the Company's property; (c) either David or Daniel Hewitt pushed Martinez and yelled at him to "Answer the man"; and (d) as Martinez was walking away, Plant Manager Carrier told the laid-off employees that he would see to it that they would never work for the Company again.

[17] Elizadle stated that when he talked to his employees about wandering around the plant he did not say anything to them regarding what they could do on their lunch and break times.

[18] Employee Lewis credibly and without contradiction testified Foreman McKane, Superintendent Castillo, and Plant Manager Carrier had observed that practice and had not said anything about it.

International Union Representative Martinez testified that starting in October he and various employees of the Company handbilled at the plant entrances on several occasions. Martinez stated that on one such occasion, which took place on 10 December, and at a time when approximately 30 to 40 employees were present,[19] President Hewitt came from the plant "yelling" for "Jamie Martinez."[20] Martinez identified himself as an International union representative and as the person President Hewitt was "yelling" for. Martinez testified Hewitt asked "in a very loud voice," "Are you going to call me a liar to my face?"[21] Martinez testified he spoke to the employees that were present and told them, "We're with the union and we've got a right to solicit," "We're nonviolent," "We've got a right to be here and solicit." According to Martinez, President Hewitt's son, Engineering Manager D. Hewitt, pushed him into the street using the palms of his hands and his chest. Martinez stated that as Engineering Manager D. Hewitt was pushing him into the street he was "yelling" into his ear, "spitting" in his face, and instructing him to "Answer the man." Martinez asserts he was pushed from the sidewalk across a curb into the street.[22]

President Hewitt testified the Union had circulated two handbills among the employees in December one of which implied he was a liar and the other that he was a hypocrite. Hewitt stated the leaflets were, in his opinion, extremely unfair and untrue and caused him a great deal of personal distress. President Hewitt said he met with employees of various departments at the plant on 10 December. He stated that in those meetings at which members of the Union's voluntary organizing committee were present he told them he had had enough insinuations that he was a liar and a hypocrite. He told the voluntary organizing committee members that if they knew how to get in touch with International Union Representative Martinez they should do so, because he was "going to confront him that afternoon." President Hewitt stated that as the day wore on he became "more determined" to have a confrontation with Martinez and set the matter straight between them. Hewitt said he did not know if anyone actually got word to Martinez, but that Martinez was just off company property handbilling that afternoon. President Hewitt testified he walked up to Martinez and asked him who he was. He stated Martinez identified himself and he asked Martinez if he had gotten his message. Martinez said he had not. Hewitt then told Martinez, "[Y]ou've been saying that I've been lying, and that's not true, and I want you to apologize for it." Hewitt stated Martinez looked at him for a while and then began to say something about employee rights and so forth. Hewitt testified he asked "again and again" "probably more loudly" if Martinez had called him a liar. He said Martinez would not answer him. President Hewitt testified his oldest son, Engineering Manager D. Hewitt, got within an inch or two of Martinez and repeatedly told Martinez to "Answer the man." Martinez would not respond. President Hewitt said he then reached out and touched his son David and told him, "We're not going to get an answer, let's go." President Hewitt said they then returned to his office. According to President Hewitt the entire confrontation lasted approximately 5 to 10 minutes. Hewitt denied anyone touched Martinez.

Several supervisors testified regarding what they observed and heard during the confrontation. Supervisor Howski testified the confrontation "got pretty loud and nasty." Howski testified Engineering Manager D. Hewitt stood "face to face . . . not more than an inch away" from Martinez, but he did not see him push Martinez. Supervisor Cruz testified President Hewitt was red in the face, speaking loudly, and visibly upset. He also said Engineering Manager D. Hewitt was very upset at Martinez. Cruz, however, stated he was not close enough to the confrontation to see if any touching took place between the participants. Supervisor Elizadle stated President Hewitt and Engineering Manager D. Hewitt were both "yelling" at Martinez; however, he added that because he (Elizadle) was short of stature he was unable to see if the Hewitts touched Martinez. Vice President of Human Resources for the Dallas Corporation Bashor testified, "they were not speaking in a civil tone" and "the emotions were increasing," but he asserts neither of the Hewitts struck nor touched Martinez.

Certain facts are beyond dispute. The confrontation was deliberate and preplanned by President Hewitt. He even challenged employees who supported the Union to get the word to Martinez, that he wanted a confrontation that afternoon. A high-level representative of the parent company did nothing to discourage or prevent the confrontation from taking place, because as the Dallas Corporation Vice President of Human Resources Bashor stated, "Lew [Hewitt] felt strongly about it." The challenge for the confrontation and the confrontation was known to and took place in front of numerous rank-and-file employees. President Hewitt and Engineering Manager D. Hewitt approached Martinez in an angry, loud, and emotionally charged manner.

[19] Martinez estimated there were 50 employees present after others came from the plant at quitting time on that date.

[20] President Hewitt was accompanied by his sons David and Daniel Hewitt, Plant Manager Carrier, Supervisors Elizadle, McKane, Cruz, and others.

[21] Martinez explained the background to President Hewitt's question as follows. Martinez said he had filed charges with the Board against the Company and that President Hewitt had on 3 December informed the employees in writing the charges would delay the election scheduled for 12 December. Martinez testified he put out a handbill on 5 December informing the employees the election would be held as scheduled and that President Hewitt's information to the contrary was "a lie."

[22] Vasquez, J. Garcia, and Davis corroborated in essential parts Martinez' testimony as outlined above. Vasquez did add that traffic was approaching on the street at the time Engineering Manager D. Hewitt pushed Martinez into the street. Vasquez asserts, contrary to Martinez, that Martinez told President Hewitt he did not call him a liar. I am persuaded on this latter point that Vasquez was mistaken. However, I do not find this to impact on the credibility resolutions I have made. Furthermore, J. Garcia testified he did not hear President Hewitt talk at all but stated, "David Hewitt came up to [Martinez] and yelled in his ear, shoving him away" and told him "to get off the premises." Again I do not find these minor variations regarding what took place on 10 December to detract from the truthfulness of Martinez' account of what took place.

It is in light of this background that I consider whether Engineering Manager D. Hewitt physically assaulted Martinez. I find he did. Martinez' testimony that D. Hewitt assaulted him was corroborated by employees Vasquez and J. Garcia. Furthermore, it is very probable that in the emotionally charged confrontation D. Hewitt assaulted Martinez. Engineering Manager D. Hewitt, although still employed by the Company, did not testify, nor was his failure to do so explained in any way. Hence, the one additional person, on the part of the Company, who could have spoken with firsthand knowledge of the account, chose, for whatever reason, to remain silent.[23]

An employer violates Section 8(a)(1) of the Act, by assaulting a union representative when it does so in the presence of one or more employees under circumstances where onlookers would likely infer from the assault that the employer would also retaliate in the same fashion against any employee who supported the union. Batavia Nursing Inn, 275 NLRB 886, 891 fn. 2 (1985).

In the case sub judice, I find the employees could reasonably have believed that such a fate might befall them as had befallen the Union's International representative if they supported the Union. The reason announced to the employees for the confrontation grew out of the Union's campaign literature. The actual assault took place at a time when the Union's International representative was telling the employees they had a legal right to organize in a nonviolent manner. Thus, I find the Company violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act when Engineering Manager D. Hewitt assaulted the Union's representative in the presence of the employees of the Company.

Martinez testified that one of the leaflets they were attempting to distribute on 10 December pertained to unemployment compensation payments for the laid-off employees.

Vasquez testified Herrera was one of those handbilling on 10 December and that he had copies of two unemployment checks that he showed Plant Manager Carrier. Davis testified that at that same time Plant Manager Carrier's daughter was telling International Union Representative Martinez to answer President Hewitt's questions about whether he had called him a liar. According to Davis, Herrera said Carrier's daughter did not have the right to say anything because she did not have any seniority and should have been one of the first to have been laid off. J. Garcia stated Herrera told Plant Manager Carrier that the laid-off employees would get their jobs back and with justice. According to J. Garcia, Plant Manager Carrier answered that the laid-off employees were not coming back to work.[24]

Plant Manager Carrier testified he did not have a conversation with Herrera on 10 December, but he said he heard Herrera make some comment about his daughter who was standing next to him at the time. Carrier testified he did not hear anyone say any words to the effect that certain of the employees would never work at the Company again.[25]

Simply stated I find unbelievable the testimony that Plant Manager Carrier stood by at this highly charged confrontation and said nothing. I find this highly unlikely especially considering the fact his daughter was actively participating in the verbal part of the confrontation and was at the same time being accused of receiving preferential treatment because she was Carrier's daughter. I credit counsel for the General Counsel's witnesses regarding the incident. I do not find the minor differences in their testimony to detract from the overall accuracy of their testimony.

I find the Company through Plant Manager Carrier violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act, when he threatened that the laid-off employees would not be considered for recall by the Company because he would see to it.

6. President Hewitt's 14 January comments

It is alleged at paragraph 18 of the complaint that about 14 January, President Hewitt (a) asked employees if they were giving information to International Union Representative Martinez regarding the unfair labor practice charges filed by the Union in Cases 23-CA-10594, 23-CA-10595, and 23-CA-10596; (b) told employees, when they did not respond, that Hewitt had heard that the Union was having employees sign checkoff cards on company property and that this had to stop; (c) stated to employees that even if they were signing up employees for checkoff authorizations during their breaks, they could not do it at any time and that the election was "over with"; and (d) told employees that Hewitt wanted to know of any future activities any of the employees engaged in on behalf of the Union.

It is undisputed that President Hewitt spoke to all employees and supervisors at a meeting held in the quality control room at the plant on 14 January 1987. President Hewitt said he called the meeting to bring the employees up to date on the status of the Board-conducted election and to talk about foreign competition. According to Licon and Vasquez, Hewitt stated there had been unfair labor practice charges filed against the Company and he wanted to know who was responsible for giving the information to the Union on which the charges were based. Licon and Vasquez stated President Hewitt specifically asked employee Gordon Klitzke if he was the one who had given the information to the Union. Klitzke denied doing so.[26]

[24] Vasquez, Davis, and International Representative Martinez corroborated, although in slightly different ways, the essential aspects of J. Garcia's above testimony. Vasquez, for example, stated Plant Manager Carrier said the laid-off employees would not be coming back to work as long as he was around. Davis stated Carrier said Herrera would never come back to work at the Company again. International Union Representative Martinez testified Plant Manager Carrier said the laid-off employees would not be coming back to work and that he would see to it they did not. Herrera did not testify nor was his absence explained in any manner.

[25] President Hewitt testified he never heard any official of the Company say he would see to it the laid-off employees never worked for the Company again. The Dallas Corporation Vice President of Human Resources Bashor testified he did not hear Plant Manager Carrier say anything during the confrontation. Supervisor Elizadle said he did not hear Carrier say anything at the confrontation but added he was giving his attention to the "yelling" that was going on at the time. Supervisor Howski testified he did not even know if Carrier was present at the confrontation. Supervisor Cruz could not recall what if anything Carrier might have said at the confrontation but he believed Carrier did not say anything.

Licon credibly testified President Hewitt also said he had heard rumors that employees were trying to get dues checkoff cards signed at the plant, and he did not want anyone signing up employees on company property and to please stop doing so.[27]

After observing Hewitt, Licon, and Vasquez testify, and weighing their testimony in light of admissions made by Hewitt, I credit Licon's and Vasquez' version of the 14 January 1987 general employees' meeting.

I find President Hewitt violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act when he asked all the assembled employees who among them had been giving information to the Union that formed the basis for the Union's charges against the Company. The totality of the circumstances dictates such a finding. See Rossmore House, 269 NLRB 1176 (1984), enfd. sub nom. Hotel & Restaurant Employees Local 11 v. NLRB, 760 F.2d 1006 (9th Cir. 1985). The questioning was done by the highest official of the Company. The question asked was not rhetorical but rather was calculated to invoke a response from the employees that would reveal their union sympathies at a mandatory meeting of employees. Further, President Hewitt also violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act, when he specifically singled out employee Klitzke and asked him if he was the one who had been supplying the information in question to the Union. Other than Hewitt's assertion that he knew Klitzke had not been supplying information to the Union, there is no evidence to indicate Klitzke had expressed his views, one way or the other, on the Union prior to that time. Furthermore, Klitzke was interrogated in front of all his fellow workers and for no valid or justifiable reason. I also find President Hewitt's statement to the assembled employees that he did not want them to solicit union dues checkoff cards on company property and to stop doing so violated the Act. In this regard, I note such a broad prohibition would clearly restrict employees from soliciting for the Union during their nonworking time on company premises.

It is undisputed that after the above-described meeting took place President Hewitt and Plant Manager Carrier met with Licon and Vasquez in Hewitt's office. Licon testified President Hewitt asked them if they were the ones that had been giving unfair labor practice charge-related information to International Union Representative Martinez. Licon told Hewitt they had not given any such information to Martinez. According to Licon President Hewitt said, "if there was any further union activities going on that he would like to be notified, instead of being caught off [guard] . . . with rumors and stuff." Vasquez testified President Hewitt also asked if they were the ones who had been soliciting employees to sign dues-checkoff cards. Vasquez told Hewitt he had been. Hewitt asked when he had done so. Vasquez told Hewitt, "I'm doing it on my own time which is before work, breaks, lunch, and after work." Vasquez testified President Hewitt told him he preferred they stop soliciting because the Union had not been recognized by the Company. Vasquez protested saying he had been doing it on his own time. Hewitt responded, "but you're still on [C]ompany property." Vasquez told Hewitt he would stop because he did not want to do anything that would harm anyone.

President Hewitt acknowledged he and Plant Manager Carrier met with Licon and Vasquez on the day in question. Hewitt said a complaint from an employee that Licon and Vasquez had constantly been after the employee to sign a union dues deduction card prompted the meeting. Hewitt acknowledged he asked Licon and Vasquez if they had been soliciting for the Union and he asserts they admitted they had. Hewitt said he told them:

> I may be wrong, but it is my opinion that until the [U]nion is certified, that it's not proper to ask employees to sign the cards. After it is certified that's fine, but until it is certified, I don't think it is proper.

According to Hewitt, Licon responded they had already decided not to solicit anymore. Hewitt testified he then told them, "I think out of courtesy to us that you should tell us when you are planning to do that again." Hewitt said they indicated they would do so.[28]

That a meeting between the two employees and two management officials took place after the general meeting on 14 January 1987 is not disputed nor is there any dispute with respect to the subject matters discussed. To the extent that there are differences between the employees' and managers' versions of what was said at the meeting, I credit the employees' account. I credit the employees' account because it is clear from the record as a whole that President Hewitt was determined to find out who had provided charge-related information to the Union and who had been soliciting dues-deduction cards on company property. Not only did he attempt to ascertain this type of information from the employees at the general meeting, but he had also directed at that general meeting that all card signing activities cease on company property. In light of his earlier actions it is quite logical and very probable that he said exactly what Licon and Vasquez attribute to him. Furthermore, President Hewitt impressed me as a very determined individual who would do or say whatever he perceived to be in his, or the Company's, best interest without full regard for the consequences of his actions.

[26] President Hewitt acknowledged discussing certain unfair labor practice charges with the employees but stated he did so in the context of telling the employees that if the charges against the Company did not stop they would never get the Board-conducted election resolved. Hewitt also acknowledged asking Klitzke if he was the one who had supplied the information to the Union on which it based its charges against the Company. He added however that he knew "beyond question that he [Klitzke] would not be the one who was making charges against us."

[27] Vasquez corroborated Licon's above-outlined testimony. President Hewitt acknowledged discussing dues-checkoff cards with the assembled employees. He said he told the employees he had been getting complaints that they were trying to get others to sign dues-checkoff cards. He also said he told the employees he did not think it was proper for them to ask others to sign dues-checkoff cards because the Union had not been certified. He asserts he told the employees it was their privilege to sign or refuse to sign such cards.

I find President Hewitt's questioning known union supporters Licon and Vasquez was, under all the circumstances herein, coercive and as such violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. First, the questioning took place after but on the same day Hewitt had unlawfully interrogated the entire assembled work force about the same subject matter. Second, the questioning took place in President Hewitt's office and in the presence of Plant Manager Carrier. Third, President Hewitt had already, at a group meeting, attempted to ascertain who had provided the information in question to the Union and after being unsuccessful there moved on to questioning Licon and Vasquez in the privacy of his office in his attempt to find out what he wanted to know.

I also find President Hewitt violated the Act by telling Licon and Vasquez he did not want them to solicit their fellow workers to sign dues deduction cards on company property, especially in light of the fact Vasquez told Hewitt that he had only done so during nonworking times.

7. Elizadle's alleged comments about who could vote in the Board-conducted election

It is alleged at paragraph 19 of the complaint that Supervisor Elizadle about 1 December informed employees that Plant Manager Carrier had informed Elizadle that because the employees that were laid off were now permanently discharged they could not vote in the election on 12 December in Case 23–RC–5318.

Licon testified that about 1 December Supervisor Elizadle approached him while he was alone[29] in his work area and told him the 10 laid-off employees were terminated and would be ineligible to vote in the election because of their union activities.

Supervisor Elizadle, after some difficulty in recalling an early December conversation with Licon about the layoffs, acknowledged such took place. However, he stated Licon asked him if the laid-off employees could vote in the Board-conducted election. He said he told Licon he did not know.

As is noted elsewhere in this decision Licon was somewhat confused about certain details in his testimony; however, I am persuaded his confusion was honest and not an attempt to misstate facts. I credit his testimony regarding his early December conversation with Elizadle. I note Supervisor Elizadle had told Licon back in October that he should be careful that a layoff was coming because of the Union. Furthermore, Elizadle had told employee DeLeon in early November that he doubted the laid-off employees would be recalled because of the Union. It is therefore logical and probable that he told Licon the laid-off employees had been terminated and would not be eligible to vote in the election because of their union activities.[30]

Elizadle's statement was clearly coercive and in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act, in that it conveyed a message to the employees that the Company's latest action against the laid-off employees was taken because of their union activities and to preclude them from voting in the Board-conducted election.

8. Elizadle's alleged comments about negotiations

It is alleged at paragraph 22(c) of the complaint that Supervisor Elizadle about 1 December told an employee that it would take at least 2 years before they would reach an agreement on a contract and to cause further delay all the Company had to do was relocate or change its name in order to do away with the Union.

Licon testified that on 6 March 1987 he and fellow employees Vasquez and Lopez were discussing how long it would take to negotiate a contract when Supervisor Elizadle approached them.[31] Licon testified Supervisor Elizadle told them it would take at least 2 years for the Company and Union to negotiate a contract, and even if they did the Company could delay it further by changing its name or relocating its facility. According to Licon, Elizadle also told them such action on the part of the Company would do away with the Union. Licon stated that after Supervisor Elizadle finished talking they more or less ended their discussion because they did not want to antagonize Elizadle.

Supervisor Elizadle stated he had a 2- to 3-minute conversation about the Union with Licon in March 1987. According to Elizadle, Licon asked if it was true that it would take 2 years or something like that for the Union to come in. Elizadle said he told Licon he did not know. Licon then told Elizadle he had heard if the Union came in all the Company had to do was change its name or move to avoid the Union. Elizadle said he told Licon he did not know anything about that. Elizadle stated that ended their conversation because Licon was walking along with a heavy item at the time.

As is more fully explained elsewhere in this decision, I did not find Elizadle to be an impressive or credible witness. Licon on the other hand appeared to be making a conscientious effort to tell the truth to the best of his recollection. Accordingly, I credit Licon's account of his March conversation with Elizadle as set forth above.

Supervisor Elizadle's March 1987 statement to Licon and others was coercive and violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act, in that it conveyed the message to the employees that it was futile for them to select the Union as their bargaining representative. See, e.g., Thriftway Supermarket, 276 NRLB 1450, 1460 (1985), enfd. mem. 808 F.2d 835 (4th Cir. 1986).

9. Plant Manager Carrier's alleged comments on an employee's wage review

It is alleged at paragraph 22(d) of the complaint that Plant Manager Carrier about 10 December solicited an employee's comment on his recent wage review and threatened that employee that if the employees voted for the Union the raise would be rescinded.

[29] On cross-examination Licon stated Vasquez could have been present when Elizadle talked to him but he could not be certain.

[30] I noted there had been discussions at the Company among some of the managers on this subject. Superintendent Castillo testified Plant Manager Carrier told him that because the laid-off employees had been permanently laid off they would not be able to vote in the Board-conducted election.

[31] Licon assumed Elizadle overheard what they were discussing.

Voluntary organizing committee member John Champion testified he was given a review for a wage increase on 9 December and the next day (10 December) Plant Manager Carrier asked him about it. He said the two of them were alone at the time. Champion testified Carrier asked him if he had been given his wage review. Champion told Carrier he had. Carrier asked if it was a good one and Champion responded he had no complaints that he had gotten a raise. According to Champion, Plant Manager Carrier said, "I'm glad you got a good one, because if you guys vote the wrong way we won't have this any more."

Plant Manager Carrier testified Champion told him at the beginning of December he felt he had been skipped over when the other employees had been given wage reviews in November. Carrier checked into the matter and found Champion had in fact been skipped over. Carrier testified he instructed Champion's supervisor to review him for a wage increase. Carrier stated he later followed up on the matter by asking Champion if he had been reviewed, and if he was happy and satisfied. Carrier stated Champion indicated he was satisfied. Carrier stated the Union was not mentioned in their conversations.

I am persuaded that Plant Manager Carrier made the comments Champion attributes to him. The record evidence as a whole supports such a finding in that Plant Manager Carrier had a keen interest in the outcome of the union election. His keen interest led him to engage in conduct that violated the Act. He, for example, stated at the confrontation between President Hewitt and International Union Representative Martinez that the laid-off employees would not be recalled because he would see to it. As is discussed below he asked employee Lewis the day before the election how he was going to vote in the election. Although not found to be unlawful, he told Plant Superintendent Castillo the laid-off employees were permanently laid off and would not be able to vote. Although I have found Carrier's comments to have violated the Act, I do not find his remarks constituted a threat to rescind the wage increase involved but rather to constitute an unlawful threat that there would not be any future wage increases if the employees voted the wrong way in the Board-conducted election.

10. Plant Manager Carrier's alleged questioning of employee Lewis

It is alleged at paragraph 22(e) of the complaint that Plant Manager Carrier about 11 December interrogated an employee concerning how he planned to vote in the upcoming election.

Employee Kendall Lewis testified that on 11 December as he was alone walking from lunch[32] in the sheet metal fabrication area Plant Manager Carrier approached and asked him if he had decided which way he was going to vote in the election. Lewis told Carrier he had not decided. Lewis said that prior to Plant Manager Carrier's talking with him he had not in any way demonstrated his preference either for or against the Union.

Plant Manager Carrier testified he could not recall having a conversation in December with Lewis about the Union. He stated he knew however, by December, that Lewis supported the Union by his "mannerisms" and by the fact he had a union decal on his toolbox.

I credit Lewis' testimony as set forth above. I note Plant Manager Carrier was unable to deny the conversation. In crediting Lewis' testimony I note he had not expressed his views about the Union prior to Plant Manager Carrier's questioning him on 11 December. I find, under all the circumstances, that Carrier's questioning of Lewis was coercive. See Rossmore House, supra. Lewis had not made his union sympathies known at the time Carrier questioned him and the question specifically sought Lewis' personal sympathies about the Union. Plant Manager Carrier was a high-level management official who did not directly supervise Lewis and the questioning took place 1 day before the election for no valid or justifiable reason. Accordingly, I find the Company violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by coercively interrogating Lewis. See H.S.M. Machine Works, 284 NLRB 1482 (1987).

C. Temporary and Permanent Layoff of 10 Employees

It is alleged at paragraph 14 of the complaint and admitted by the Company in its answer that on 10 November it laid off its employees Carreon, Davis, DeLeon, C. Garcia, J. Garcia, Gonzalez, Gutierrez, Herrera, Mendez, and Hoyt. It is further alleged at paragraph 15 of the complaint that about 26 November the Company permanently discharged the above-named employees. The Company acknowledges the above employees were notified in writing, on that date, that they were permanently laid off.

Inasmuch as there is no dispute with respect to the fact the employees in question were laid off, first on a temporary and then later on a permanent basis, I shall examine the motives behind and the alleged necessity for the layoffs. In doing so, I shall examine the union activities of the laid-off employees, whether the Company knew of those activities, and whether those activities played any part in the Company's decision to have a layoff. Finally, I shall examine the Company's contention that the layoffs were brought about by economic necessity.

1. Events leading up to employees' union activities at the Company

Licon credibly testified that he and approximately 15 other employees met after work at Chiquita Park in Corpus Christi, Texas, in late June to discuss problems they perceived existed at the Company. They discussed wages, sick leave, supervision, and other related matters. Licon testified they also decided to attempt to arrange a meeting with President Hewitt or Plant Manager Carrier to discuss their problems. He said they also decided to contact a union for assistance.

Licon stated that the next day the same 15 employees met with Plant Manager Carrier and Supervisor Elizadle. Licon testified Carrier told the group the Company was trying to put together a plan for an across-the-board wage increase for all employees, and promised to look into their other concerns. However, Plant Manager Carrier told them:

> [T]his was America, this was a free country, and if we didn't like it there was the door. There was other opportunities you know, other places. That times were hard for the company to increase our pay rates.

Licon stated he thereafter on 16 July contacted International Union Representative Martinez via telephone and arranged to meet with him later that afternoon at a local motel. They discussed the various departments at the plant and some of the problems the employees were experiencing.[33] Licon stated little else was accomplished at the meeting with Martinez, however, in early October he and others started to solicit employees to sign union authorization cards. According to Licon a union voluntary organizing committee was established and the Company was notified in writing on 21 October of the existence of the Union's in-plant committee. The letter of notification sent to the Company listed nine voluntary organizing committee members.[34] Inasmuch as none of those on the voluntary organizing committee were laid off, I shall carefully examine the union activities of those who were laid off and attempt to ascertain if the Company was aware of any such activities on their part.

2. Union activities of laid-off employees

Carreon testified he wore a "Yes IUE" button at work three to four times per week starting in mid-October. He stated his immediate supervisor Elizadle saw him wearing the prounion buttons. Carreon testified he handbilled for the Union at the plant four or five times before the layoff. He testified he saw Davis and Gutierrez leafleting prior to the layoff. Carreon stated Plant Manager Carrier observed them leafleting each time they did so.

Davis testified he became involved with the Union shortly after he was hired and wore a union T-shirt to work two or three times during the 2 weeks before his layoff. He stated his supervisor, Elizadle, saw him four or five times and Plant Manager Carrier a couple of times each time he wore his prounion T-shirt. Davis also said he wore IUE buttons and leafleted in the parking lot, or inside the plant during breaktimes, six or seven times prior to his layoff.

DeLeon testified he commenced wearing union T-shirts, hats, and buttons in mid-October and did so almost every day until he was laid off. He stated he leafleted at the plant once or twice per week in the mornings and after work from approximately early October until he was laid off. DeLeon stated Gonzalez, among others, leafleted with him prior to the layoff. He stated Supervisor Elizadle observed them each time they leafleted and Plant Manager Carrier saw them almost every time they leafleted.

J. Garcia testified he wore prounion buttons daily and prounion sun visors and T-shirts at work every other day starting in late October. He stated he was observed by his supervisor, Elizadle, daily and by Plant Manager Carrier just about every day that he wore the union-related items. J. Garcia testified he, Gutierrez, Davis, Gonzalez, and others leafleted at the plant starting in late October.[35] He said Plant Manager Carrier observed them each time they leafleted.

Gutierrez testified he wore a union T-shirt or union button three times per week for approximately 4 weeks before he was laid off. He stated Plant Manager Carrier, Superintendent Castillo, and Supervisor Elizadle saw him wearing the union-related items. Gutierrez testified he, along with Mendez, J. Garcia, Carreon, and Herrera, leafleted outside the plant prior to the November layoff. He asserts Plant Manager Carrier observed them doing so.

Mendez testified he wore a union T-shirt approximately twice and union buttons four or five times at work starting in the second week in October.[36] He stated his immediate supervisor Cruz as well as Plant Manager Carrier observed him wearing the union related items. Mendez testified he as well as Carreon, Gutierrez, and others leafleted at the entrance to the plant parking lot prior to the layoff. He stated they were observed doing so by Plant Manager Carrier.

Vasquez testified he wore a union button just about every day starting around 9 October and a union T-shirt twice a week commencing about that same time. Vasquez stated President Hewitt and Plant Manager Carrier observed him doing so. Vasquez testified he and other employees leafleted at the plant from mid-October until December. He stated all the laid-off employees, including Hoyt, leafleted prior to and after they were laid-off.

A. Gonzalez testified that he and others including Carreon, J. Garcia, DeLeon, and Gutierrez leafleted at the plant several times prior to the 10 November layoff. A. Gonzalez stated Plant Manager Carrier or Supervisor Howski always observed them with Carrier doing so more often than Howski.

Champion testified he and others including J. Garcia leafleted at the plant prior to the layoff. Champion stated that "most of the time" Plant Manager Carrier observed the leafleting.

3. Company knowledge of union activities of laid-off employees

Supervisor Howski, who did not supervise any of the laid-off employees,[37] testified he never saw any of those who were laid off wearing or displaying any union-related items, such as T-shirts, buttons, hats, or stickers. Howski acknowledged leafleting took place before the employees were laid off, but he asserted he never saw any of those who were laid off, that he knew, participating in the leafleting prior to the layoff.[38]

[33] Others present at the meeting were Janie Garcia (Licon's sister-in-law who is the president of Union Local 1029) and Josie Vela (a friend of Licon's).

[34] None of the nine listed on the letter were among those laid off on 10 November.

[35] He said he leafleted six or seven times before the layoff.

[36] He said the T-shirts had "IUE a Great Union" on them and the union buttons read "Vote Yes" or "Proud To Be IUE."

[37] Howski testified Mendez was on loan to his department prior to the layoff. He said he saw Mendez leafleting at the plant but that it was after the layoff.

Supervisor Cruz testified that two of the laid-off employees, Hoyt and Mendez, worked under his supervision. Cruz stated Hoyt never did anything that indicated to him that Hoyt favored the Union. He, however, stated he believed from things Mendez said that he favored the Union. Cruz observed employees wearing union T-shirts at the plant, but he could not recall if it was before or after the layoff took place. Cruz testified he knew certain of the laid-off employees by sight only, and that of those he knew by sight only, he never observed them leafleting at the plant. Cruz, however, acknowledged on cross-examination that he could not describe what laid-off employees Carreon, Davis, DeLeon, Gonzalez, Gutierrez, or Herrera looked like. Cruz further acknowledged on cross-examination that on the days when there was leafleting he only observed it for approximately 1 minute or less as he was on his way to his car in the parking lot.

Elizalde testified he supervised seven[39] of the laid-off employees and he said he never saw any of them[40] leafleting prior to the November layoff. He said he saw Herrera, Davis, and J. Garcia handbilling after they were laid off. He testified the first time he saw employees wearing union T-shirts was around Thanksgiving after the layoffs had taken place.[41] Elizalde stated he had seen union buttons and stickers in the plant prior to the layoff.

Plant Manager Carrier stated he positioned himself so as to be able to observe the leafleting every time it occurred at the plant. He said the leafleting first started sometime between 9 and 22 October and that International Union Representative Martinez along with some employees on the voluntary organizing commmittee leafleted once or twice a week before the layoff and sometimes as much as three times per week after the layoff.[42] When asked by company counsel if he knew in early November the position of the laid-off employees with respect to whether they were for or against the Union, Carrier answered, "I don't know . . . I would say no. No, I didn't know."

It is without dispute that the Company knew of the Union's presence at its facility from 9 October forward.[43] The Company was notified in writing about 21 October which of its employees were on the Union's voluntary organizing committee. Further, it is undisputed the Union engaged in leafleting activities at the entrances to the plant on various occasions starting in October. There is dispute with respect to the critical question of whether the employees that were laid off engaged in any union activities prior to their being laid-off, and whether the Company was aware of any such activities on their part.

The overwhelming weight of the evidence persuades me that each of the 10 laid-off employees engaged in activities on behalf of the Union, prior to their being laid off, and that the Company knew of their activities. Vasquez testified, and I credit his testimony, that all 10 of the laid-off employees leafleted at the plant prior to their being laid off. I note that Plant Manager Carrier observed all leafleting.[44] International Union Representative Martinez corroborated Vasquez' testimony that all 10 of the laid-off employees leafleted at the plant prior to their being laid off. Carreon, Davis, DeLeon, J. Garcia, Gutierrez, Mendez, A. Gonzalez, Champion, and Licon collectively corroborated Vasquez' testimony by identifying the same 10 individuals in the process of leafleting at one time or other prior to the layoff.[45] Although it is conceivable that all 11 of the above witnesses called by counsel for the General Counsel contrived their testimony or were mistaken regarding what they testified about, however, that is highly unlikely. As noted in Fred Stark, 213 NLRB 209, 214 (1974), the likelihood of perjury or mistake becomes more remote in direct or geometrical proportion to the number of persons who testify to a fact. Further evidence of the Company's knowledge of the union activities of its laid-off employees is demonstrated by the fact Carreon wore a union button two to three times a week starting in October and Supervisor Elizadle observed him doing so. Davis wore union buttons and T-shirts and Elizadle also observed him doing so. DeLeon wore union buttons, T-shirts, and hats until the layoff. J. Garcia wore union buttons daily and union T-shirts and sun visors every other day and was observed by Supervisor Elizadle daily and Plant Manager Carrier almost every day. Gutierrez wore a union T-shirt or union button three times per week during the 4 weeks before he was laid-off and Plant Manager Carrier observed him doing so. Mendez wore a union T-shirt twice before being laid off and union buttons approximately five times in mid-October. The buttons Mendez wore read "Vote Yes" and "Proud To Be IUE" and the T-shirts he wore read, "IUE a Great Union." I note Mendez' testimony comports with International Union Representative Martinez' testimony that he distributed union T-shirts, buttons, and related items to the employees in the second week of October with the words, "Proud To Be IUE" on some of them.

Hostility for and knowledge of the laid-off employees organizing activities is further demonstrated by various of the unfair labor practices the Company engaged in prior to the 10 November layoff. The Company, immediately after it received word of the existence of the voluntary organizing committee, created a parts runner position in Supervisor Elizadle's department for the purpose of interfering with its employees' right to self-organization by keeping them from "talking too much about the Union." Supervisor Elizadle told Licon, in late October or early November, that a layoff was coming at the plant because of the employees' union activities. Superintendent Castillo conveyed to the fabrication and assembly department employees the clear impression that the 10 November layoff was tied to their union activities when he, in the presence of Supervisor Elizadle, told them the Company would not follow its past practice of laying the employees off for 1 day a week over a period of time inasmuch as the Company was now the "bad guys." On 8 November Supervisor Elizadle told DeLeon and J. Garcia he doubted they would be recalled from layoff because of the employees' union activities.

[38] Howski said he saw Mendez, Davis, and Herrera leafleting after they and the others were laid off. He acknowledged he could not describe what the other seven employees who were laid off looked like.

[39] He supervised Carreon, J. Garcia, Gonzalez, Davis, DeLeon, Herrera, and Gutierrez.

[40] He acknowledged on cross-examination he never stood around and observed the handbilling when it took place except for the 2 or 3 minutes it took him to walk from the plant to his car after work.

[41] He stated he observed J. Garcia and Herrera wearing them at that time.

[42] Carrier stated the first time he saw any employee leafleting that was not on the voluntary organizing committee was after the layoff.

[43] President Hewitt, for example, testified he received correspondence on that date relating to a petition for the Union.

[44] In light of all the record evidence I am unwilling to credit Plant Manager Carrier's testimony that the first time he saw any nonvoluntary organizing committee employees leafleting was after the employees had been laid off. I likewise do not credit Supervisor Elizadle's testimony that he never saw any of the 10 employees who were laid off leafleting prior to their being laid off.

[45] I place no reliance on or give any weight to Superivsor Howski's and Supervisor Cruz' testimony that they did not observe any of the laid-off employees leafleting prior to their being laid off. None of the laid-off employees worked for Howski and he was unable to give a description of 7 of the 10 that were laid off. Cruz only observed the leafleting for a minute or less on those days when there was leafleting and he could not describe 6 of the 10 laid-off employees.

4. Counsel for the General Counsel's prima facie case

Considering all the facts thus far discussed, I am convinced, as urged by counsel for the General Counsel, that the Company was motivated, in part, to have a layoff by its hostility for and animus toward the organizing activities of its employees.

Additionally, there is substantial postlayoff evidence of the Company's animus toward the organizing activities of its employees. Such evidence further demonstrates the 10 November layoff was, at least in part, motivated by antiunion considerations.

For example, the Company through Supervisor McKane announced in November and, for a time during the union campaign and following the Board-conducted election, enforced a rule that limited the amount of washup time employees could have off the work floor for discussing union matters.

On 26 November the Company notified the laid-off employees that their temporary layoff was permanent. The Company contends it sent the 26 November notification letters not only so the employees would know they were permanently laid off but also to inform them they needed to obtain health insurance elsewhere and so they and particularly F. Gonzalez would seek employment elsewhere. I reject the Company's contention that those were its reasons for sending the letters in question. I am persuaded that the Company's real motivation for sending the letters, which converted the layoff from a temporary to a permanent one, was to preclude 10 known union supporters from voting in the 12 December election. I reject the Company's contentions with respect to the letters for several reasons. First, according to President Hewitt, the layoff was to be governed by plant rules. Plant rules reflect that the laid-off employees would have recall rights for 1 year unless their total seniority was less than that time. Therefore, the employees were already aware of their recall rights. Prior to the layoff the employees had been informed by the Company that it would continue their insurance coverage for 30 days. Thus there was no need for the Company to further inform its employees of their recall rights or insurance coverage. Plant Manager Carrier testified he was concerned about F. Gonzalez, who is handicapped, not looking for work. Carrier stated F. Gonzalez' public agency counselor had told him F. Gonzalez was not looking for work because International Union Representative Martinez had assured F. Gonzalez he would be recalled to work quickly. Martinez credibly denied ever telling F. Gonzalez he would be quickly recalled to work by the Company.

Other of the Company's postlayoff conduct that reflects on its motivation is that on 1 December Supervisor Elizadle told Licon the laid-off employees were terminated and would not be eligible to vote in the Board-conducted election because of their union activities.[46]

In agreement with counsel for the General Counsel, I am persuaded the evidence establishes that not only was the initial layoff motivated by union animus, but the Company's decision and announcement that the layoffs were permanent came about as a result of the Company's desire to preclude its laid-off employees from voting in the 12 December Board-conducted election.

On 10 December the Company further demonstrated its strong union animus when President Hewitt deliberately engaged International Union Representative Martinez in an angry confrontation in the presence of many employees that resulted in his son, Engineering Manager D. Hewitt, physically assaulting Martinez.[47] Such actions clearly alerted the employees that the same fate could befall them if they continue to support the Union. At this same confrontation Plant Manager Carrier told the employees that those who had been laid off would not be considered for recall because he would see to it.

Still further evidence of the Company's overall motivation for its actions is demonstrated by Plant Manager Carrier's comments to employee Champion about his wage review. Carrier told Champion on 10 December that he was glad Champion had gotten a good review that resulted in a wage increase because if the employees voted the wrong way in the 12 December Board-conducted election they would not be getting any more favorable wage reviews. On 11 December Plant Manager Carrier asked Lewis about his personal sympathies toward the Union for no valid or justifiable reason.

Still further evidence of the Company's motivation is demonstrated by the fact that on 12 December it challenged the right of all the laid-off employees (except Hoyt who did not vote) to vote, when they attempted to do so in the Board-conducted election, on the grounds the employees were permanently laid off with no reasonable expectancy of recall.

In agreement with counsel for the General Counsel, I find the evidence demonstrates the Company continued to exhibit strong union animus even after the Board-conducted election. For example, on 14 January 1987 President Hewitt spoke to all the employees and demanded to know who was supplying the Union with information on which the Union was filing charges against the Company. Hewitt even specifically singled out an employee in the group in his attempt to ascertain who was supplying information against the Company. President Hewitt told the assembled employees he did not want them to sign each other up for the Union on company property and directed them to stop doing so. Immediately after his meeting with all the employees President Hewitt singled out Licon and Vasquez for a meeting with him and Plant Manager Carrier in Hewitt's office. President Hewitt then asked the two if they were the ones supplying information to the Union. Hewitt told the two if there were further union activities at the Company he wanted to be notified so he would not be caught off guard. Hewitt even asked and Vasquez told him they had been attempting to get employees to sign dues authorization cards before work and on their break and lunch times. Hewitt told the two they were doing it on "Company property" and he wanted it stopped. Vasquez promised Hewitt he would stop doing so.

[46] I note Superintendent Castillo was told by Plant Manager Carrier after the employees were permanently laid off that they could not vote in the election.

[47] The Board has long abhorred violence as a means of attempting to achieve one's goals in labor relations. See, e.g., Jones & Laughlin Steel Corp., 1 NLRB 503 (1936).

Supervisor Elizadle voiced the Company's continued animus toward the Union on 6 March 1987 when he told certain employees, who were discussing how long it would take to negotiate a collective-bargaining agreement, that it would take at least 2 years and even then their efforts would be futile because the Company could delay the matter further by changing its name or relocating its facility and such actions on its part would do away with the Union.

In view of the foregoing I find counsel for the General Counsel has established a prima facie showing sufficient to support the inference that protected conduct as a "motivating factor" in the Company's decision to lay off its employees on 10 November. NLRB v. Transportation Management Corp., 462 U.S. 393 (1983), citing with approval Wright Line, 251 NLRB 1083 (1980), enfd. on other grounds 662 F.2d 899 (1st Cir. 1981), cert. denied 455 U.S. 989 (1982). Counsel for the General Counsel demonstrated union activity by all 10 of the laid-off employees in that they each had leafleted at the plant prior to their being laid off. A large percentage of them had worn or displayed union insignia of one kind or another at the plant prior to their being laid off. The Company collectively, through President Hewitt, Plant Manager Carrier, Superintendent Castillo, and Supervisor Elizadle, knew of their union activities. The Company's strong union animus has been demonstrated through the many unlawful acts the managers and supervisors committed prior to and after the employees were laid off. The timing of the layoff, which took place approximately 4 weeks before the Board-conducted election, coupled with the stated reasons for the layoff, convincingly demonstrates the Company's motivation for having the layoff was to preclude these 10 known union supporters from voting in the Board-conducted election that was held on 12 December.

Once counsel for the General Counsel makes a prima facie showing, such as she has done herein, that protected conduct was a motivating factor in the employer's actions against its employees, the burden shifts to the employer to demonstrate that it would have taken the same actions it did even in the absence of the protected conduct on the part of its employees. The employer's proffered basis must be proved by a preponderance of the evidence.

5. The Company's economic defense for reducing its work force on 10 November

The Company's assertion that its 10 November temporary layoff, which was thereafter made permanent on 26 November, was economically justified does not withstand close scrutiny.

The Company states, "1985 was a good year" in that its total net sales, which were $10,640,000, exceeded its projections.[48] It however argues that it "never came close to achieving the success it had projected for . . . 1986." The evidence belies such a gloomy assessment of 1986. Although the Company never achieved its projected 26-percent growth in sales for 1986, it did accomplish a 14.8 percent increase in net sales for that year over 1985. The total net sales for 1986 were $12,214,000.[49] Thus if 1985 was "a good year" it is difficult to validly conclude that 1986 was a devastatingly bad one.

During the last half of 1985 the Company maintained an average of 100 hourly employees per month. In the last 2 months of 1985 it employed 106 (November) and 107 (December) hourly employees. During the first 10 months of 1986 the Company maintained a monthly average hourly work force of 102. In January 1986 it employed 106 hourly employees and as late as September it employed 107 hourly employees. Plant Manager Carrier, who joined the Company in February 1986, testified it was evident to him at the time he came to the Company that it was overstaffed.[50] He asserts the Company's 1986 staffing levels were based on its projected 26-percent growth in sales. Plant Manager Carrier's assertion the Company was overstaffed in 1986 does not square with a number of established facts. First, the evidence shows the Company's staffing levels through October[51] were in keeping with its staffing levels for the last half of 1985, which was at a time when the Company was doing 14.8 percent less. Second, the Company hired 13 new hourly paid employees between June (some 4 months after Carrier became plant manager) and October.[52] If a genuine

[49] The Company had in its most recent monthly type predictions projected $13,500,000 in net sales for 1986. However, in its "Five Year Strategic Plan (1984–1988)" it set "minimum sales increase of 15% per year" goals. The Company, with its 14.8-percent net sales growth in 1986, was on target with respect to its long-term projections. In that same 5-year plan the Company projected net sales for 1986 at $9,520,000. Its 1986 net sales exceeded that prediction by well over $2.5 million.

[50] Carrier testified he, from the beginning of his employment, discussed the Company's overstaffing problems with Superintendent Castillo. Superintendent Castillo credibly stated he could not recall any such conversation prior to the layoff addressed herein. In fact, Superintendent Castillo testified he "wasn't totally sure" the Company could fill its orders without the laid-off employees.

[51] It was in October that the Company learned of union activities at its facility.

[52] Plant Manager Carrier indicated he was unaware of any manufacturing employees being hired during the time period in question. However, after being confronted with documentary evidence to the contrary, he overstaffing problem had existed, I am persuaded the Company would not have continued, up until October, to have hired new employees in order to maintain its hourly work force at levels in excess of 100 employees. Third, no conclusive evidence was presented to support Plant Manager Carrier's assertion that the new facility (that opened in August) enhanced productivity and lessened the need for employees.

The Company asserts a number of things occurred in the summer of 1986 that demonstrates its subsequent actions were not motivated by union considerations. For example, Sales Manager Salinas prepared a memorandum on 16 June for President Hewitt in which he pointed out:

> As you are aware, we are having one terrible time in filling our schedule. I would like to say that working with Bob Carrier has really help[ed] lift the burden during this trying time. I still believe the surge of work is still around the corner and scheduling should be settling down to projections and normal lead times soon [Emp. Exh. 6].

Salinas said he wrote the memorandum because they were unable to give the shop employees the 5 days' leadtime they needed from the time an order arrived at the plant until it went to the production floor. He explained they did not have the leadtime because of a decline in orders and a declining backlog. Notwithstanding the scheduling problems Salinas discussed, the Company hired two new manufacturing employees in June to replace two that had quit.[53]

President Hewitt testified he was called to corporate headquarters in Dallas, Texas, in early July for a "very intense discussion" with Corporate Chief Officer Bob Haugh and Corporate Group Vice President Andy Schwitter. Hewitt testified Haugh told him, "your sales are falling off," "your profits are falling off," "you're not going to make budget," and added he wanted something done about it. Hewitt testified the Company thereafter reduced its advertising budget and postponed some of its advertising commitments and cut two marketing consultants. Notwithstanding the concerns raised by the Dallas Corporation, the Company hired four new hourly employees in July. No hourly employees had been discharged or voluntarily quit during that month. I am persuaded that if the Company's situation had been as dire as it contends it was, it would not have continued to have hired employees (13 in all) between June and the advent of the Union in October.

On 30 October Sales Manager Salinas prepared a second memorandum for President Hewitt regarding the Company's declining business. In that memorandum Salinas stated:

> Our slide door backlog has dropped considerably over the last two weeks. Based on the orders on hand we are cutting back the vent factor 10% the first 3-1/2 days of November, and at this time it looks like we'll have to cut back an additional 10 percent over the next 5 days (week of November 10th). The vent count during the week of November 10th will be at about 22 per day average.
> I'm hoping by the week of the 17th we can start scheduling back to the 28 per day average. I will keep you posted as we progress through the month [Emp. Exh. 7].

President Hewitt testified he penciled a message to Plant Manager Carrier across the top of Salinas' 30 October memorandum that read, "Bob C. let me have your plan." Hewitt stated Plant Manager Carrier's response to the memorandum was to provide him with a list of employees that could be laid off without adversely affecting the business.

Certain factors raise very troubling concerns about Salinas' 30 October memorandum. First, it came within a relatively short time after the Company learned of union activities at its facility. Second, the Company was still in a hiring posture in October. It hired two new employees to replace two that had quit that month. Third, Salinas predicted the Company would be at a 22-per-day vent count in the second week in November and expressed hope it could start scheduling back to a 28-per-day vent production average in the third week in November. Salinas testified on direct examination that the Company tried to maintain, "something in the vicinity of 28 moving vents a day." On cross-examination he said that was what the Company had averaged over the past 9 to 12 months. The documents on vent production do not appear to support Salinas' testimony. For example, in 1985 the Company had approximately a 19.25 average daily vent count. Through October 1986 the Company had a 20.43 average daily vent count, and for all 1986 it had a 20.28 average daily vent count. In the first 3 months of 1987, the Company had a 19.16 average daily vent count.[54] Thus, it appears the Company had never averaged 28 vents per day and that the vent production for November was in line with the 1986 average daily vent count and ahead of the 1985 daily count. Therefore, it appears the November layoff was based on something other than average daily vent production. Other factors support such a conclusion. The Company had never, in the past, resorted to a layoff where the employees were not thereafter recalled to work. Supervisor Elizadle's testimony that he had been having to rotate four to five employees per day during the 2 months before the layoff in order to keep them busy does not strengthen the Company's economic defense because he acknowledged, on cross-examination, he had to do that during the previous year.

conceded hiring had taken place during that time including the hiring of his daughter (an hourly paid manufacturing employee) in June. If Carrier had been completely candid in his testimony, I think he would have remembered that his daughter had been hired during the period in question.

[53] One of the two hired in June was Plant Manager Carrier's daughter and the other was Davis.

[54] I arrived at the average daily vent count by taking the total vent count per year (Emp. Exhs. 8 and 9) and then dividing by the number of weeks in the year and the number of days per week. The Company produced approximately 5005 vents in 1985; approximately 5275 in 1986 (with approximately 4495 being produced between 1 January and 30 October); and approximatley 1105 in the first 3 months of 1987.

I conclude the Company has not shown it would have laid off its employees on 10 November nor would it have permanently discharged them on 26 November absent their union activities.[55] Compare Sogard Tool Co., 285 NLRB 1044 (1987). Accordingly, it follows that the Company's actions toward these 10 employees violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act and I so find.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. The Company, Horton Automatics, is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. International Union of Electronics, Electrical, Technical, Salaried and Machine Workers, AFL–CIO, District 11 is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By engaging in the following conduct between about October 1986 and about March 1987, the Company committed the following unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act:

(a) Threatening its employees with layoff because of their union activities.

(b) Telling its employees they would not be recalled from layoff because of their union activities.

(c) Informing its employees that their layoff was tied to their union activities.

(d) Promulgating and enforcing a rule limiting its employees washup time for the purpose of limiting the amount of time they would have off the work floor for discussing union matters.

(e) Establishing a parts runner position for the purpose of restricting its employees to their work stations so they could not discuss the Union among themselves.

(f) Assaulting a union representative in the presence of its employees.

(g) Threatening that its laid-off employees would not be considered for recall because of their union activities.

(h) Coercively interrogating its employees about their union activities and desires.

(i) Promulgating and enforcing an overly broad no-solicitation rule.

(j) Telling its employees that certain actions were taken against the laid-off employees because of their union activities and in order to preclude them from voting in a Board-conducted election.

(k) Telling its employees it would be futile for them to select the Union as their collective-bargaining representative.

(l) Telling its employees there would not be any further wage increases if they voted for the Union.

4. About 10 November 1986 laying off and thereafter about 26 November 1986 permanently discharging Rene Carreon, Jon Eric Davis, Roy DeLeon, Carlos Garcia, Joe Garcia, Franklin Gonzalez Jr., Rolando Gutierrez, Abe Herrera, Manuel Mendez, and Leonard S. Hoyt because of their sympathies for, and activities on behalf of, the Union, the Company violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

5. The aforesaid unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that the Company has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I find it necessary to order it to cease and desist therefrom and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

It having been found that the Company discriminatorily laid off and thereafter permanently discharged employees Rene Carreon, Jon Eric Davis, Roy DeLeon, Carlos Garcia, Joe Garcia, Franklin Gonzalez Jr., Rolando Gutierrez, Abe Herrera, Manuel Mendez, and Leonard S. Hoyt, I shall recommend that it be ordered to offer them immediate and full reinstatement to their former positions or, if they no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and privileges previously enjoyed and make them whole for any loss of earnings they may have suffered by reason of the discrimination against them with interest. Backpay shall be computed in the manner prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 298 (1950), with interest as computed in New Horizons for the Retarded.,[56]

Likewise it is recommended that the Company be ordered to remove from its laid-off employees' files any reference to their having been laid off and notify them in writing this has been done and that evidence of that unlawful action will not be used as a basis for any future personnel actions against them. Further it is recommended the Company be ordered to cease giving effect to its overly broad no-solicitation rule. Finally, it is recommended the Company be ordered to post a notice to its employees attached hereto as "Appendix" for a period of 60 days in order that employees may be apprised of their rights under the Act and the Company's obligation to remedy its unfair labor practices. Counsel for the General Counsel requested that a visitatorial clause be included in the Order. The evidence does not establish the necessity for such a clause. Accordingly, I deny that request.

On these findings of facts and conclusions of law, and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[57]

ORDER

The Respondent, Horton Automatics, Corpus Christi, Texas, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Laying off, discharging, or otherwise discriminating against any employee for supporting International Union of Electronics, Electrical, Technical, Salaried and [55] Although not essential to the findings herein, I note that during the first 3 months of 1985 the Company utilized 1142 hours of overtime. In the first 3 months of 1986, it utilized 1361 hours of overtime. However, in the first 3 months of 1987, it utilized 2517 hours of overtime. The apparent increase in overtime hours worked appears to explain how the Company continues its normal production with 10 less employees.

[56] 283 NLRB 1173 (1987). Interest will be computed at the "short-term Federal rate" for the underpayment of taxes as set out in the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621.

[57] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

Machine Workers, AFL–CIO District 11, or any other labor organization.

(b) Threatening employees with layoff because of their union activities.

(c) Telling employees they would not be recalled from layoff because of their union activities.

(d) Informing employees their layoffs were tied to their union activities.

(e) Promulgating and enforcing a rule limiting its employees washup time for the purpose of limiting the amount of time they would have off the work floor for discussing the Union.

(f) Establishing a parts runner position for the purpose of restricting its employees to their work stations so they could not discuss the Union among themselves.

(g) Assaulting representatives of the Union.

(h) Threatening that its laid-off employees would not be considered for recall because of their union activities.

(i) Coercively interrogating its employees about their union activities and desires.

(j) Promulgating and enforcing an overly broad no-solicitation rule.

(k) Telling employees that certain actions were taken against its laid-off employees because of their union activities and in order to preclude them from voting in a Board-conducted election.

(l) Telling employees it would be futile for them to select the Union as their collective-bargaining representative.

(m) Telling employees there would not be any future wage increase reviews if they voted for the Union.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Offer Rene Carreon, Jon Eric Davis, Roy DeLeon, Carlos Garcia, Joe Garcia, Franklin Gonzalez Jr., Rolando Gutierrez, Abe Herrera, Manuel Mendez, and Leonard S. Hoyt immediate and full reinstatement to their former jobs, or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or other rights or privileges previously enjoyed, and make them whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits suffered as a result of the discrimination against them, in the manner set forth in the remedy section of this decision.

(b) Remove from its files any reference to its unlawful layoff and discharge of Rene Carreon, Jon Eric Davis, Roy DeLeon, Carlos Garcia, Joe Garcia, Franklin Gonzalez Jr., Rolando Gutierrez, Abe Herrera, Manuel Mendez, and Leonard S. Hoyt and notify them in writing that this has been done and that these actions will not be used against them in any way.

(c) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(d) Post at its Corpus Christi, Texas facility copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[58] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 23, after being signed by the Company's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Company immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Company to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(e) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Company has taken to comply.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On March 9, 1983, Administrative Law Judge William F. Jacobs issued the attached decision. The General Counsel and the Charging Party (the Union) filed exceptions, supporting briefs, and answering briefs.[1] The Respondents filed cross-exceptions, supporting briefs, and answering briefs.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions[3] only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order.

This case presents allegations of 8(a)(3) and (5) violations stemming from Respondent Esmark's 1982 divestiture of the fresh meats division of a subsidiary then known as Swift & Co. At all relevant times prior to the events presently at issue, Swift & Co., a meatpacking, food production, and sales operation, was a wholly owned subsidiary of Esmark and consisted of a fresh meats division and a processed meats division. In this capacity, Swift operated many facilities nationwide and its employees were represented by the Union in separate units designated in and covered by one master agreement. The last relevant agreement was effective September 1, 1979, to September 1, 1982.

Esmark, a holding company, provided its subsidiary, Swift, with certain services in the areas of public relations, legal counsel, financial matters, benefits programs, and labor relations. Until 1976 Esmark directly participated in the collective-bargaining negotiations between Swift and the Union. In April 1980, Esmark undertook the first in a series of steps that ultimately resulted in its divestiture of Swift's fresh meats division and its restructuring of that division into two corporations known as SIPCO and New Sipco. Thus, following a series of transactions detailed more fully in the judge's decision, Esmark, in essence, split the operations of the original Swift & Co., i.e., the processed meats operations were carried on by a new corporation using the old name of Swift while the fresh meats operations were carried on by SIPCO, which operated most of the fresh meats plants with the exception of the two located in Moultrie, Georgia, and Guymon, Oklahoma, which were operated by New Sipco. During the period of restructuring, SIPCO and New Sipco in substance remained wholly

[1] The Union has requested oral argument. The request is denied as the record, exceptions, and briefs adequately present the issues and the positions of the parties.

[2] Respondents Swift Independent Corporation (SIC), Swift Independent Packing Company (SIPCO), and New Sipco, Inc. (New Sipco) have excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

In the findings of fact section of his decision, the judge inadvertently indicated that the $50 per-share price that Solomon Brothers had determined to be a "justifiable" price for the stock of Respondent Esmark, Inc. (Esmark) was substantially below the market value of the stock at that time. The record shows, and the judge correctly indicated at fn. 31 of his decision, that Esmark's stock was then trading around $25 to $30 per share. Therefore, a $50 per-share price would be substantially above, not below, the then market value of the stock. In that same section of his decision, the judge indicated that an April 25, 1979 meeting in the office of William Watchman, the then president of Respondent Swift & Co. (Swift), was attended by Watchman and Donald Kelly and Karl Becker, president and assistant general counsel, respectively, of Esmark. The record indicates that this meeting was attended by Watchman, Kelly, and John Copeland, then president of the fresh meats division of Swift. These inadvertent errors are insufficient to affect the results of our decision.

[3] We find merit in Esmark's exception to the judge's finding that it, along with the other Respondents, had admitted to being an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Sec. 2(6) and (7) of the Act. Contrary to the judge's finding, the record shows that, unlike Swift, SIPCO, and New Sipco, Esmark in its amended answers denied being an employer engaged in commerce. In this regard, it in essence denied that it meets the Board's standard for retail enterprises inasmuch as it derives no revenue from retail sales and provides services only to companies in which it has an ownership interest. We find, nevertheless, that the record clearly establishes that Esmark is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Sec. 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act. Thus, we note that the record shows that Esmark is a Delaware corporation with its principal office in Chicago, Illinois. Esmark's 1981 annual report, introduced into evidence by the General Counsel, indicates that it is a holding company that provides financial planning and management services to its subsidiaries, including International Playtex, Inc., Estech, Inc., Eschem, Inc., and Estronics, Inc., as well as Respondent Swift. The annual report indicates that for the fiscal year ending October 31, 1981, Esmark's total revenues were over $3 billion, which "ranks it among the largest industrial corporations in the United States." In addition, Esmark reported expenditures of close to $3 billion to cover cost of goods sold and selling, administrative, advertising, sales promotion, and interest costs in addition to other expenditures listed for pension, health care, and profit-sharing plans. The report further indicates that Esmark incurred a pretax loss of some $66.5 million from transactions pertaining to its divestiture of SIPCO. In this regard, the report reflects Esmark's assumption of SIPCO's liability for certain outstanding checks and its purchase of guaranteed income contracts to fund accrued pension and pensioners' health care liability related to SIPCO's ongoing operation. Respondent Esmark does not contend that these assertions in its annual report are incorrect. Additionally, the record shows that Esmark annually provides services clearly valued in excess of $50,000 to its subsidiaries, which in turn admit jurisdiction here. In light of all the above, as noted, we agree with the judge's finding that jurisdiction is properly asserted over Esmark. See generally NLRB v. Erlich's 814, Inc., 577 F.2d 68 (8th Cir. 1978); Glen Manor Home v. NLRB, 474 F.2d 1145 (6th Cir. 1973), cert. denied 414 U.S. 826 (1973).

owned by Esmark until April 1981 when through a public stock sale Esmark reduced its ownership interest to 35 percent.[4]

The actual process of severing the fresh meats division was initiated in April 1980. At that time Esmark's president, Donald Kelly, told John Copeland, then a vice president of Swift, that the decision had been made that Esmark should divest itself of the fresh meats division. Copeland was instructed that he was thereafter to report directly to Kelly and that he and his staff were to assemble a company that could be sold as a unit. Copeland was at this time also involved in Esmark's attempt to develop an employee stock option plan wherein around 60 percent of the stock in the fresh meats operation would be owned by employees. In June 1980 the Union rejected Esmark's proffered employee stock option plan. Thereafter, certain of Esmark's management officials and Copeland met with Kelly to discuss various alternatives concerning the disposition of the fresh meats operation. Kelly was interested in Copeland's proposals. Ultimately, as a result of these discussions, Esmark's board of directors, on June 26, 1980, approved a proposal that certain of the fresh meats plants, including Moultrie and Guymon, be closed, with Esmark paying all closing costs, and that the remaining units of the division should become a separate independent company known as SIPCO, which Esmark would sell. Thereafter, Copeland, who later became SIPCO's president, headed the effort to implement this decision, including the creation of the departments necessary for SIPCO's independent functioning and the selection of SIPCO's staff. Copeland appointed the individuals to sit on the board of directors, including two individuals suggested by Esmark's president, Kelly.

By letter of June 30, 1980, Swift's vice president of personnel, James Farren, wrote to union official Anderson formally announcing that the Moultrie and Guymon plants would be closed on December 28, 1980, and offering to meet to discuss the effects of the closings. In August 1980, Copeland and Farren met with Anderson. At that meeting, Copeland indicated that the plants at Guymon and Moultrie were good, modern plants that would fit in well with the new company but for their uncompetitive labor costs. Copeland asked Anderson about the possibility of getting relief from the master agreement at these plants. Anderson responded that the Union did not make midterm changes in the master agreement. Copeland indicated that, despite his wish to keep these two plants open, he would not do so if he had to pay master agreement rates. Anderson reiterated that there could be no reduction in benefits and that the master agreement would have to stand.

Later in August, Copeland and Richard Knight, then a vice president of Swift and subsequently appointed by Copeland to be SIPCO's vice president in charge of beef, lamb, and labor, met with Anderson in Anderson's office. At that meeting, Copeland told Anderson that potential buyers would find the new company a more attractive purchase if the Moultrie and Guymon plants were operating. He further indicated, however, that these plants would have to be closed absent some relief from the uncompetitive labor costs set out in the master agreement. Copeland said that SIPCO would continue to apply the master agreement at any plants where it was competitive. Anderson indicated that he could not see how any changes could be made in the master agreement.

Copeland, Knight, and Anderson met again on September 10 to discuss, inter alia, the efforts being made to sell SIPCO and the status of certain plants, including Moultrie and Guymon.[5] Copeland and Knight again asked Anderson if he could change the master agreement at these plants to make them more competitive. Anderson again indicated that he could not do so. Copeland testified that he told Anderson that > our plan was to let Esmark go ahead with the closing of these plants in line with the master agreement terms and then after the company was sold to interests other than Esmark, we would reopen those plants, recognizing that the union still had bargaining rights, but would insist on a competitive labor rates [sic] in the new contract.

The parties discussed wage rates for various plants. Anderson questioned the legality of Esmark's plans concerning SIPCO. No agreement was reached.

At a September 18, 1980 meeting of Anderson, Knight, and SIPCO Counsel Bruce Thompson, the parties again discussed the planned closing of [4] The stock sold was that of SIC, a holding company for the fresh meats operation that Esmark incorporated in January 1981. Accordingly, Esmark's 35-percent ownership of SIPCO and New Sipco is by virtue of its ownership of SIC stock. These matters are discussed in greater detail in the judge's decision.

[5] At this time the formal steps necessary to separate the fresh meats division were proceeding. Thus, on September 3, 1980, Swift set up a subsidiary called Transitory Food Processors, Inc. (Transitory) and on October 21 transferred Swift's assets, except for the fresh meats division, to it. Transitory's name was then changed to Swift & Co. On October 24, the name of the remaining original Swift & Co. was changed to SIPCO. At this time, various tangible and intangible assets, including property, trademarks, notes, etc., were divided between the two entities. In essence, everything related to the fresh meats operation went to SIPCO, while everything else went to Swift. On October 27, SIPCO declared a dividend of all of (new) Swift & Co. stock to Esmark.

Moultrie and Guymon by Esmark and their subsequent reopening by SIPCO. Anderson reiterated that the Union would not agree to any midterm modification of the master agreement. He added that he would not "stir the pot" concerning the planned closing and reopening of these plants if the plans were legal, but he added that he doubted their legality. Knight reiterated that Moultrie and Guymon would be operated under competitive local agreements when they were reopened.

In October 1980, Knight kept in touch with Anderson by telephone, advising him of the progress made toward the splitting off of SIPCO from Swift and Esmark. He also told Anderson that he understood that Moultrie and Guymon would be closed on December 28 and reopened on January 10 or 15, 1981. Anderson responded that as long as it was legal they could go ahead.

Knight and Anderson met again on November 5, 1980, and Knight again advised Anderson that SIPCO was to be independent and would not apply the master agreement at Moultrie and Guymon. Anderson again refused to make any concessions, advising Knight that he felt the plan was unlawful. Knight told Anderson that the incorporation papers had been filed and a brokerage firm engaged to handle the public sale of stock, but that the sale of the Company probably could not be finalized until February 1981. Knight indicated that all plants then currently under the master agreement would continue to operate as before except for Guymon and Moultrie. Knight reiterated that he intended to close these plants and to have SIPCO reopen them after 2 weeks, at which time SIPCO would negotiate a more competitive local contract. Knight inquired whether, in view of the delay in selling the Company, it would be possible to reopen the plants before the actual sales date or to delay the closing. Anderson stated again that the master agreement could not be altered and that if the procedure that Knight had suggested was not legal he would not go along with it. Anderson later advised that a delay in closing would require a second closing notice and a 6-month extension of operations.

By letter of December 11, 1980, Knight indicated to Anderson that SIPCO had become a separate corporate entity on October 27, 1980, and that the terms and conditions of the master agreement would remain in effect at certain named plants.[6] The letter further indicated that SIPCO > has begun the process of becoming a publicly owned corporation. Upon completion of this procedure [SIPCO] will be truly independent of Esmark . . . . There should be little doubt in the minds of [the Union] that the process of making Swift Independent Packing Company a publicly held corporation completely separate from Esmark had begun, and that it will be completed early in the spring of 1981 . . . . As part of the creation of [SIPCO] Esmark announced the closing of . . . meat packing plants located at Guymon, Oklahoma and Moultrie, Georgia. These two plants will be closed on December 28, 1980, and all closing benefits provided under the labor agreement will be paid to eligible employees by Esmark. The Guymon and Moultrie facilities will be owned by [SIPCO] and it is intended that these plants will be opened in early 1981 as non-Master Agreement units and it is intended that the [Union] will be recognized as the bargaining agent . . . . The Company will assure the Union that, if the process of becoming a publicly held independent corporation is not completed within a reasonable length of time after the opening of the Guymon and Moultrie facilities, the Company will recognize retroactively the terms and conditions previously provided to the employees at these locations under the [master agreement].[7]

On December 17, 1980, Knight and Anderson, along with their respective attorneys, Thompson and Gacek, met again. Knight tried to get Anderson and Gacek to agree to the reopening of Moultrie and Guymon before the completion of the public stock sale, then rescheduled for March, but ultimately not occurring until April 1981. In essence, Knight and Thompson did not wish to keep two plants closed for an extensive period dating from December 28, the then-scheduled date of the closings, through the completion of the public offering. Knight reiterated that the Company would retroactively apply the provisions of the master agreement to employees if the public stock sale was not completed within a reasonable period after the opening. Anderson responded that he felt the Company's plan was illegal, that SIPCO would not be independent of Swift and Esmark, and that the Union would not go along with it. Gacek added that if Moultrie and Guymon were opened before the sale of stock, it would be an alter ego situation and the openings would have to be under the master agreement. Thompson indicated that another corporation was being set up to protect against any legal problems concerning Moultrie and Guymon. Anderson and Gacek responded that the Companies could change their names all they wanted but that they were still the same and the master agreement should apply.

[6] SIPCO at this time was a wholly owned subsidiary of Esmark.

[7] As noted earlier, supra at fn. 3, Esmark actually retained a 35-percent ownership interest in the holding company, SIC, of which SIPCO was, along with New Sipco, a wholly owned subsidiary.

Thereafter, Knight advised Anderson in a letter of December 22 that "[i]t is our present intention to close the Moultrie and Guymon plants on or about March 7, 1981, or just prior to [SIPCO] becoming a publicly held corporation." Ultimately, the plants did not close until April 17, about a week before the public stock offering on April 22, 1981.

In the meantime, Anderson and Knight met again on February 13, 1981, and Knight again requested relief from the master agreement at Moultrie and Guymon. Anderson again refused. Thereafter, on February 24, 1981, an entity named New Sipco was incorporated. Thompson testified that the incorporation of New Sipco followed a discussion he had had with SIPCO's general counsel, Tom McKay, wherein McKay had suggested the creation of a separate subsidiary, New Sipco, to open and operate the plants at Moultrie and Guymon so that employees would clearly distinguish between the employer that would terminate their employment and the one that would reopen these facilities.

As noted, the plants closed on April 17, 1981. Esmark paid employees the closing benefits specified in the provisions of the master agreement. The stock offering of April 22, 1981, consisted of the sale of SIC stock, the holding company that Esmark had incorporated in January 1981. The prospectus accompanying the sale indicated that the principal assets of SIC consisted of all the stock of SIPCO. The prospectus also indicated in relevant part that:

> SIPCO is the successor to and owns and operates . . . what was formerly . . . the Fresh Meats Division of the original Swift & Co. . . . SIPCO's Guymon, Oklahoma and Moultrie, Georgia plants are in the opinion of management, efficient facilities capable of successful and competitive operations. However, labor costs at these plants under the Master Agreement . . . with the [Union] were significantly higher than those prevailing at many plants in their respective areas. A new subsidiary of the Company intends to open Guymon and Moultrie shortly after completion of this offering with the objective of achieving competitive labor costs at these facilities. On April 8, 1981 [the Union] advised the Company that it . . . would contest any attempt to operate these plants under labor terms other than those of the [master agreement]. In the opinion of management, the aforementioned steps taken or being taken by Esmark, coupled with the anticipated reduction of labor costs at the Des Moines plant and the possible reduction of such costs at the Guymon and Moultrie plants will add further strength to SIPCO's ability to compete effectively and profitably in the fresh meats industry. There is no assurance that any reduction in labor costs will be achieved at the Guymon or Moultrie plants.

As alluded to in the prospectus, Anderson had written to Knight on April 8, 1981, as follows:

> You have openly announced that the Company intends to go through the purported closing of these two plants, and then immediately to reopen them and continue operations at the plants. You have made clear it is your intention, upon such "reopening" to treat the plants as if they are no longer covered by the Master Agreement which now clearly covers them. I want to make sure that there is no possibility of misunderstanding and accordingly I repeat to you that it is the Union's position that, regardless of the name of the particular corporation which you may choose as the entity under which the "reopening" is accomplished, this entire body of maneuvers is simply a charade intended to attempt to rid yourself of your collective bargaining and contract obligations and to enable you to attempt to accomplish a reduction in employee benefits and an evasion of contract obligations at these plants. We again want to be sure that you clearly understand that it is the Union's position that if those plants are reopened after your announced "closing," employees presently in those plants are entitled to . . . their employment in those plants and it is the Union's position that the Master Agreement will continue to apply to those plants.

In his letter of April 21, 1981, in response, Knight advised Anderson that the law provides that new owners can establish initial terms and conditions of employment as well as hire a work force of their own choosing. Knight added that "once the new ownership is in place and has had an opportunity to review its intentions and make a determination with respect to this subject, I am certain that it will be in touch with you."

Thereafter, on April 30, 1981, Knight wrote two letters to Anderson advising that the public offering of SIC stock had been completed, that SIC had purchased the assets of SIPCO, and that SIC's wholly owned subsidiary, New Sipco, now owned the Moultrie and Guymon facilities. One of these letters, on New Sipco stationery, further indicated that "the ownership, through their Boards of Directors," had decided to open the Moultrie and Guymon facilities on May 5, 1981, with terms and conditions of employment that were still under consideration and that applications from former SIPCO employees would be considered. The second letter, on SIPCO stationery, indicated that the "ownership, through their Boards of Directors," had decided to retain their current work force, and, as a successor employer, had decided to adopt the master agreement at the listed SIPCO facilities.

Most of the employees formerly employed at the Moultrie and Guymon plants, including plant managers and salaried employees, as well as unit employees, were rehired as employees of New Sipco. The terms and conditions of employment of Moultrie were set by Knight in consultation with local management. The terms and conditions of employment at Guymon, however, were those set out in a new local collective-bargaining agreement negotiated with Local 340 of the Union.[8] Guymon was reopened on May 14, 1981, and Moultrie was reopened on May 4, 1981.

Subsequently, in August 1981, SIPCO's Tampa sales unit facility was closed. The Tampa employees, who were covered by the master agreement, were permitted to transfer to SIPCO facilities also operating under the master agreement but were not permitted to transfer to Moultrie, Guymon, or any Swift & Co. facilities. The provisions of the master agreement permitted transfer to any plant under the master agreement whenever a plant closed.

Following the public sale, the SIPCO and New Sipco facilities have continued the fresh meats operations and have annual sales of around $1.6 billion. Customers and suppliers have remained essentially the same. As noted, their personnel and officers have also remained essentially the same. Although most of the officers that Copeland chose for SIC, SIPCO, and New Sipco had previously been employed by Swift, there has been no exchange of personnel since April 1981. Also since April 1981 no one from SIC, SIPCO, or New Sipco has reported to anyone from Esmark. Of SIPCO's nine-member board of directors, only one, Roger Briggs, still held a position with Esmark or Swift after the sale of SIC stock.

Except for Esmark's 35-percent ownership interest, its previously existing connections with SIPCO and New Sipco have apparently been discontinued. In this regard, Esmark no longer plays any role in the health care or pension plans, insurance, advertising, day-to-day operations, or labor relations of SIPCO and New Sipco. No employees of SIC, SIPCO, or New Sipco participate in Esmark's stock option, incentive, or growth plans.

SIPCO and New Sipco do, however, continue to have some business transactions with Swift. Swift does make some purchases from SIPCO and vice versa; they also have entered into a copacking arrangement in San Antonio, Texas. These transactions, however, appear to be conducted at arm's length. Some SIPCO sales units do sell Swift products, but they also sell those of competitors. SIPCO continues to rent office space from Swift at a reasonable rate made possible by Swift's favorable long-term lease.

Based on the above, the General Counsel alleged that each of the Respondent corporations violated Section 8(a)(3) by closing the plants and terminating employees at Moultrie and Guymon, and violated Section 8(a)(5) by repudiating the master agreement at Moultrie and Guymon and refusing to afford employees of the Tampa facility the full range of transfer rights set out in the master agreement. The judge dismissed these allegations.

With respect to the 8(a)(3) allegations, the judge concluded that Respondent Esmark had closed the Moultrie and Guymon plants as part of its lawful and economically motivated plan to divest itself of the fresh meats holdings. With respect to the 8(a)(5) allegations, he concluded that Respondents SIC, SIPCO, and New Sipco were free to set new terms and conditions of employment on the reopening of the Moultrie and Guymon plants after the public stock sale because these Respondents were then in the posture of successor employers within the meaning of NLRB v. Burns Security Services, 406 U.S. 272 (1972), and thus were not obligated to adhere to the master agreement. The judge thus rejected the General Counsel's contention that SIC/SIPCO/New Sipco were alter egos/single integrated enterprises/joint employers with Esmark and Swift. The judge noted that SIC/SIPCO/New Sipco were newly incorporated entities which, following the stock sale, were owned by a new set of owners totally independent of the previous owners. The judge further concluded that neither Esmark nor Swift had played any part in the decisions to reopen the Moultrie and Guymon plants and to refuse to apply the master agreement. Accordingly, he concluded that neither Swift nor Esmark had violated Section 8(a)(5) by the failure to apply the master agreement at these facilities. Finally, the judge dismissed the allegation regarding the refusal to transfer the Tampa employees to Swift & Co. or New Sipco facilities inasmuch as he found Swift to be a completely separate entity and that New Sipco legitimately refused to honor the master agreement.

[8] We agree with the judge's finding, to which no exceptions were filed, that Respondents SIC, SIPCO, and New Sipco violated Sec. 8(a)(5) and (1) by recognizing, bargaining with, and executing a collective-bargaining agreement with this local union rather than with the Union, which is the sole and exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the Guymon unit employees.

The General Counsel and the Union have excepted to these findings, and we find merit in these exceptions. In so doing, we initially find that Respondents Esmark, SIC, SIPCO, and New Sipco violated Section 8(a)(5) by failing to apply the provisions of the master agreement at the Moultrie and Guymon plants on their reopening in May 1981, shortly after the April stock sale. We reject the judge's reasoning that the April 1981 stock sale brought about a change of employers and, consequently, freed Esmark, SIC, SIPCO, and New Sipco from the obligations of the master agreement under which the plants had operated prior to the stock sale. In disagreeing with the judge, we set out the following observations from EPE, Inc., 284 NLRB 191, 198 (1987):

> The principal thrust of the Respondent's argument . . . is that the liabilities and responsibilities of that corporate entity ceased to exist once the controlling shares therein were acquired by another shareholder or group of shareholders and the new shareholder set about making and executing plans for an enlargement or improvement of the business. This rule, if consistently followed, would mean that every day's transactions on every major stock exchange and every purchase or sale of a corporate subsidiary would carry with it the potential for total disruption of the labor relations of the business being bought or sold. It is a rule which is at a marked variance with most Board and court holdings, and it flies squarely in the face of traditional corporation law as it has developed in this country over many years because it is irreconcilable with the fundamental rule of corporation law that the corporation and its shareholders are separate and distinct entities.
> In those rare instances in which the corporate veil is pierced, it is done for the benefit and protection of a third party or outsider, not at the instance and behest of the shareholders or corporate officers, as is the Respondent's implied request herein. Western Boot & Shoe, 205 NLRB 999, 1005.

Applying these principles to the facts of the present case, we find that the April 1981 stock sale to the public did not achieve any substantive changes in the SIPCO/New Sipco corporate entities such that they were privileged to repudiate the master agreement in effect at the fresh meats plants. We note that the corporate restructuring of the fresh meats operation from a division of Swift to a new corporation, SIPCO, was essentially achieved by October 1980, some 6 months prior to the stock sale. In the ensuing 6 months the SIPCO/New Sipco management operated the fresh meats business under the SIPCO corporate banner and under Esmark ownership. During this period the SIPCO/New Sipco management applied the provisions of the master agreement to its employees and thereby adopted that agreement. The April 1981 sale of stock did not substantively change the fresh meats operation in any respect. Instead, the April stock sale merely accomplished the transfer of stock from Esmark to an essentially different set of shareholders.[9] In all other respects the fresh meats operation after the stock sale continued in fundamentally the same fashion as it had before under the same corporate banner, SIPCO, which had been operating the fresh meats business for some 6 months under Esmark stock ownership. Thus, following the sale, SIPCO/New Sipco continued to process and sell fresh meats and related products at the same locations with the same equipment and with essentially the same personnel as it had before. Its management remained the same as that selected by John Copeland in line with his direction from Esmark's president, Kelly.[10] Accordingly, Esmark's sale of stock in April 1981 accomplished a mere transfer of stock ownership, which did not substantively change the fresh meats operation and did not absolve SIC/SIPCO/New Sipco from their obligation to adhere to the provisions of the master agreement. See Western Boot & Shoe, 205 NLRB 999 (1973); Phil Wall & Sons Distributing, 287 NLRB 1161 (1988). We therefore conclude that Respondents Esmark, SIC, SIPCO, and New Sipco have violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) by failing to apply the terms and conditions of the 1979-1982 master agreement to unit employees at the Moultrie and Guymon plants following their reopening.[11] [9] Esmark did retain a 35-percent ownership interest in the SIPCO group.

[10] We further note that except for the brief closure of the Moultrie and Guymon plants, which we find to be, in effect, a sham, there was no hiatus in the fresh meats operation.

[11] To the extent that the Respondents may contend that the reorganization, rather than the stock sale, effectuated a substantive change such that the reorganized entities, the SIPCO group, constituted a successor, as set forth above, the SIPCO group adopted and applied the master agreement during the 6 months of operation prior to the stock sale. The SIPCO group thus became bound to the agreement, for as the Supreme Court noted in NLRB v. Burns Security Services, 406 U.S. 272, 291 (1972):

> [I]n a variety of circumstances involving a merger, stock acquisition, reorganization, or assets purchase, the Board might properly

In this regard, we find Respondent Esmark to be liable because the actual repudiation of the master agreement was, as discussed below with respect to the 8(a)(3) allegation, the fulfillment of an unlawful plan, in which Esmark was an active participant, to close and then reopen these plants for the purpose of evading the application of the master agreement. As noted, infra, Esmark's direct participation in this unlawful conduct at pertinent times forecloses Esmark from evading liability under the criteria set out in Gerace Construction, 193 NLRB 645 (1971), and McEwen Mfg. Co., 172 NLRB 990 (1968).[12] Because the evidence does not establish that Respondent Swift participated in this conduct, we shall dismiss this allegation with respect to Respondent Swift.

We further find that Respondent SIPCO violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) by failing to provide the unit employees at its Tampa, Florida facility the full range of transfer opportunities set forth in the master agreement.[13] As the record does not establish that any of the remaining Respondents played any direct role in this conduct, we shall dismiss this allegation with respect to the remaining Respondents.

We additionally conclude that Respondents Esmark, SIC, SIPCO, and New Sipco violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) by closing the Moultrie and Guymon plants. In this regard, we note that the Supreme Court in NLRB v. Great Dane Trailers, 388 U.S. 26, 34 (1967), set forth the following mode of analysis:

> First, if it can reasonably be concluded that the employer's discriminatory conduct was "inherently destructive" of important employee rights, no proof of an antiunion motivation is needed and the Board can find an unfair labor practice even if the employer introduces evidence that the conduct was motivated by business considerations. Second, if the adverse effect of the discriminatory conduct on employee rights is "comparatively slight," an antiunion motivation must be proved to sustain the charge if the employer has come forward with evidence of legitimate and substantial business justifications for the conduct. Thus, in either situation, once it has been proved that the employer engaged in discriminatory conduct which could have adversely affected employee rights to some extent, the burden is upon the employer to establish that he was motivated by legitimate objectives since proof of motivation is most accessible to him.

Thus, the Supreme Court has found that while normally an affirmative showing of unlawful motivation must be found, an exception may be made where the allegedly unlawful conduct is inherently destructive of employee rights. Such conduct carries with it "'unavoidable consequences which the employer not only foresaw but which it must have intended' and thus bears 'its own indicia of intent.'" Great Dane Trailers, supra at 33. See also Metropolitan Edison Co. v. NLRB, 460 U.S. 698 (1983). Inherently destructive conduct has been found to be of the sort which would inevitably hinder future bargaining or create visible and continuing obstacles to the future exercise of employee rights. Cf. Inter-Collegiate Press v. NLRB, 486 F.2d 837 (8th Cir. 1973); Portland Willamette Co. v. NLRB, 534 F.2d 1331 (9th Cir. 1976); and NLRB v. Transportation Consultants, 607 F.2d 290 (9th Cir. 1979).

We conclude that the Respondents' conduct here, which culminated in the termination of employees for the purpose of evading obligations under a collective-bargaining agreement, was inherently destructive of Section 7 rights. See Los Angeles Marine Hardware Co. v. NLRB, 602 F.2d 1302 (9th Cir. 1979), enfg. 235 NLRB 720 (1978).[14] In find as a matter of fact that the successor had assumed the obligations under the old contract.

See, e.g., J.R.R. Realty Co., 273 NLRB 1523 (1985), enfd. 785 F.2d 46 (2d Cir. 1986), cert. denied sub nom. Babab v. NLRB, 123 LRRM 2592 (1986).

We agree with the judge's conclusion that this finding of a violation is not barred by the 6-month limitation proviso to Sec. 10(b). Thus, we agree that the 6-month period began to run at the closing of the plants in April 1981 and not in June 1980 when the closings were announced in Farren's letter. We note that the actionable violation alleged was the actual closures of the plants, not the announcement of the closures. We also note that Farren's June 1980 letter announced that the closings would take place in December 1980; yet they did not actually occur until some months later in April 1981. Evidently, at the time of Farren's letter, the plans for the plants were inchoate and imprecise and both the timing and circumstances of the closings assertedly contemplated were unclear. This was borne out, as set forth earlier in this decision, by the subsequent and various changes in the Respondents' plans. In these circumstances we agree that the 10(b) period began to run as of the date of the actual closures. Bay Medical Center, 252 NLRB 1138 (1980). See also Teamsters Local 42 v. NLRB, 825 F.2d 608, 615 (1st Cir. 1987).

[12] Gerace presented the question of whether two separate legal entities operated as a single employing enterprise and thus constituted a single employer under the Act. McEwen presented the question of whether one entity operated as a joint employer with another separate legal entity. As we have found that Esmark was a principal actor in the unlawful closures, its liability for this conduct does not require any finding that it was a single/joint employer within the SIPCO group. See fn. 17, infra.

[13] We agree with the judge's conclusion that Sec. 10(b) does not preclude the finding of this violation. In this regard, we disagree with the Respondents' contention that the "transfer opportunity sheets" given the Union in July 1980 were sufficient to constitute notice of the Respondents' intent to limit employee transfer rights upon the closure of the Tampa facility in August 1981. American Olean Tile Co., 265 NLRB 1625 (1982), enf. denied on other grounds 826 F.2d 1496 (6th Cir. 1987). See also Teamsters Local 42 v. NLRB, supra.

[14] In Milwaukee Spring Division, 268 NLRB 601, 604 (1984), a Board majority overruled that portion of Los Angeles Marine which held that the employers' transfer of work from one location to another was violative of Secs. 8(a)(5) and 8(d). The Board did not, however, overrule that portion of Los Angeles Marine pertaining to the 8(a)(3) violation found.

the present case, the record clearly establishes that Moultrie and Guymon were closed for the purpose of evading the application of the master agreement at these two plants. This purpose is evident from the very outset of Esmark's reorganization of the fresh meats and processed meats divisions of the old Swift & Co. Indeed, we note that, from Copeland's first meeting with Anderson on this topic in August 1980, he made it quite clear to the Union that these two plants would be closed if the Union would not capitulate to a midterm modification in the master agreement. This theme was reiterated repeatedly throughout the numerous meetings that followed between Knight and Anderson wherein relief from the master agreement was sought.

In finding that the closure of these two plants was merely a part of a lawful economic plan to sell the fresh meats business, the judge failed to appreciate the significance of the substantial evidence establishing that the closures were intended from the outset to escape the terms of the master agreement. Indeed, the record shows the "closures" themselves were not genuine closures, but were merely maneuvers designed to achieve indirectly what the Respondents could not directly obtain from the Union.[15] Thus, we note that the "closures" were effectuated with the preconceived intent to reopen the plants shortly thereafter under new terms and conditions of employment at variance from those in the master agreement. This intent is evident in the numerous meetings detailed above that took place prior to the closures and is documented in Knight's December 11, 1980 letter to Anderson indicating that "[t]hese two plants will be closed . . . and it is intended that these plants will be opened in early 1981 as non-Master Agreement units." We also note particularly the representations made in the prospectus accompanying the stock sale that "[a] new subsidiary of the Company intends to open Guymon and Moultrie shortly after completion of this offering with the objective of achieving competitive labor costs at these facilities." Thus, the Respondents openly and repeatedly professed their intent should the Union not consent to abrogate the agreed-upon contract.[16] Particularly in this context, the closing of the plants, the termination of the employees, and, as Knight himself testified, the rehiring of those employees "as new employees of the corporation" under new terms and conditions of employment must be considered conduct that would naturally hinder collective bargaining and as conduct inherently destructive of employee rights. Accordingly, we find that Respondents Esmark, SIC, SIPCO, and New Sipco, in concert, by causing the termination of the Moultrie and Guymon unit employees, have engaged in conduct inherently destructive of employees' Section 7 rights.[17]

Having found that Respondents Esmark, SIC, SIPCO, and New Sipco have engaged in conduct inherently destructive of employees' Section 7 rights, the burden has shifted to them, under Great Dane, to establish legitimate objectives for this conduct.[18] Respondents SIC, SIPCO, and New Sipco

[15] As the record establishes that the closings were a sham, we note that the analysis pertaining to genuine plant closures set out in Textile Workers v. Darlington Mfg., 380 U.S. 263 (1965), is inapplicable to the 8(a)(3) allegations in the present case.

[16] Pursuant to Sec. 8(d), the Union was under no obligation to consent to the modification or abrogation of the contract. See also Oak Cliff-Golman Baking Co., 207 NLRB 1063 (1973), enfd. 505 F.2d 1302 (5th Cir. 1974), cert. denied 423 U.S. 826 (1975).

[17] We note additionally that in NLRB v. City Disposal Systems, 465 U.S. 822, 831–832 (1984), the Supreme Court stated:

> The invocation of a right rooted in a collective-bargaining agreement is unquestionably an integral part of the process that gave rise to the agreement. That process—beginning with the organization of a union, continuing into the negotiation of a collective-bargaining agreement, and extending through the enforcement of the agreement—is a single, collective activity.

Thus it is evident that conduct deemed discriminatory within the meaning of Sec. 8(a)(3), which is intended to deprive employees of bargained for contractual rights and benefits, may be analogous to discriminatory conduct designed to deprive them of a bargaining representative in the first instance. Accordingly, based on our findings with respect to the Respondents' conduct, we find that actual unlawful motive on their part can be found.

[18] We reject the contention of Respondents SIC/SIPCO/New Sipco that they are not liable for the closing of the Moultrie and Guymon plants because the decision to close was made solely by Esmark prior to their existence. The record clearly shows that these Respondents acted in concert with Esmark in closing these facilities. In this regard, we note that it was Respondent SIPCO's vice president, Knight, who played the major role in negotiating with the Union over the effects of the closure and in attempting to persuade Anderson to forgo application of the master agreement at these two plants. We further note SIPCO's active participation in the closure and planned reopening of the plants as evidenced in Knight's December 22, 1980 letter to Anderson on SIPCO stationery in his capacity as vice president, which indicates that "It is our present intention to close the Moultrie and Guymon plants on or about March 7, 1981, or just prior to [SIPCO] becoming a publicly held corporation." Finally, we note that the record shows that the filing for the incorporation of Respondent New Sipco was accomplished by SIPCO's attorney, Thompson, at the suggestion of SIPCO's general counsel, McKay, and we find that this step was taken as a further part of the scheme to close and reopen the Guymon and Moultrie plants to evade the obligations of the master agreement.

We similarly reject the contention of Respondent Esmark that it is not liable for closing of these plants on the grounds that the decision to close was made in June 1980 solely by Respondent SIPCO, through John Copeland, and that Esmark, as a mere parent corporation, did not participate in nor have any control over the labor relations decisions of its (then) wholly owned subsidiary. In rejecting this contention, we note that the record convincingly establishes that Esmark was a principal actor in the closures. We first note that at the time the decision was made to close these plants in June 1980 Copeland was reporting directly to Esmark's president, Donald Kelly. Copeland's plans for reorganizing the former fresh meats operations and for closing Moultrie and Guymon were made at the direction of and in consultation with Kelly. Esmark admits that its board of directors approved the decision to close the plants. Moreover, the record also shows that Esmark paid the resulting closing costs and assumed the unfunded pension liability resulting from the closings. In these circumstances, we find unavailing Esmark's reliance on Gerace Construction, 193 NLRB 645 (1971), and McEwen Mfg. Co., 172 NLRB 990 (1968), as support for its proposition that it did not participate in or have any control over the labor relations decisions of SIPCO. As Esmark was a principal actor in the unlawful plant closures, its liability for these contend, in pertinent part, that Moultrie and Guymon were closed to make the fresh meats operation more attractive to prospective purchasers and to enhance Esmark's ability to sell it. Respondent Esmark contends, in pertinent part, that the plants were closed because Copeland and Knight had decided that these plants would not fit into the new corporation (SIPCO) and because Swift, no longer in the fresh meats business, had no use for them.

We find these contentions to be implausible, inconsistent with the record, and insufficient to meet the burden of establishing "legitimate objectives" for the conduct in question. Moreover, even assuming that the Respondents' conduct was not "inherently destructive" but had only a comparatively slight adverse effect on employee Section 7 rights, within the meaning of Great Dane, we would further reject the Respondents' contentions on the basis that they do not establish adequate business justification for the discriminatory conduct.

In this regard, we note first that insofar as the destiny of Moultrie and Guymon was to be used to attract potential purchasers, the record shows that it was their planned reopening, not their closure, that was pointed out to potential purchasers in the prospectus prepared for the stock sale. Moreover, the record shows that the plants were closed not because Copeland or Knight felt them to be unsuitable for inclusion in the new corporation, but because the Union would not agree to a midterm modification of the master agreement in effect at these two plants. We note that in an August 1980 meeting with Anderson, Copeland advised Anderson that these two plants would fit in well with the new company but that he would not keep them open if he had to pay master agreement rates. A desire to escape collective-bargaining obligations, though economically motivated, is not a legitimate justification in this context. See Los Angeles Marine, supra, 235 NLRB at 735-736, and Dahl Fish Co., 279 NLRB 1084 (1986), enfd. mem. 813 F.2d 1254 (D.C. Cir. 1987). The record establishes that such a desire was the Respondents' sole motivation for their action. Accordingly, we find that Respondents Esmark, SIC, SIPCO, and New Sipco have failed to establish legitimate objectives for their conduct and we conclude that they have violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) by closing the plants in Moultrie and Guymon and terminating the employees for the purpose of evading the obligations under the 1979-1982 master agreement with the Union.[19] Because the record does not show that Respondent Swift participated in this conduct, we shall dismiss this allegation with respect to Respondent Swift.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that

A. The Respondents, Esmark, Inc.; Swift Independent Corp.; Swift Independent Packing Co.; and New Sipco, Inc., Chicago, Illinois, their officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Closing facilities in Guymon, Oklahoma, and Moultrie, Georgia, and terminating employees at those facilities for the purpose of evading obligations under the 1979-1982 master collective-bargaining agreement with United Food and Commercial Workers International Union, AFL-CIO.

(b) Failing to apply the terms and conditions of the 1979-1982 master collective-bargaining agreement to unit employees employed in the Guymon, Oklahoma, and Moultrie, Georgia plants without the express written consent of United Food and Commercial Workers International Union, AFL-CIO.

(c) Recognizing and bargaining with and executing a contract or authorizing the same with Local Union 340, United Food and Commercial Workers International Union (AFL-CIO-CLC) as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the unit employees at the Guymon, Oklahoma plant unless requested to do so by United Food and Commercial Workers International Union, AFL-CIO.

(d) Giving effect to the collective-bargaining agreement with Local 340, United Food and Commercial Workers International Union (AFL-CIO-CLC) executed on May 6, 1981, or to any extension, renewal, or modification thereof; provided, however, that nothing in this Decision and Order shall be construed as requiring the Respondents to revoke any increase in wages or benefits or other substantive terms and conditions of employment that the Respondents have established in the performance of this agreement, or to prejudice the em-unfair labor practices does not require any finding that it had the status of alter ego/single employer, etc., with the SIPCO group. See fn. 12, supra.

[19] For the reasons set forth supra at fn. 11, we agree with the judge that this finding is not barred by the 6-month limitations proviso to Sec. 10(b).

Chairman Stephens agrees with his colleagues that Respondents Esmark, SIC, SIPCO, and New Sipco closed the Moultrie and Guymon plants and terminated the plant employees for the purpose of reopening the plants in a guise that would allow continued operation free of the terms of the still unexpired collective-bargaining agreement. Because of this finding concerning the motive of the Respondents, Chairman Stephens finds it unnecessary to analyze the case under the Great Dane test employed in the absence of "proof of an underlying improper motive." NLRB v. Great Dane Trailers, supra, 388 U.S. at 33.

ployees' assertion of their rights under the agreement.

(e) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Offer employees of the Guymon, Oklahoma, and Moultrie, Georgia plants immediate and full reinstatement to their former jobs or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or any other rights or privileges previously enjoyed, and make them whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits suffered as a result of the discrimination against them as prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), with interest as computed in New Horizons for the Retarded.[20]

(b) On request, apply the provisions of the 1979–1982 master collective-bargaining agreement with United Food and Commercial Workers International Union, AFL–CIO to employees in each of the following appropriate units:

> All production and maintenance employees employed at the Moultrie, Ga. plant, but excluding production incentive department employees, time office employees, superintendent's office employees, canteen manager, curing department scaler, watchmen, general foremen, foremen, assistant foremen, the superintendent, division superintendents, and all supervisors as defined in the Act.
> All production and maintenance employees including truckdrivers employed at the Guymon, Oklahoma plant, but excluding the plant manager, plant superintendent, plant auditor, chief clerk, department managers, salesmen, service truck salesmen, office clerical employees, plant clerical employees, quality assurance employees, livestock buyers, livestock buyer trainees, livestock clerical employees, livestock scalers, livestock yardmen and handlers, medical department employees, professional employees, protection employees, and all supervisory employees as defined in the Act.

(c) Make whole employees for any losses suffered by reason of the failure to apply the terms and conditions of the 1979–1982 master agreement to employees employed in each of the bargaining units noted above, with interest. Ogle Protection Service, 183 NLRB 682 (1970).

(d) Withdraw and withhold all recognition from Local 340, United Food and Commercial Workers International Union (AFL–CIO–CLC) as the exclusive bargaining representative of their employees for the purposes of collective bargaining at the Guymon, Oklahoma plant unless and until United Food and Commercial Workers International Union, AFL–CIO shall have requested the Respondents to recognize Local 340 as its agent for such purposes.

(e) On request, bargain collectively with United Food and Commercial Workers International Union, AFL–CIO as the exclusive bargaining representative of the employees in the Guymon, Oklahoma unit and, if an understanding is reached, embody such understanding in a signed agreement.

(f) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(g) Post at its plants located in Guymon, Oklahoma, and Moultrie, Georgia, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix A."[21] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 13, after being signed by the Respondents' authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondents immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondents to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(h) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondents have taken to comply.

B. The Respondent, Swift Independent Packing Co., Chicago, Illinois, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Failing to provide unit employees of the Tampa, Florida facility the full range of transfer opportunities as required by the 1979-1982 master collective-bargaining agreement with United Food and Commercial Workers International Union, AFL-CIO.

[20] In accordance with our decision in New Horizons for the Retarded, 283 NLRB 1173 (1987), interest on and after January 1, 1987, shall be computed at the "short-term Federal rate" for the underpayment of taxes as set out in the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621. Interest on amounts accrued prior to January 1, 1987 (the effective date of the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621), shall be computed in accordance with Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977). In requiring that employees be made whole, interim earnings will be deducted from lost wages. In the circumstances of this case, the measure of interim earnings should include payments of closing benefits by Esmark pursuant to the terms of the master agreement. A. S. Abell Co., 230 NLRB 17, 21 (1977), affd. 590 F.2d 554 (4th Cir. 1979).

[21] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) On request, implement the full range of transfer opportunities provided for in the 1979-1982 master collective-bargaining agreement with United Food and Commercial Workers International Union, AFL-CIO, for employees in the following appropriate unit:

> All production and maintenance employees, including truck drivers, engineers, maintenance men, electricians, conveyor operators, continuous frank machine operators, at the Processing Sales Unit, Tampa, Fla., excluding the manager, the superintendent, salesmen, sales promotion men, sales demonstrators, service truck salesmen, shippers, assistant shippers, foremen, assistant foremen, all office and all office-clerical and plant clerical employees, guards, and all supervisors as defined in the Act.

(b) Make whole all unit employees of the Tampa, Florida facility for any losses they may have suffered as a result of the Respondent's denial of the full range of transfer opportunities provided for in the 1979-1982 master collective-bargaining agreement, as prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), with interest as computed in New Horizons for the Retarded.[22]

(c) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(d) Mail a copy of the attached notice marked "Appendix B"[23] to the Union and to the last known address of each unit employee who was employed at the Tampa, Florida facility on the date of its closing in August 1981. Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 13, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be mailed by the Respondent immediately upon receipt as above directed.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

WILLIAM F. JACOBS, Administrative Law Judge. These consolidated cases were heard in Chicago, Illinois, on various dates from February 17 to May 5, 1982.[1] The charge in Case 13-CA-21156 was filed on May 29, 1981, by United Food and Commercial Workers International Union, AFL-CIO (the Union). The complaint issued on July 10, 1981, alleging that Respondents Swift Independent Corporation (SIC), Swift Independent Packing Company (SIPCO), New Sipco, Inc. (New Sipco), Swift & Company (Swift), and Esmark, Inc. (Esmark) as joint and/or single employers and/or alter egos, violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by closing plants in Moultrie, Georgia, and Guymon, Oklahoma, and terminating unit employees at these facilities and violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act by repudiating the master agreement between the Union and Swift, by refusing to adhere to and apply the terms of that agreement when the plants at Moultrie and Guymon were reopened and by bypassing the Union and negotiating with Local Union 340, a local of the Union, for a separate agreement covering the employees at the Guymon plant. Answers and amended answers filed by the various Respondents denied the commission of any unfair labor practices.

The charge in Case 13-CA-21274 was filed by the Union on July 6, 1981. The complaint issued on August 17, 1981, alleging that the Respondents, named above, repudiated the transfer rights of employees under the master agreement by unlawfully limiting the transfer rights of employees of the Tampa, Florida processing sales unit without affording the Union an opportunity to bargain about such unilateral limitations or about the effects thereof. The answers and amended answers denied the commission of any unfair labor practices. The two cases were consolidated on August 20, 1981.

In addition to the general denials contained in the answers of each Respondent, there were also affirmative responses. Thus, Esmark pleaded that the alleged unfair labor practice occurred, if indeed it had occurred, prior to November 29, 1980, and was thus barred by Section 10(b). Esmark also pleaded that it had never had a collective-bargaining relationship with or a bargaining obligation to the Union. Swift pleaded that the original charge, Case 13-CA-21156, did not name Swift as a respondent and that Swift was never served a copy of the charge as required by Section 10(b). Similarly, Swift pleaded that a copy of the charge in Case 13-CA-21274 was never served on it as required by Section 10(b). SIC filed an answer in which it admitted that SIPCO implemented the plant closings at Moultrie and Guymon and terminated bargaining unit employees at these facilities, that New Sipco thereafter refused to apply the master agreement at Moultrie and Guymon when those plants were reopened and that upon the closing of the Tampa processing sales unit, SIC permitted eligible bargaining unit employees to exercise their master agreement seniority to transfer only to other SIPCO facilities covered by the master agreement. SIC, however, denied that any of these activities violated the Act. It denied all other allegations contained in the complaint and asserted that the allegations regarding the closing of Moultrie and Guymon and the subsequent refusal to apply the master agreement were barred by the limitations period contained in Section 10(b).

All parties were represented at the hearing and were afforded full opportunity to be heard and present evidence and argument. All parties filed briefs. On the entire record, my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and after giving due consideration to the briefs, I make the following

Respondents are admittedly employers engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act. The Union is admittedly a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

I. THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background

The original Swift & Company began operations late in the 19th century as a meatpacking company. In 1945, the Union[2] and that company reached agreement for the Union's representation of the Company's employees, and in 1945 the first master agreement was executed by the parties. At the same time, other meatpacking companies reached agreement with the Union for similar master agreements.

In 1948, John Copeland became associated with Swift & Company, was appointed a vice president[3] of that corporation in 1965 and remained in its employ until October 24, 1980. In 1956, Richard Knight became associated with Swift & Company[4] and in 1974 was appointed vice president of services. He also managed several of the corporation's plants. Later, both of these individuals became associated with newly formed companies that are alleged in the complaint to be alter egos of Swift & Company.

[1] On May 5, 1982, the hearing was adjourned sine die pending the receipt of interim briefs necessitated by the offer into the record of almost 500 exhibits and the desire to avoid argument as to the relevancy of each. Interim briefs were subsequently received and the case closed on August 30, 1982.

[2] Then called United Packinghouse Workers of America, CIO.

[3] Swift fresh meats division.

[4] Copeland also served as a member of the board of directors.

Until the later 1950s and early 1960s the meatpacking business was concentrated primarily in the hands of a few old line companies, Swift & Company among them, with plants located primarily in large meatpacking centers such as Chicago, Kansas City, St. Paul, and Omaha. During the 1960s, however, new companies came into existence, known generally as the new breed companies, and these built modern plants mostly located closer to the sources of supply. Swift & Company and other old line companies, because of outmoded facilities and equipment, poor locations, and high labor costs began closing various plants that could no longer compete. They also built new modern plants themselves with new equipment and techniques that were better able to compete with the newer companies. Despite the modernization undergone by the old line companies, however, they still suffered in competition with the new breed companies because of being saddled with heavy labor costs due to their being under master agreement while the new breed companies either had no labor unions at all or less costly local contracts.

Swift & Company in 1960 had 40 meatpacking plants in operation and produced about 15 percent of the nations inspected slaughtered beef, 16 percent of the pork, and 31 percent of the lamb. By 1980 these percentages dropped to 3-1/2, 6-1/2, and 16, respectively. Most of the decline occurred in the 1960s, although it continued thereafter.

Despite economic adversity in the 1960s and thereafter, Swift & Company endeavored to remain a viable part of the meatpacking industry by building or purchasing new plants and by expanding the number and type of commodities it sold. Also, during this period Swift & Company continued to negotiate consecutive master agreements with the Union[5] covering its employees throughout the country.

In 1969 there was a reorganization of Swift & Company and at that time the corporation was divided into divisional companies, one of which was Swift Fresh Meat Company. At this time, Copeland was asked to resign his position at Swift & Company and was appointed vice president of Swift Fresh Meat Company. Meanwhile, the merged unions, the United Packinghouse Workers and the Amalgamated Meat Cutters, combined their master agreements into a single document that was applied to the employees of Swift & Company, which the new union continued to represent. A new master agreement[6] was negotiated in 1970.

In the early 1970s Swift & Company undertook further attempts at diversification. In particular, less emphasis was placed on fresh beef and pork and more on consumer branded food products and nonfood products. In April 1973, further attempts at diversification were undertaken when Swift & Company, with the approval of its shareholders, created Esmark. Esmark was conceived of strictly as a holding company with no production facilities of its own. All production facilities were divided among its several wholly owned subsidiaries while Esmark itself provided only advisory counseling to them in areas of public relations, legal counsel, and fiscal matters.[7] The subsidiaries were left free to run their own businesses; to buy, sell, and distribute; and to do their own research and engineering. Esmark did, however, audit each subsidiary's books and pay their taxes.

The top managerial positions of the newly created Esmark were filled with individuals previously employed by Swift & Company. Thus, President Robert W. Reneker, Swift & Company, became the first president of Esmark and Robert Palenchar,[8] Swift & Company's vice president of personnel and public relations, became Esmark's vice president of personnel and public relations.

The subsidiaries that evolved in 1973 as a result of the reorganization were five or six in number, including Estech, Eschem,[9] and Swift & Company. Estech, a newly formed company, was separated from Swift & Company. It produced primarily fertilizer, leather, and adhesives. Estech's employees,[10] when it was part of Swift & Company, had been represented by the Union. After its separation from Swift & Company, its employees continued to be represented by the Union, under the master agreement. Eschem, a speciality chemical company previously wholly owned by Swift & Company, also continued to have its employees represented by the Union, under the master agreement, after separation. Swift & Company, following the reorganization, continued its food production operations, producing meat, peanut butter, edible oils, turkeys, and cheese. Its employees also continued to be represented by the Union under the master agreement.

In 1973 a new master agreement was negotiated. The procedure was exactly the same as it had been in prior years.[11] At the negotiating table, representing the Union was Jesse Prosten and representing Swift & Company and Estech were several individuals including Palenchar, still a vice president with Esmark, who acted as spokesman. Palenchar signed the document on behalf of Swift & Company and Estech both of whom were specifically named as parties in the document.

[5] During this period the Union's name was changed to Amalgamated Meat Cutters and Butcher Workmen of North America, AFL–CIO. This followed a merger of two separate unions engaged in similar work within the industry.

[6] The negotiation of the 1970 master agreement took the form of previously negotiated contracts. A national conference of packing plant delegates, 300-400 in number, was called. Resolutions prepared earlier by the various locals as well as resolutions prepared at the conference outlining proposed demands to be made later on the packing industry were introduced for consideration. Proposed demands agreed on at the conference were later taken back to the chain (delegates from plants of a particular company) for consideration of such demands as well as of the needs of the local. Once decisions were made at the local level, a date was requested of each company for the undertaking of full-fledged negotiations. At the negotiations, union representatives from the Swift & Company plants were present as well as a spokesman from the International. The Union was represented by 40 to 60 people, while a dozen company representatives and a company spokesman were also present. The 1970 labor agreement was eventually agreed on in this fashion.

[7] Esmark also took over the administration of certain pension plans from Swift & Company.

[8] Palenchar represented Swift & Company during the 1970 negotiations with the Union.

[9] Initially known as Unitech.

[10] Estech's managerial personnel also came from the ranks of Swift & Company's management. Thus, Joseph Sullivan, president of Swift Agricultural Chemical Corporation, part of Swift & Company, became Estech's first president.

[11] The Union was, however, notified of the restructuring of the companies, that they were all separate corporate entities but that all would be parties to the agreement.

The 1973-1976 master agreement was administered on a day-to-day basis at the local level despite the fact that it had been negotiated by Palenchar as vice president of Esmark. Palenchar, however, handled the more important matters.[12] Thus, it was Copeland's office[13] at Swift & Company and Richard Green at Estech that handled grievances at all steps up to arbitration at which time Palenchar at Esmark made the final decision whether the grievance should go to arbitration. The pension and insurance programs, however, were Esmark's so that the various divisional personnel departments worked together with Esmark's people to administer these programs.

During the 1973-1976 period, following the creation of Esmark, it was determined that the program of diversification should continue and that expansion into other areas where a more reasonable rate of return on investments and more consistent profits could be expected than could ordinarily be obtained from a strictly commodity-oriented business. Through the years prior to the creation of Esmark, the profits on sales of beef and pork had been inconsistent. Some years there had been reasonable profits while other years the profits were small or nonexistent. In the late 1960s and in 1971 and 1972, Swift & Company's earnings were poor. In 1973 its earnings suddenly increased. This, of course, was good for Swift & Company because the purpose of its existence was to sell its products. It was not, however, good for Esmark, which, as a holding company producing nothing, was interested in seeing the value of its stock increase; stock value being measured by the P/E[14] ratio. When Swift & Company was earning less in previous years, Esmark's stock P/E had been 10 or 12. When its earnings suddenly increased in 1973, the P/E of Esmark's stock suddenly dropped to about 4 or 5. In short, the value of Esmark's stock failed to increase proportionally as Swift & Company's earnings increased. It was determined through a survey that the probable reason for the failure of Esmark's stock value to increase was the fact that Esmark was still unknown. It was therefore determined that an advertising campaign should be undertaken in order to educate the public as to what Esmark was and of what its holdings consisted. The advertising campaign was initiated in 1974.

In 1975 Swift & Company closed a plant in Kearny, New Jersey, and sold another in Wilson, North Carolina. Costs of closing were charged by Esmark to Swift & Company. After the sale of the Wilson plant, the new owners[15] negotiated a new contract with the Union at much lower rates. The Wilson plant, a modern one, well located, had been closed because its labor costs were too high compared to that of its competition. Other plants,[16] which were modern and well located, were also closed during the 1960s, 1970s, and early 1980s solely because of the disadvantageous comparative labor costs under the master agreement. Thus, despite the reorganization of 1973 and the dramatic increased earnings enjoyed by Swift & Company that year, economic difficulties reappeared thereafter, at least in part due to labor costs.

In 1975, Palenchar decided that since Esmark was not involved in the actual operations of any of its subsidiaries, the labor relations function was not appropriately a part of Esmark. He suggested to Swift & Company that it take over that function. However, since the 1976 negotiations were near at hand, the personnel at Swift & Company requested that he stay on the job as bargaining head rather than have Swift & Company undertake obtaining an outside consultant to represent Swift & Company in bargaining. Palenchar agreed to the request after discussing the matter first with Donald Kelly, newly appointed president of Esmark, on condition that Swift Fresh Meat Company provide a major executive to be part of the negotiating team since Palenchar was no longer close to the operations of Swift. The condition was agreed on and Richard Knight, vice president of services, fresh meat division, Swift & Company, was assigned to aid Palenchar.[17] Similarly, Richard Green was present representing Estech's interests while Carl Marshall represented the processed meats division. Jesse Prosten was the Union's chief negotiator[18] and Palenchar was chief spokesman for both Swift & Company and Estech. On local problems subcommittee meetings were held. On health and welfare and pension matters,[19] the Union's William Burns negotiated with Robert Bell, manager of benefits. The negotiations resulted in the signing of the 1976-1979 master agreement with Palenchar signing for Swift & Company and Estech and Prosten signing for the Union.

Following execution of the 1976 master agreement, there was no immediate changes in the method of its administration. Most grievances that arose under that agreement concerned the reasonable and customary clause of the health benefit provision matters. These grievances were handled by William Burnes for the Union and Robert Bell who was initially manager of benefits of Swift & Company but who later took the same title as Esmark.

[12] Palenchar, during this period, had a number of personal contacts with Prosten concerning labor matter, and the administration of the contract. He also had two Esmark employees, Bob Lillian and Bruce Thompson, aiding him in his liaison labor work with Swift & Company.

[16] Clovis, New Mexico (1980), Grand Island, Nebraska (1976), Tolleson, Arizona, and Scottsbluff, Nebraska.

[18] Prosten was aided by the Union's Lewie Anderson.

[19] Increased benefits of retirees was of particular concern during these negotiations because the Union had set the pattern with Wilson Packing but Swift & Company had far more retirees receiving benefits than any other company under the master agreement. Thus, Swift had more to lose than other companies even though the master agreement signed by each company was virtually the same. With over 19,000 retirees to receive increased benefits under the new master agreement the management bargaining representatives were disturbed by the additional costs to them relative to the cost to be encountered by its competitors. The Company offered counterproposals to the Union but these were rejected and ultimatley the master agreement pattern proposal on this matter was accepted.

In 1976, William Watchman was brought into Swift & Company and made president in 1977. His backgound was in marketing and under his direction Swift & Company instituted a new program emphasizing the sale of consumer branded products, a change in direction that Esmark had repeatedly advocated. As part of the new program's implementation, Swift's fresh meat division's sales units, that had been selling turkeys and processed meat items along with their own fresh meats on a rental basis,[20] were, beginning in 1977, no longer permitted to do so. Rather, Swift & Company set up its own sales organization to handle the retail sale of processed meats and turkeys through its own salesmen and through outside brokers. Thus, in certain areas of the country Swift's fresh meat division salesmen would be selling fresh meats while other salesmen or brokers in the same area would at the same time be selling consumer branded products, processed meat items, and turkeys to retail customers.[21] Thus, there took place in 1977 the first of several steps, which eventually culminated in a complete separation of fresh meat business from the rest of the businesses operated within the Esmark family of companies.

Along with the business reorganization in 1977 there was also a labor relations reorganization that took place at the same time. The two were to complement each other. Thus, Palenchar for Esmark and Watchman for Swift & Company determined to remove Esmark from the labor relations field, and place all relations of this kind in the hands of those who dealt with them on a day-to-day basis. To accomplish this purpose, Watchman selected Director of Personnel of Playtex[22] James Farren to become vice president of personnel of Swift & Company. Lillian and Thompson were transferred from Palenchar's staff and from Esmark's payroll to Farren's staff and to Swift & Company's payroll to support Farren.[23] Palenchar also shifted all of his Swift & Company and Estech files to Farren's office. At the same time, personnel matters previously under control of Swift & Company's divisional offices were transferred to centralized control under Farren's office at Swift & Company. This was part of a larger reorganization wherein other divisional offices having to do with credit, taxes, etc., were consolidated under Swift & Company's immediate central control. In short, what occurred was that Watchman moved all control of labor relations from Swift & Company's divisions and from Esmark to a single point of control—Swift & Company's centralized office.

Palenchar advised the Union through Jesse Prosten of the reorganization of labor relations and the change in responsibilities. He, Prosten, and Farren, in fact, had lunch together[24] during which Prosten and Farren were introduced and it was explained how responsibility for labor relations had been transferred to Farren's Swift & Company industrial relations department.[25] The various respondents continued to honor the master agreement with the Union throughout this period of time.

By 1978 Esmark had become the holding company for six principle subsidiaries, thus successfully carrying out the diversification plan as previously envisioned. These six subsidiaries were: International Playtex, Inc; International Jensen, Incorporated; STP Corporation; Swift & Company; Estech, Inc.; and Vickers Energy Corporation. At this time Swift & Company continued its involvement in the food manufacture and distribution business.

Negotiations toward a 1979 master agreement went forward with union representatives of employees at the various plants participating, whether these plants were producers of fresh meats, processed meats, adhesives, chemicals, or whatever. Farren was chief spokesman for Swift & Company. Present also were Knight and Jaracz of the fresh meat division and Lee Lochmann of the processed foods division. Farren was aided by Bruce Thompson. Prosten was chief spokesman for the Union at these negotiations.[26]

Subcommittee meetings also took place as they had during previous contract negotiations. On pension and health and welfare matters, William Burns represented the Union. Farren and Douglas Empey represented Swift & Company.[27] Negotiations on these subjects followed a pattern established in earlier 1979 negotiations with John Morrell. However, the Morrell pattern required a number of changes in arrangement and language so that negotiations[28] were fairly time-consuming. Empey suggested certain changes in the medical and pension plans contained in the Morrell pattern agreement, which Farren presented at the main bargaining table. The Union, however, rejected these proposals and the contract eventually signed by the parties, for the most part, followed the Morrell pattern agreement.[29]

[20] Sales to stores and supermarkets as opposed to sales to service companies such as chain restaurants and fast food operations.

[22] Another Esmark company.

[23] Similarly, since both Aud and Tagg of the Fresh Meat Company's labor department had already retired, it was their replacements that were placed under Farren's control to help administer the labor contract.

[24] The luncheon occurred on June 5, 1977, and according to Palenchar, he never saw Prosten on any occasion thereafter, although he did speak with him by telephone on one or two occasions shortly thereafter. On these occasions, when Prosten brought up particular labor problems, Palenchar referred him to Farren, advising Prosten that he, personally, was no longer involved.

[25] The newly formed Swift & Company's industrial relations department had three functions: (1) responsibility for master agreement units; (2) negotiation and administration of local agreements; and (3) safety. Although the administration of benefit plans had nominally been centralized in Farren's department Esmark, nevertheless, remained in charge of administering the pension plan and advising with respect to the insurance plan.

[26] Farren had earlier been introduced to Prosten, the Union's chief negotiator, by Palenchar, Farren's predecessor in negotiations. Farren reported to Watchman as president of Swift.

[27] Empey had replaced Bell and was, at the time, director of pensions and benefits for Esmark. Empey worked for Larry Magner, director or personnel, who was directly under Palenchar.

[28] It was during these negotiations that the merger of the two unions occurred and whereas the Union began negotiations as the Amalgamated, it completed these negotiations as the United Food and Commercial Workers.

In 1979, about the time the above-described negotiations were taking place, the Esmark people were undergoing economic self-analysis. Esmark was then ranked about 30th in terms of industrial companies with annual revenues of about $6 billion. As in the past, it remained strictly a holding company, owning other manufacturing companies but manufacturing, producing, or selling neither products nor services itself. Its primary concerns were seeing to it that its subsidiaries remained economically healthy and that the price of its own stock was reflective of its true value, or if possible was priced even higher. To these ends, Esmark would oversee the cash accounts between itself and its subsidiaries that reflected the flow of funds between them and that, in part, determined the size and type and growth or shrinkage of its investments in particular subsidiaries at a particular time. As to considerations affecting the price of Esmark stock at this time, there were several under review. One such consideration was the possibility of selling one or more subsidiaries in order to change the image of Esmark as perceived by potential investors. Standing in the way of such divestments were the pension plans in effect at the time and accrued liabilities thereunder. A study was undertaken in mid-1979 to determine how the two pension plans[30] administered by Esmark could be rearranged and pension liability reduced to make purchase of the subsidiaries more attractive. The study resulted in a finding that any possible sale of the subsidiaries participating in the Esmark pension plans would be severely undermined by the fact that the employees of those subsidiaries and retired employees of those subsidiaries had vested rights in the pension plans that would be considered a serious encumbrance by any potential buyer. The pension liability of each subsidiary had not yet been broken down at this time so that an immediate sale of any subsidiary was made impossible because the true worth of that subsidiary could not accurately be known until its pension liability was determined and this would take time to calculate. An outside actuarial firm was hired to compute the breakdown of pension liability for each subsidiary.

It would appear from the record that in late 1979 Esmark was, in fact, comtemplating a sale of some of its subsidiaries because in November 1979 the president of Esmark, while in Europe, was discussing with certain investors the possibility of their purchasing the Esmark subsidiaries or directly investing in Esmark.[31] Aside from the fact that Esmark was interested in divesting itself of certain subsidiaries in order to increase the value of Esmark stock, it was interested in selling certain holdings because at the time it was having liquidity problems. It had borrowed substantial sums for investment purposes and the costs of servicing these loans were proving excessive. To resolve the liquidity problem and to determine the reason for the relatively low price on the market of Esmark stock, Esmark hired Solomon Brothers to look into both of these questions. Solomon Brothers determined that $50 per share for Esmark was a justifiable figure, the figure Esmark was asking per share of its stock, but a figure substantially below its market value.

Even while Solomon Brothers was conducting its study, Esmark's management was concerned that Esmark investors were not receiving a reasonable return on their investments. It was believed that Esmark's investment in food producing companies was the direct reason for its lack of substantial return on investment. Experts in the field had determined that basic food companies' stock sold at a multiple of six, i.e., that the price of stock of food producing companies was six times greater than their annual earnings while hybrid oil company stocks sold at a multiple of eight or nine. From the expert findings it was determined that the general populace conceived of Esmark as a food company, more particularly connected with the fresh meat industry and that this perceptual connection caused more problems with respect to the value of Esmark stock than did any other consideration. It was determined that Esmark's image had to be changed.

Meanwhile, by December 1979, the study of how to rearrange the Esmark pension plans had been completed and it was determined that the existing plans should be separated among the various major subsidiaries already participating and that, in addition, a separate plan for retired employees[32] should be created. The separate pension plan for employees already retired appeared more desirable because it could be funded for less money since there would not be a steady stream of additional employees constantly being added to it. The decision to split the Esmark pension plan was to be effectuated by May 1980 and each subsidiary was to be charged independently for its contributions toward its own pension plan. The target dates of May 1980 was, in fact, met.

The beginning of 1980 witnessed no appreciable change in the economic situation under which Swift & Company continued to operate. In particular, its Clovis, New Mexico plant was having difficulties due to the contractual requirements of the master agreement. After discussing the matter with Esmark management and obtaining its approval, Copeland sought relief from the Union on such matters as cost-of-living and clothes changing allowances and vacation pay computations. It was Copeland's belief that because Clovis was a modern plant, ecomomic in size, its recent losses were due primarily to a poor competitive position vis-a-vis labor costs. He felt that if the Union would grant the relief requested Clovis could eventually once again become profitable. In accordance with its historical position against making midterm changes in the master agreement, however, the Union refused Copeland's request for relief during a meeting in February.[33] On March 27, the Company announced that the plant would close on September 28 and the plant was, in fact, closed[34] as per the announcement, but a few months later.

[29] In the months following completion of the 1979 negotiations, Burns and other union officers would occasionally call Empey concerning grievances falling within his expertise. After suggesting that he call local plant management, Empey would sometimes answer the question himself as a matter of courtesy.

[30] There was a pension plan for salaried employees and one for hourly employees. The salaried plan covered employees of Swift & Company, Estech, and Vickers Energy. The hourly plan covered employees of Swift & Company and Estech. Other subsidiaries already had pension plans in existence at the time of acquisition, which were kept in place thereafter.

[31] There was, among other possibilities, the offer of selling Esmark shares at $50 per share. These shares were selling at the time for $25 to $30 per share, and for this reason were not seen as a particularly good investment by the Europeans questioned on the matter.

[32] At the time there were more people on pension than there were working and the unfunded pension liability was large.

1. The sale of the fresh meats operation

In April 1980, at a meeting of the board of directors, after serious consideration by certain members of management over a period of months, it was suggested that Esmark divest itself of the fresh meats division. The divestiture was part of a larger package of proposals that were made based on various considerations: the Solomon Brothers study, the liquidity problem, and the need for certain restructuring of the subholding companies. The board was receptive to certain portions of the suggested package, but not inclined to accept others. It was in favor of exploring the possibility of disposing of the fresh meats division as well as the energy segment.[35] No immediate, final decision on these proposals were made at this time.

On April 25, a meeting took place in Watchman's office. This meeting was attended by Kelly, Watchman, and Assistant General Counsel for Esmark Karl Becker.[36] Kelly announced that Watchman had resigned as president of Swift & Company and that he was appointing Sullivan, then president of Estech, as the new president of Swift & Company.[37] He also announced that a decision had been made that Esmark would divest itself of the fresh meats division one way or the other, either by selling it to private investors or through an employee stock ownership plan.[38] Kelly, at this meeting or at another held shortly thereafter, told Copeland that he should henceforth report directly to him and should, along with his staff, begin putting together a company that could be sold as a unit by adding to the existing fresh meats division additional staff functions to permit it to operate independently. He also told him to decide which of the already existing units of the fresh meats division should be included in the new company.

Following the April meeting of the board of directors and the above-described meeting of April 25, Becker, as instructed, educated himself as to ESOPs in general and to the feasibility of divesting the fresh meats division through the utilization of an ESOP. He discussed these matters with the fresh meats division management and advised them of his opinion that such an approach was worth pursuing. At the same time, Becker worked on the problem of Esmark's divesting itself of the energy segment, the wrinkle here being how to get in excess of a billion dollars for it, as management was expecting, when the total market value of its stock was about $550-$650 million. It was expected that Esmark would receive in excess of 10 times the value for the energy segment than it would for the sale of the fresh meats division.

Copeland, pursuant to Kelly's directions, undertook a study of the fresh meats division and determined that it was without and therefore needed the addition of certain departments in order to operate independently. These included treasury, personnel, tax, credit, legal, and other departments. He and his staff had to consider not only the creation of such additions but the staffing of each new department.[39] After the new personnel department was created, the other new departments were staffed through it.

The question of which plants and other physical units were to be included in the new company was also considered and the answer to this question would depend to a certain degree on whether the divestiture would eventually take the form of an ESOP or an outright sale of the entire company as a unit. A closing down of all facilities with piecemeal sales of individual plants and sales units was also a possibility. Each plant and sales unit was considered in light of its history—whether profitable, marginal, or had operated at a loss. Similarly, each plant's potential was also considered in light of possible changes including changes in existing labor contracts. Thus, in the Midwest where pork plants were operating under the master agreement but where competitors were also operating under the master agreement, it was decided that these plants would remain open. The same was felt regarding non-UFCW pork and beef plants that were also operating at a profit. Sales units and plants not operating at an acceptable margin of profit were to be closed.[40] It was concluded that if the Union rejected the ESOP plan a company with $2 billion in annual sales could be put together and operate at a profit. This company would be sold to outside investors. All decisions as to the inclusion or exclusion of certain plants and sales were, of course, subject to the approval of Esmark.

The Esmark board of directors' meeting was scheduled for May 29, 1980. In preparation for that meeting there were certain preparations that ultimately resulted in the proffering of an economic package plan for consideration by the board. The week before the board

[33] Since the Union had virtually the same master agreement with various other companies, it could not afford to grant such changes without adversely affecting Swift & Company's competitors, particularly those in the same general geographic area. The Company's argument that there were no competitors under the master agreement in the same geographical area did not influence the Union's decision.

[35] Reasons have been discussed supra.

[36] Sullivan later joined the group.

[37] This announcement was in accordance with a decision reached the day before at the board of directors' meeting.

[38] The subject of an employee stock ownership plan (ESOP) had come up earlier and Becker had been asked by Harrison to look into the feasibility of utilizing an ESOP as a possible means of Esmark's divesting itself of the fresh meats division.

[39] The new departments were staffed with personnel from Swift & Company, Esmark, and from outside. Many of the personnel obtained from Swift & Company had worked for the fresh meats division (Company) prior to an earlier reorganization.

[40] About 50 sales units plus the Clovis, New Mexico; Rochelle, Illinois; Moultrie, Georgia; and Guymon, Oklahoma plants fell into this grouping. However, if the Union were to accept the ESOP proposal, it was planned to request that the Union grant concessions to keep these plants operating, which concessions were to take the form of adjustments in labor costs. It was felt, however, that these plants could not continue to operate under the master agreement.

meeting, a preliminary meeting was held, which was attended by certain Esmark officers plus representatives of Solomon Brothers. At this earlier meeting a procedure for selling the energy segment was revealed and discussed whereby the maximum price could probably be obtained. This was to be part of the package plan presented at the forthcoming meeting of the board. Similarly, Becker had put together facts and figures on a proposed ESOP plan to be offered at the meeting for consideration by the board. He calculated the total wage earnings of the employees who were to purchase the new company and determined the size of the loan that sum could sustain, i.e., $135 million. He also worked out the mechanics of how the ESOP was to be set up. The amount of return to Esmark for the assets was similarly calculated for presentation to the board.

At the May 1980 board meeting the economic package was presented including the plan to sell the energy segment; the plan to dispose of the fresh meats operation, hopefully through the ESOP wherein 10 percent of the new company would be distributed among Esmark stockholders as a dividend, 30 percent would be owned by Esmark, and 60 percent by the employees; a plan to sell Swift International; a tender offer for roughly 50 percent of Esmark stock, priced between $55 and $60 per share; and the funding of certain outstanding pension obligations. Thus, the ESOP proposal was just a minor portion of a very large economic package, as measured in dollar values.

The board was in favor of the entire package, as presented, including the ESOP plan.[41] Direction was given to finalize and to put into proper form all the proposals contained therein.

Subsequent to the May board meeting, Kelly called a meeting, which was attended by certain management officials of Esmark and of the fresh meats operation. At this meeting, presentation of the ESOP plan to the Union was discussed and it was determined that the plan should be in writing and should reflect that the new fresh meats company would be a viable entity. The fresh meats people, Becker and others, thereafter worked up an ESOP proposal that provided for, among other things, changes in the master agreement at Guymon, Moultrie, and Clovis and the retention of those plants.[42] Other concessions were also envisioned. Esmark people contributed language dealing with the financial part of the ESOP as well as language suggested by the fresh meats people regarding contract concessions.[43]

On June 10, 1980, the ESOP plan was presented to the Union. The meeting[44] took place in the office of the president of the Union.[45] Palenchar, at the request of Copeland, acted as spokesman. He described to the Union's representatives the total ESOP plan and then gave them copies of the written document. At the end of his presentation, the union representatives asked questions and there was some discussion concerning the plan. William Wynn, president of the Union, stated that he recognized the seriousness of the situation and said that the plan would be given study and review in that light, although it was against the Union's philosophy to promote employee ownership in companies. He promised an answer in a matter of days.

On receipt of the ESOP plan, the Union had an attorney review it. The attorney suggested that the Union reject the proposal and it was agreed by union officials that they should do so. The Union contacted Carl Taylor and a meeting was scheduled for June 23 in Washington. On that date Palenchar, Copeland, and Farren flew to Washington, D.C. for the meeting at which they expected to hear from the Union regarding acceptance or rejection of the ESOP plan. When they arrived at Carl Taylor's office, they were informed that he was already over at Wynn's office and were advised to wait. When Taylor returned, he told them that he had already met with Wynn, that the Union had rejected the ESOP proposal, had offered no counterproposal, and saw no need for further meetings. After advising Kelly in Chicago of the events of the evening, the management group in Washington was instructed to return to Chicago in time for an early morning meeting.

At 8 a.m. on June 24 a meeting took place in Kelly's office, attended by various members of management of Esmark, Swift & Company, and the fresh meats division as well as by outside counsel. The purpose of the meeting was to decide what to do with the fresh meats units in light of the Union's rejection of the ESOP plan, considering the fact that all other pieces of the restructuring program, including sale of the energy segment, were in place. Those present had to determine how to dispose of the fresh meats operations and it was generally agreed that all of fresh meats units should be closed down, but only after giving proper notice to the Union as required by the contract and providing an opportunity to negotiate concerning the closings as required by law.

Available alternatives were discussed, including shutting down the entire fresh meats operation and selling off the assets. Kelly asked Sullivan if he wanted to keep any of the fresh meats units, reminding him that he was expected to run a consumer branded products company. With few exceptions, however, it was determined that all fresh meats units were going to be closed.

Later in the afternoon, Copeland got together with his people to consider whether there might be some other alternative to dissolving the fresh meats division. They decided that they should offer the plan considered earlier by him and his staff as an alternative to ESOP, that is the plan to close all units and sell the assets. Institution of the latter plan, however, would have meant the loss of 6000 jobs, including Copeland's. As a result of this realization, Copeland made arrangements to speak with Kelly to see if yet a third plan could be worked out. At the subsequent meeting, Copeland met with Kelly to see if he could convince him that there were viable possibilities superior to the considerations previously contemplated. At the meeting, Copeland showed projected profit-and-loss statements with supporting balance sheets. He identified those units that could be operated at a profit and indicated how much money would be necessary to support them over the next several years. He also specifically indicated which plants, in his opinion, should be closed and ventured that closing costs at these plants should be stood by Esmark. He pinpointed Guymon, Oklahoma, and Moultrie, Georgia, as plants that should be closed and noted that Clovis, New Mexico, already-scheduled for closing, should be closed also.[46] In short, he outlined the possibility of establishing a new fresh meats company, and offered profit projections to support its existence. Kelly was receptive and indicated that certain European investors might be interested in investing in such a newly formed company, if not others. He suggested that Copeland put the idea into a brochure form for him to take to Europe with him on an already-planned summer trip. Other members of management, present at the time, agreed. Sullivan, who was present during this meeting, asked Kelly if he should continue to consider which fresh meats units he would want to keep. Kelly, apparently taken with Copeland's argument, replied negatively, advising Sullivan to discontinue any such study, and indicating that, at this point, it would be certainly better to sell the fresh meats business as a unit.

[41] Certain changes in the percentage of ownership were agreed on; for example, it was decided Esmark would retain 37.5 percent of the new company or the total value of the assets that the new company would own, assets obtained from Esmark, were in excess of the amount that could be obtained from a loan based on the employees' wages. Since the employees could not finance the entire transaction, Esmark decided to retain part ownership. The investment was also considered as a means of showing faith in the new venture.

[42] In the alternative plan to ESOP, these plants were to be closed, along with a lamb plant in Chino, as well as the plant in Rochelle, Illinois.

[43] Robert Palenchar and Karl Becker were responsible in large part for the preparation of the ESOP document on recommendations from Copeland and Farren.

[44] Present for management were Palenchar, Copeland, Farren, and Carl Taylor, Swift & Company's labor counsel. Present for the Union were William Wynn, president, and Lewie Anderson, acting vice president and director, packinghouse division.

[45] The president's office is in Washington, D.C.

On June 26, 1980, Esmark's board of directors met and approved the proposed disposal of the fresh meats division and the energy segment,[47] the tender offer of $55 million, and the funding of the pension plan, in short, the entire package. The decision was made at the meeting that certain plants and other facilities of Swift & Company should be closed[48] or otherwise disposed of with Esmark picking up the closing costs;[49] that the remaining units of the Swift fresh meats division should become a separate company known as Swift Independent Packing Company (SIPCO), to be sold by Esmark with Esmark possibly retaining an ownership position; and that Swift & Company should continue to operate in the processed foods area.

Following the decision by the board of directors to approve the entire package, steps were undertaken to effectuate its decision. Investment bankers were retained to sell the energy segment to major oil companies through a bidding procedure. Meanwhile Copeland and his subordinates had already decided which plants and sales units would go into the new company and which ones were to be closed or kept open. Similarly, they had the responsibility of carrying out the decision as to the creation and manning[50] of newly created departments made necessary by the separation of the new company from both Swift & Company and Esmark. Completion of all these tasks was targeted for the end of the fiscal year, October 1980, at which time SIPCO was scheduled to be entirely independent. Esmark personnel were responsible for the accounting and auditing functions involved in the split up of operations and the closing of facilities. In particular, the Esmark people had to set up a reserve against the expected losses connected with the closings.

On June 26, Farren contacted Anderson to inform him of the forthcoming formal announcement concerning the closing of certain master agreement facilities. Farren had previously informed Anderson that the rejection of the ESOP plan would result in such closings, and during the conversation of June 26 Farren specifically mentioned Moultrie, Guymon, Rochelle, and five sales units. On June 30 the closing notice was sent by Farren to Anderson announcing the plants to be closed and the dates of closing, and offering to meet and discuss the effects of the planned closings. All announced closings were approved by Kelly on behalf of Esmark.

In August, Copeland continued to pursue his staffing efforts on behalf of SIPCO. At that time, during a discussion with Kelly, the latter suggested that Edward Harrison and R. T. Briggs sit on SIPCO's board of directors and that the compensation committee of the board of directors consist of the two Esmark representatives and Copeland. Kelly also suggested that the board be comprised mostly of outsiders rather than of employees and officers of the Company. Copeland complied with these suggestions although he also included on the board the officers of SIPCO, also agreed to by Kelly.

At the same time, further work was being done on formulating which plants and sales units should be included within SIPCO. Permission was obtained to include the Des Moines plant, which had been closed for some time. In August also, it was finally decided to include the Moultrie and Guymon plants.

In August, while SIPCO was still being put together, Copeland asked Farren to try to set up a meeting with Anderson to inform him of his plans with regard to SIPCO. A meeting was scheduled attended by Copeland, Farren, and Anderson. Although termed by Copeland as "a get-acquainted meeting," during which he advised Anderson of the plan to sell SIPCO[51] and leave Esmark, he also, for the first time, personally broached the subject of getting relief from the master agreement in effect at Moultrie, Guymon, and Clovis. Copeland felt that these were good, modern plants which would fit in very well with the new company but for the sole deficiency that they were noncompetitive because of the labor costs. Anderson reminded Copeland that Moultrie and Guymon were both under the master agreement and that the Union did not make midterm changes in the master agreement. Copeland stated that he wanted to keep Moultrie and Guymon open, but would not do so if he had to pay master agreement rates. Anderson said that there could be no reduction in benefits and that the master agreement would have to stand. Copeland suggested that Anderson keep an open mind.

[46] The closing of these plants did not necessarily mean that the new company would divest itself of them. This had not yet been decided.

[47] Vickers Energy Corporation.

[48] Guymon and Moultrie were included.

[49] Such costs included severance pay, pension adjustments, and costs of retraining transferees.

[50] For example, Niese who had been in charge of personnel at Swift & Company came over to SIPCO as vice president in charge of employee relations. Similarly, Copeland in late July or early August appointed Knight, vice president in charge of beef, lamb, and labor.

[51] At the time Kelly was planning a trip to Europe to sell the company to investors in Great Britain or Germany. The trip took place, as planned, on September 2 but was unsuccessful.

Later, after Copeland put Knight in charge of labor relations for SIPCO, he decided that he would introduce him to Anderson. A meeting was scheduled for August 25 both for this purpose and to keep the Union posted on the most recent events. He also wanted to discuss Moultrie and Guymon once again with Anderson. The meeting took place in Anderson's office in Washington. After introductions, Copeland described to Anderson the progress made toward separating SIPCO from Esmark, and informed him of future plans. Later in the meeting, Copeland again attempted to impress Anderson with the fact that the Moultrie and Guymon plants, if operating, would make the purchase of the company more attractive to potential buyers but that under the present circumstances they were not viable plants. He pointed out that Moultrie was paying $14 per hour under the contract while competitors were paying only $6.50 per hour under contracts with the same union and that neither Moultrie nor Guymon was competitive. He told Anderson that without relief those plants would have to be closed. On the other hand, Copeland assured Anderson that SIPCO would continue to apply the master agreement at any plants when it was competitive. Anderson, in response, was noncommittal, stating that he could not see how any changes could be made in the master agreement.

On September 10 the same three individuals met again to discuss SIPCO. This meeting took place in Chicago[52] at the behest of management, the purpose being to discuss efforts being made to sell SIPCO and to also converse once again on the status of Guymon, Moultrie, Clovis, and the possible reopening of Des Moines. More specifically, Copeland and Knight asked Anderson if he had come up with any way that he could change the master agreement at these plants to make SIPCO more competitive and permit it to operate these plants. Anderson replied that he had not. Copeland then told Anderson that other packers had voiced interest in these plants, particularly in Moultrie. He advised Anderson that at present the plan was to let Esmark go ahead with the closing in accordance with the master agreement terms, have Esmark to pick up all the closing costs, then sell the company to outside interests, and then have the new owners open those plants, recognizing that the Union still had bargaining rights but insisting on a new contract with competitive labor rates.[53] He analogized the plan to the sale of a few years previously of the plant in Wilson, North Carolina, to Dinner Bell, which, after Swift & Company closed the plant, opened it up again the following week with a new labor agreement far more competitive than the one Swift had had prior to the closing. Copeland argued that SIPCO, being a new company, was in the same position as Dinner Bell and that the Union should treat it the same way—that since SIPCO would no longer be owned by Esmark, but would be an entirely new and independent company, it should have the opportunity of negotiating a new, local, competitive contract. Anderson replied that negotiations toward a new, local, more competitive contract could take place after the sale only if the company could get out from under the master agreement legally. That meant, according to Anderson, that Esmark would first have to sell over 50 percent of the ownership of SIPCO. With this caveat, Anderson then entered into a discussion with Copeland and Knight concerning possible new competitive rates at the various plants. Generally, Anderson quoted certain rates, lower than master agreement rates, while Copeland argued that these rates were still noncompetitive. No agreement was reached. However, when Copeland advised Anderson of SIPCO's interest in reopening the Des Moines plant,[54] Anderson commented that he thought he could organize the employees and negotiate a new competitive contract with SIPCO for Des Moines once it was reopened. The parties agreed to discuss the Des Moines plant at a later date.

On September 18, Knight and SIPCO counsel Bruce Thompson[55] met with Anderson and Al Vincent, his assistant, in Washington, D.C., to continue the discussion concerning the Moultrie, Guymon, and Des Moines plants. At this meeting, the plans concerning the closing of Moultrie and Guymon by Esmark and their reopening by the newly sold SIPCO were reviewed with Anderson as was SIPCO's plan to reopen Des Moines if agreement could be reached with the Union for competitive labor rates at that point. Anderson stated that with regard to Moultrie and Guymon he wanted to go on record once again in stating the Union's position that it would not agree to any midterm modifications of the master agreement. He added that he understood what Knight was saying about closing and opening plants at Moultrie and Guymon and that the Union, meaning the International, would not "stir the pot" regarding these plans provided they were legal. He added that he did not think they were. He informed Knight and Thompson that although the International would not cause any problems at this point, if the International changed its position regarding the Moultrie and Guymon situaton, he would so advise them.[56] The discussion then moved to which units were to be included within the new company and what contracts were to be applied. Knight informed Anderson that certain plants and sales units would continue to operate under the master agreement whereas there were others that would not. Specifically, Knight reiterated that Des Moines, if opened, and Moultrie and Guymon, when opened, would operate under competitive agreements but all other plants then operating under the master agreement would continue to do so. Following the September 18 meeting, and throughout October, Knight kept in touch with Anderson by telephone, advising him of progress made toward splitting off SIPCO from Swift & Company and Esmark. Des Moines, Moultrie, and Guymon were also discussed. Regarding Des Moines, Anderson and Knight agreed to meet in November to discuss the reopening of that plant. Concerning Moultrie and Guymon, Knight relayed to Anderson his understanding that those plants would be closed as of December 28 as scheduled and would be reopened January 10 or 15, 1981. Anderson replied that as long as it was legal they could go ahead.

[52] Anderson described a meeting with Copeland in September in Washington, D.C. Copeland denied meeting with Anderson after September 10. I credit Copeland. I believe Anderson was confused as to the Chicago meeting on September 10 with Copeland and a later meeting with Knight and Thompson in Washington.

[53] The position of management at this time was that as long as Esmark owned Swift & Company and SIPCO, all three were bound by the master agreement; that since Moultrie and Guymon were not economically viable under the master agreement rates and the Union refused to agree to make changes in these rates, these plants had to be closed; but once Esmark sold SIPCO, the new owners would no longer be bound by the master agreement and could negotiate a new contract after reopening these plants.

[54] The Des Moines plant had been closed in 1979, was no longer under the master agreement, and was therefore in a different position from the other plants. A similar offer, according to Copeland, was made by Anderson regarding Clovis. Anderson denies this. Other plants were likewise discussed.

[55] Anderson testified concerning a meeting he had with Knight in Washington in September. He denied, however, that Thompson was present. Elsewhere he testified that he may have attended a meeting at which Thompson was present. I credit Knight and Thompson on this point.

On September 30 and October 1 and 2, a major step toward the restructuring of Esmark was accomplished. The energy segment was disposed of in three pieces to three different buyers on these days. The total energy disposition was valued at $1.1 billion. One of the purchasers, Mobil Transocean Corporation, a subsidiary of Mobil Oil, offered $60 per share for Esmark stock to Esmark's public stockholders. The total value of the stock was $715 million. The Esmark stock was then exchanged for Esmark's stock in its subsidiary, Vickers Energy Corporation.

The actual restructuring of Swift & Company, when it finally occurred, was a piecemeal operation that extended over a period of months. Thus, Swift & Company, as a subsidiary of Esmark, set up its own subsidiary on September 3, 1980, called Transitory Food Processors, Inc. On October 15, the name of Transitory Food Processors, Inc. was changed to Swift & Co., effective October 24. On October 21 the original Swift & Company transferred all of its assets except for its ongoing fresh meat division to Transitory Food Processors, Inc. (now the new Swift & Company) effective October 27. On October 24, the name of the original Swift & Company was officially changed to Swift Independent Packing Company (SIPCO).[57] At this time the various tangible and intangible assets, physical properties, as well as trademarks, notes, etc., were divided between SIPCO (originally Swift & Company) and Swift & Company (previously Transitory Food Processors, Inc.). This amounted to transferring back to new Swift & Company its name, trademarks,[58] and everything else that did not apply directly to fresh meat. The things that were directly related to the fresh meat end of the business were taken by SIPCO. On October 27, SIPCO declared a dividend of all of (new) Swift & Company stock to Esmark. The net result of all of these transactions was the splitting of the original Swift & Company into two separate wholly owned subsidiaries of Esmark; SIPCO, which owned and operated the fresh meats business, and the new Swift & Company, which operated the remainder of the operations.

Along with these changes there were also some changes made in personnel. The board of directors of the original Swift & Company resigned and then, for the most part, became members of the board of directors of the new Swift & Company, previously Transitory Food Processors, Inc. It was also about this time that Copeland appointed a new board of directors for SIPCO and also appointed Knight both president of beef, lamb, and labor, and a member of the board of directors of SIPCO.

After finally completing the separation in late October, the decision then had to be made as to how Esmark would dispose of SIPCO. Of the various alternatives, public offering, over a period of time, gained ascendancy as a consideration. Solomon Brothers and other investment people were again consulted and it was agreed that sale to the public was a viable option. It was therefore agreed between Esmark and their various consultants that a public offering[59] should be put together. Becker and others worked on the problem from then on.

The primary concern of those assigned to work on the public offering issue was the pricing. A price multiple of four was being discussed, that is that the price for stock should be four times the company's earnings. This was determined to be the correct ratio because since high technology companies were selling at price multiples of 20 or 25, hybrid energy companies were selling at a P/E ratio of 8 or 9, and food companies normally sold at a price multiple of 6, it was felt that SIPCO would be most salable at a P/E of 4. The next thing to think about was the form of the sale, that is whether to sell direct to the public, to create another holding company and sell stock publicly in that holding company, or to use some other approach. All of these considerations were worked on beginning in October 1980 and extending into January 1981.

In October there was a meeting attended by officials of Esmark, SIPCO, and certain investment underwriters. Thereafter, members of the investment firms visited the various plants and interviewed Copeland and other SIPCO officials in order to get an overview of the operation. Meanwhile, another meeting between Knight and Anderson was scheduled for and took place on November 5 in Chicago at Knight's request; the purpose being to keep Anderson abreast of progress being made at SIPCO. At the meeting, Knight reiterated that SIPCO was to be independent, that in order to operate the plants at Moultrie and Guymon, relief would be necessary for this reason, SIPCO would not apply the master agreement at those plants. Once again Anderson refused to make any concessions and advised Knight that in his opinion the plan was unlawful. Nevertheless, Knight advised Anderson that incorporation papers had been filed for SIPCO, that brokerage firms had been engaged to handle the forthcoming public sale of stock, which would probably occur in January 1981. Knight then listed the plants and units that SIPCO planned to operate and those planned to close. He advised Anderson that all plants currently under the master agreement would continue to operate as before except for Moultrie and Guymon. With respect to those two plants, Knight told Anderson that it was his present intention to close those two plants and have SIPCO open them up again after 2 weeks. At the time of reopening, SIPCO negotiated a new local contract with the Union, which would be more competitive than the master agreement; that is to say, it would contain provisions less favorable to the employees. Yet, Knight assured Anderson that continuous service would be recognized for all employees at Moultrie and Guymon as well as elsewhere. Anderson asked that Knight put everything in writing and Knight agreed to do so. Finally, Knight advised Anderson that the Company probably could not be sold by January 15. In order not to have Moultrie and Guymon closed for too long a period of time, he asked Anderson about the possibility of the Company opening up these facilities before the sale was completely finalized. Knight explained that too long a period of closure would interfere with the supply of animals, distribution, and sales, and the experienced labor supply. As things stood at the time, the two plants were scheduled to close down December 28 and the sale was not expected to be finalized until February 1. The 5 or 6 weeks of shut down was considered unacceptable to Knight. Anderson refused to go along with Knight's request stating once again that the master agreement could not be altered and that if the procedure that Knight suggested was not legal he could not go along with it. Knight then requested, as an alternative, that the closing dates be extended. Anderson did not commit himself at the time and the two agreed to meet and discuss it again in a few days. Two days later, however, they talked by telephone and Anderson took the position that if the closings were delayed, it would require, according to the contract, a second closing notice and a 6-month extension of operations for the plants. Knight rejected this position.

[56] Specific rates for the Des Moines Plant were discussed, but no agreement was reached at this time.

[57] In this way SIPCO became the successor to the original Swift & Company. This was preferrable for financial purposes and tax considerations.

[58] Since Esmark was keeping the consumer branded products, the name "Swift" and "Swift Premium" on those products was important to them.

[59] A public offering seemed feasible at this time because the facilities being operated at their locations seemed capable of being run at a profit, the product was proven, and Esmark had agreed to take the pension liability problem out of the picture.

On December 8, Knight met with Anderson in Washington and brought with him a draft containing the information that Anderson had asked on November 5 to be put in writing. The draft listed the SIPCO plants that were to continue under the master agreement, the proposed action to be taken at Moultrie and Guymon, as previously discussed, and the fact that SIPCO was going public with a timetable for accomplishing it. The contents of the draft were discussed as were other matters of mutual interest, including the opening of Des Moines and the possible closing of the Tampa[60] and Chino facilities. During the meeting Knight made notes on how the letter should be changed to reflect what Anderson wanted to get in writing. Regarding the Moultrie and Guymon plants, Anderson advised Knight that if what management was planning to do was legal the Union would not obstruct its action although it would not give the plan its blessing. On December 11 Knight sent to Anderson the letter containing the information requested by Anderson on November 5 and discussed by those two individuals on that date and on December 8.

Shortly after the mailing of the December 11 letter, Knight contacted Anderson and suggested another meeting to be attended by not only himself and Anderson but also by their attorneys, the object being to discuss certain problems that had evolved due to the Union's refusal either to permit SIPCO to extend the closing date for Moultrie and Guymon beyond December 28 or to open the plants early and the fact that the public sale probably was not going to take place until some time in March. The meeting was held in Chicago on December 17 and was attended by Knight and his attorney, Bruce Thompson, while Anderson was accompanied by in-house counsel Stan Gacek. At this meeting, Knight explained once again that SIPCO was going public and would be completely independent from both Swift & Company and Esmark. He reiterated that the plan was for SIPCO to close down while still owned by Esmark and to be reopened after the public sale. He attempted to convince Anderson and Gacek that the procedure was totally legal. He noted, however, that the Company was in a bind because it had already given notice that it was closing Moultrie and Guymon on December 28, but that it now appeared that the public sale of stock could not be completed until March. Knight explained the problems that would attend a prolonged period of closure and tried to obtain agreement from Anderson and Gacek to let SIPCO open Moultrie and Guymon early, before the public sale in order to cut down the period of closure. He offered his assurances as he had in his December 11 letter that if the process of becoming a publicly held independent corporation were not completed within a reasonable length of time after the opening of the Guymon and Moultrie facilities, the company would recognize retroactively the terms and conditions previously provided to the employees at these locations under the contract between Swift & Company and the Union, i.e., the master agreement. Anderson replied that in his opinion what the Company was doing was illegal, that SIPCO was not going to be independent of Swift & Company and Esmark, and that what it was doing at Moultrie and Guymon was likewise illegal. He added that the Union would not go along with it. Gacek added that the Union's position was clear—that if the Company opened Moultrie and Guymon before the sale by Esmark of the SIPCO stock it would be an alter ego situation, and the [60] Tampa was a facility that was under the master agreement and was suffering competitively. Knight informed Anderson that if relief were not obtained it too might have to be closed. Anderson replied that he could do nothing about the situation at the time.

Union would object to such an action on the Company's part as illegal unless the openings were under the master agreement. Any opening of the plants after the sale of stock would be all right provided it was legal. Thompson explained how there would be a new corporate structure that would hopefully insulate the Company from legal problems arising from the alter ego situation at Moultrie and Guymon, which at any rate would be a very short period, subsequently corrected by the public offering. Despite Thompson's argument, neither Anderson nor Gacek were convinced and maintained their position that the Union would not agree to the opening of these facilities prior to the completion of the public offering. They added that the Companies could change their names all they wanted but they were still all the same and the master agreement should apply. Having failed with this approach, Knight then asked, once again, about the possibility of extending the closing notice at Moultrie and Guymon. Anderson refused and suggested that the company might rescind its earlier notices but added that if it did, it would be obligated under the contract to give the workers another 6-month notice of closing. Knight replied that the company would likely be forced to unilaterally extend the notice of closing at Moultrie and Guymon. On December 22 Knight contacted Anderson by phone once again regarding the extension of the closing notice and informed him that the company had decided to extend the closing date to March 7, 1981.[61] Knight confirmed this conversation in a letter to Anderson of the same date. Similarly, notices of the extended closing date were posted at each plant.

In December work was undertaken on the filing of the SIPCO prospectus after meetings attended by underwriters and members of SIPCO management. The actual work in the prospectus, registration, and other documents began in December and continued on into January and February. This work was done by underwriters, their counsel, as well as SIPCO and Esmark people. At the same time discussions took place during which consideration was given as to the form of the forthcoming public sale, that is whether SIPCO should simply issue the stock itself or whether there should be created another holding company. For accounting and tax purposes the latter course was decided upon. On January 26, Esmark incorporated Swift Independent Corporation[62] with an authorization of 10 million shares of voting common stock and 155,000[63] shares of nonvoting convertible common stock. On February 13 Knight met with Anderson once again to bring him up to date on progress made toward SIC's going public. During this meeting he furnished Anderson with a draft of SIC's prospectus and informed him of progress made so far. Once again he broached the subject of the Moultrie and Guymon plants and their scheduled reopening in April after the public offering of the SIC stock. These subjects were also discussed in the prospectus. When Knight reiterated his desire of relief from the master agreement at these two locations, Anderson refused once again to grant relief and told Knight that the plan outlined by Knight and contained in the prospectus was illegal. Knight disagreed and no change in the position of either party resulted.

Following the incorporation of SIC, Arthur Rollin was chosen as its sole director.[64] Rollin, an outside attorney and not connected with Esmark, immediately undertook the election of officers and directors, adoption of bylaws, and other necessary organizational procedures for the new corporation. After accomplishing the organizational aims, Rollin resigned and elected a replacement board of directors, which consisted of 10 persons who were affiliated with SIPCO. The officers and directors of SIPCO thus became officers and directors of SIC. Several additional outside individuals unconnected with SIPCO or Esmark were also chosen as directors. The directors were actually chosen by Copeland.

On February 23 Esmark and SIC entered into an agreement in which all the outstanding stock of SIPCO would be sold by Esmark to SIC. In payment SIC agreed to deliver to Esmark $100 million[65] in the form of a demand note at 15 percent. SIC agreed in the same document to file with the Security and Exchange Commission a registration statement to sell shares of its own (SIC's) stock through public distribution; Esmark to acquire the option of purchasing from SIC 4.5 million shares of such stock conditioned upon a firm underwriting agreement whereby the underwriters would agree to purchase at least 2.5 million shares from Esmark. It was further agreed that SIC would deliver the 4.5 million shares of SIC stock and a $35 million subordinated note to Esmark in return for the $100 million note previously delivered to Esmark for the SIPCO stock. It was agreed about this time also that Esmark would retain a certain minority percentage of the SIC stock because the underwriters did not feel they could sell all of it to the public and because Esmark's keeping a certain percentage would indicate faith in the new venture.

Back in December 1980, SIPCO had hired a new general counsel, Thomas McKay. Bruce Thompson subsequently advised McKay of SIPCO'S plan to close Moultrie and Guymon and open them up again after the public sale as a new and independent company. Thompson informed McKay that inasmuch as the closings would take place at a time when SIPCO was still owned by Esmark, and would subsequently be reopened at a time when SIPCO was publicly owned and independent of Esmark, SIPCO would at the time of the reopening be a successor company and the plan was therefore legally justified.[66] McKay agreed with Thompson as to the justification of the planned course of action but during several conversations in January and February noted that since the employees at Moultrie and Guymon were being treated differently from the employees of the other SIPCO plants,[67] perhaps it would be beneficial for purposes of communication to create a new subsidiary company just to operate Moultrie and Guymon to impress on their employees that they were, indeed, working for an entirely new and independent company.[68]

[61] Subsequently, the closing dates were extended to April 3, with notice being given to the Union by letter dated February 17, then extended further to April 17 or 18.

[62] Initially Swift Independent Holding Company.

[63] The 155,000 shares were subsequently issued to SIC officers as payment to them for work performed during its organization.

[64] Rollin, who was chosen by Esmark's assistant general counsel, Becker, also became SIC's sole stockholder when he was issued 100 shares of voting stock at the price of $1000.

[65] It was agreed in the document that SIPCO's assets were book valued at approximately $166.5 million so that the $100 million being paid for them was considerably less than their worth.

[66] The time between the closing and reopening was considered by Thompson to be an interim transitional period.

On February 24, New Sipco, Inc. was incorporated. SIC became its sole stockholder and SIC's board of directors and principal officers became the board of directors and principle officers of New Sipco, Inc. On the same day SIC filed its registration statement, effective April 22, the latter date being the earliest date when stock in that company could, by law, be sold. Esmark, of course, was responsible for issuance of the stock.

In late March, Knight received a telephone call from Anderson who advised him that he and the Union's attorney had reviewed the various documents that had been filed and it appeared to them that SIPCO was nothing more than Swift & Company with a new name and therefore if Moultrie and Guymon were reopened they would still be under the master agreement. Anderson told Knight that the Union intended to take action, that is file an unfair labor practice charge if the company pursued its announced plans with regard to Moultrie and Guymon. Knight advised Anderson that in his opinion there was nothing illegal about the Company's plan and suggested a meeting between the attorneys for the parties and themselves to discuss the matter. On April 2 the meeting took place in Chicago. The positions of the parties were repeated but the problem was not resolved. It was agreed that resolution of the problem would likely have to be through arbitration, through the filing of an unfair labor practice or through the initiation of a lawsuit. Though an additional telephone conversation followed the next day and at least one letter from Anderson to Knight followed thereafter, both of which dealt with the same problem, the problem remained unresolved.

On April 11, the February 23 agreement between Esmark and SIC was effectuated. On that date Esmark became the holder of the $100 million note[69] from SIC with the conditional option to purchase SIC stock as noted supra. SIC, on the same date, acquired all of SIPCO's outstanding stock. Esmark assumed all of SIPCO's liability for outstanding checks as of the close of business that day. On that day also, the connection between SIPCO's banking system and Esmark's banking system, which required daily adjustments to take care of surpluses and deficits was permanently severed and SIPCO, in this respect also, became independent of Esmark management. Similarly, SIC/SIPCO thereafter picked up all charges relating to SIPCO operations except for the closing costs for Moultrie and Guymon that, by prior agreement, were paid for by Esmark as part of the cost of the reorganization.

On April 17 Moultrie and Guymon were closed. All employees received their full closing benefits from Esmark as required by the master agreement.[70] Benefits were paid to separated employees at Moultrie and Guymon at special offices away from the plants to which personnel files and other records had been transported. The purpose was apparently to emphasize the fact that SIPCO and the old fresh meats division of Swift & Company were entirely different companies from New Sipco, Inc.; that SIPCO and the old fresh meats division, both of which had been owned by Esmark and both of which had employed the employees being terminated, should not be considered the same as New Sipco, Inc.; that New Sipco, Inc., which was to be owned by SIC and to which the plants and other assets had been transferred on April 11, and for whom most of the employees would work if and when hired by New Sipco, Inc., should be recognized as a new employer.[71]

On April 21 the underwriters of the SIC stock met with Esmark management and agreed on the price at which the stock would be sold. The stock was to be sold to the public at $15 per share with $1.05 of each share to go to the underwriters. The following day, April 22, Esmark entered into an underwriting agreement with Solomon Brothers, then exercised its option to acquire the stock[72] and the $35 million SIC note in exchange for the $100 million SIC note. The registration statement became effective and the public offering took place. The underwriters purchased 2.5 million shares of SIC stock from Esmark for resale to the public. The offer was completely sold out in less than 2 hours. Since the underwriters had an option to buy an additional 250,000 shares, they exercised that option and sold these additional shares, also on April 22. In addition there were the 345,000 shares issued in connection with a SIC employee benefit plan[73] and 155,000 shares of nonvoting stock issued to certain SIPCO employees for a total of $5 million shares issued. Thus, as of April 22 Esmark ceased its 100-percent control of SIC and SIPCO and became a 35-percent minority stockholder with no option or agreement outstanding to purchase additional SIC stock. With the completion of all transactions, Esmark in effect realized just under $100 million for its sale of SIPCO in the form of the $35 million note from SIC, approximately [67] Moultrie and Guymon employees, unlike employees at other SIPCO plants, would receive benefits under the closing provisions of the master agreement, would then be out of work for a short period of time, and then would be hired under new local contract provisions with fewer benefits than employees at other plants continuing to work under the master agreement.

[68] Thompson testified that labor law considerations were not discussed when the creation of the entirely new company was under discussion. Although I agree with the General Counsel that this statement is difficult to credit, I nevertheless find, in either case, that the answer is irrelevant and would not affect the decision here.

[69] The book value of SIPCO's assets were calculated at $166.5 million, in accordance with the earlier agreement, described supra.

[70] A grievance was filed by the Union concerning the Company's extension of the closing date, which was still pending at the time the hearing was in progress.

[71] Since the Union had been apprised of the entire plan over a period of several months, this separation of termination and hiring can hardly be considered a subterfuge of any kind.

[72] There were 1,750,000 shares of stock. The transaction was completed April 29.

[73] The outstanding shares previously owned by Rollin were purchased on April 22 by SIC.

$38 million in cash from the public sale of SIC stock, and the retention of about $25 million in SIC stock.

On April 26 Phil Immesote, secretary-treasurer of Guymon, Local 340 of the Union called Richard Knight. Knight knew Immesote from their previous contacts concerning grievances at the Guymon plant. Immesote advised Knight that when the plant was ready to open, he, Immesote, was ready to sit down and work out an agreement. Knight advised Immesote that he would keep in touch, but did nothing more. In particular, Knight did not call Anderson to let him know of Immesote's call. According to Knight, he believed that Immesote had Anderson's blessing on entering into a local agreement.

Following receipt of the telephone call from Immesote, Knight discussed its content with Copeland. Together they decided to take Immesote up on his offer. On April 30 Knight sent Anderson two letters, one bearing the SIPCO letterhead, the other on New Sipco, Inc. stationery. The SIPCO letter advised Anderson that SIC had gone public and had purchased the assets of SIPCO. It also informed Anderson that SIC's wholly owned subsidiary, the newly created New Sipco, Inc., now owned the Moultrie and Guymon plants. The letter also stated that SIPCO's board of directors had decided to retain its current work force at each of its existing operations currently operating under the master agreement, listing Glenwood, Iowa; National City, Illinois; Sioux City, Iowa; Charleston, South Carolina; Columbia, South Carolina; and New Orleans, Louisiana. It then stated that as a successor employer it recognized its obligation to bargain with the Union concerning these locations, but stated also that it had the right under the circumstances to establish initial terms and conditions of employment at each of the facilities named pending the outcome of such bargaining. The SIPCO letter then announced that "the SIC and SIPCO Boards have opted to have SIPCO adopt the terms and conditions of the Master Agreement—regarding the SIPCO facilities listed. . . ." Finally, the letter advised Anderson that SIC/SIPCO had elected to credit all previous service to employees working under the master agreement.

The second letter, the New Sipco, Inc. letter, in addition to repeating certain information contained in the first letter, also advised Anderson that SIC and New Sipco, Inc. had decided to open their Moultrie and Guymon facilities effective May 5, 1981, and that employees at these new operations would be working under terms and conditions "still under consideration." The letter advised Anderson that the new terms and conditions of employment would be made known to applicants at the time offers of employment were made and that applications from former employees would be considered.

Although neither of the two April 30 letters to Anderson mentioned Immesote, about the same day, Knight instructed Guymon Plant Superintendent Ray Heimbouch to contact Immesote and request a meeting to start negotiations toward a new contract. Heimbouch did so, and a meeting was scheduled for and was held on May 1 at which contract negotiations were initiated.

Beginning about May 3, interviews of job applicants were undertaken at Moultrie. Most of the old SIPCO employees were rehired as new employees of New Sipco, Inc. after filling out applications, taking physicals, and being advised of the new terms and conditions of employment. These terms and conditions of employment were determined by Knight, with input from local plant management. No one from Swift & Company or from Esmark had any input into these considerations.

Meanwhile, regarding Guymon, Knight and the local management had decided on wages and other conditions of employment for the employees at that plant just as they had at Moultrie. The same procedure was used during the interviews—new applications, physicals, etc.—but then contract negotiations that had begun on May 1 resulted in a contract being finalized on May 6. The conditions of employment of the employees were therefore governed by the provisions of this local agreement, which was eventually ratified by the Guymon employees on May 11. As was the case at Moultrie, almost all the newly hired employees were the same employees who previously had worked for SIPCO. The contract was negotiated by Immesote and local management.[74] No one from Esmark or Swift & Company participated.

On May 7 Anderson heard indirectly that a contract had been finalized at Guymon. He called Knight who acknowledged that a contract had, in fact, been reached. Anderson objected that Immesote had no authority to enter into any local agreement and stated that the local contract was invalid. Knight replied that he thought that Immesote had Anderson's "blessing" to negotiate the contract. Anderson denied that Immesote had his "blessing" and reiterated that the local contract was void. The following day, May 8, Anderson sent Knight a telegram in which he noted that discussion between the Company and a local union representative concerning terms and conditions of employment at Guymon had taken place. He advised that the Company was required to continue to recognize and bargain with the International and that the terms of the master agreement still applied to the Moultrie and Guymon plants. He added that the Company had always bargained on contract terms only with the International and that no local union had authority to enter into any bargaining agreement covering either Moultrie or Guymon without the International's approval. He further noted that the International had not approved any negotiations at the local level at Moultrie or Guymon nor approved any of the terms and conditions of employment discussed or agreed at those locations. Anderson demanded that negotiations for local contracts at Moultrie or Guymon cease and that the Company continue to bargain solely with the International and continue to apply the terms of the master agreement. Despite Anderson's telegram, the Immesote contract was ratified by the local membership that night and Guymon's management was so informed by telegram the following day. On May 12 Knight replied to Anderson's telegram informing him of the local contract's ratification and the fact that the Company planned to commence operations at Guymon on May 14 under the terms of the local agreement. Knight advised Anderson further that the Company's actions had been legal but offered to meet and discuss the labor situation. Guymon was, in fact, opened on May 14.[75] [74] Immesote had negotiated other local labor agreements on behalf of Local 340 where the plants were not covered by the master agreement. Other local unions' officials had done likewise at other locations. In March 1981 a new program was approved by the Union's International executive board whereby any local agreement would first have to be submitted to the International for approval before it could be finalized or ratified locally.

On May 29 Immesote wrote Knight a letter in which he stated that the contract that he had signed was void and that he was recinding both his signature and the ratification.[76] On June 1, Anderson wrote a letter to Knight referring to Immesote's position and reiterating the International's position that it alone was the sole representative of the Guymon employees and the master agreement continued in effect. On June 3[77] Anderson wrote a similar letter to Knight regarding the Moultrie plant. Despite the positions taken by Immesote in his letter of May 29 and by the International in Anderson's letter of June 3, the Guymon local contract was, according to Knight, nevertheless implemented and dues continued to be deducted in accordance with that contract and turned over to the Union right up to the time of the hearing. Similarly, again according to Knight, grievances have been filed and processed under the new contract.

2. Tampa

Prior to the reorganization, the conversion of the fresh meats division into SIPCO and the public sale of SIC and its subsidiaries, employees of Swift & Company had the right under the master agreement to transfer to other plants whenever a plant closed. SIPCO took the position, once it became independent from Swift & Company and from Esmark, that it no longer had any obligation regarding the transfer under the master agreement because the master agreement no longer applied. This too was the position of Swift & Company at that point in time.

Prior to the public sale of SIC in April 1981, Swift & Company's fresh meats division (SIPCO), still owned by Esmark, announced the closing of its Tampa sales unit facility. In a memorandum from B. H. Cowart at the Tampa installation to Copeland, dated February 4, 1981, Cowart noted how Swift & Company had operated the sales and distribution system located at Tampa since 1962. He further commented in the memorandum how in November 1980, with the reorganization of Swift & Company, jurisdiction of the sales operation was assumed by SIPCO with Swift & Company serving as landlord.[78] He recommended in this memo that for economic reasons the Tampa facility be closed and that in accordance with the master agreement the announcement of closure be made on February 6 with the final shutdown scheduled for August 8, 1981. Copeland, in a memorandum to Sullivan dated February 5, agreed with Coward and recommended that notification of the closing and the giving of the 6 months' notice to employees should come from Swift & Company rather than from SIPCO as the contract (master agreement) that controlled was between Swift & Company and the Union. On February 9[79] Knight wrote to Anderson notifying him of the planned closing of the Tampa sales unit as of August 7, 1981.[80] The notice of closing contained an offer to meet to discuss implementation of the closing provisions of the master agreement. Upon closing of the Tampa sales unit in August, employees working there under the master agreement were permitted to transfer to other master agreement facilities of SIPCO. They were not, however, permitted to transfer to Moultrie or Guymon or to Swift & Company facilities.

B. Respondents' Operations Before and After the Public Sale

1. Esmark

Following the public sale of SIC stock, Esmark continued to operate, as it had before, as a holding company. The president of the corporation, Donald Kelly, continued as chief executive, and the top officials of the corporation and its subsidiaries continued to report directly to him. These were the various presidents of the wholly owned subsidiaries, including Swift & Company and Estech; Edward J. Harrison, vice president and general counsel of Esmark; Robert E. Palenchar, vice president, corporate affairs and personnel of Esmark; and Robert Briggs,[81] senior vice president, finance, Esmark. Following the public sale, however, no one from SIC, SIPCO, or New Sipco, Inc. reported to Kelly nor to anyone else from Esmark. Palenchar, who in his role as vice president for corporate affairs and personnel, continues to hire Esmark executives and occasionally executives for its subsidiaries, and who still is in charge of their compensation as well as incentive plans, stock options, long-term growth plans, and pension plans, has had nothing to do with the hiring of executives for SIC, SIPCO, or New Sipco, Inc. since prior to the public sale of SIC stock in April 1981. Similarly, Palenchar's chief assistant, manager, supervises three management employees: Douglas Empey, director of benefits, who is in charge of pension plans, hospitalization plans, and life and disability plans; Norris Ewald, director of compensation (Esmark's personnel director), who is in charge of stock option plans, management incentive, and growth plans; and Steve Ward, pension administrator, who keeps pension records current and implements action initiated by subsidiary companies. These people who historically have acted as advisers to the operating (subsidiary) companies in their special fields have had no such contacts with SIC, SIPCO, or New Sipco, Inc. since April 1981.

[75] Neither Esmark nor Swift & Company played any part in the decision to reopen Moultrie or Guymon.

[76] This letter was sent sometime after a meeting took place in Washington, D.C. at which Immesote was threatened by the International with removal from office and the local with receivership unless the local contract was voided.

[77] There is some question whether the June 1 and 3 letters were received.

[78] Swift & Company continued to operate a processing facility on the same premises adjacent to the SIPCO operation.

[79] Notice to employees of the closing was made the same day.

[80] Though Knight was at the time vice president of beef, lamb, and labor for SIPCO, the letter was under the Swift & Company letterhead.

[81] Briggs is one of SIPCO's board of directors.

Historically, there have been in existence several pension plans affecting various employees of Esmark and its wholly owned subsidiaries, including plans for Esmark salaried employees, Swift & Company salaried employees, Swift & Company nonsalaried employees, Swift retirees, Eschem salaried employees, Eschem nonsalaried employees, Estech salaried employees, and Estech nonsalaried employees. Each of these plans has its own pension board, each manned by Esmark. In addition, certain subsidiaries have their own pension plans that are not a part of the Esmark plan. When an employee of Swift & Company wishes to retire, that employee fills out a retirement form at his own company. This form is forwarded to Esmark where the amount in question is calculated. Questions concerning the amounts due under the various Esmark plans are forwarded to its board for review. Palenchar is chairman of the pension board at Esmark and various members of management are its members. Since April 1981 and the public sale, none of the Esmark pension boards nor any Esmark employee has had anything to do with any pension plan covering SIC, SIPCO, or New Sipco, Inc. employees.

Esmark had historically maintained stock option plans covering salaried employees of Esmark and its subsidiaries. Esmark, through its compensation committee, its chairman, Palenchar, and its director, Ewald, determines how much stock is to be made available for itself and for its subsidiaries. The subsidiaries then each decide how much of the amount of stock made available to it should be allocated among its own eligible employees and, based on this decision, makes a request. The stock so allocated is Esmark stock. The Esmark compensation committee next considers the requests received from the subsidiaries and presents these requests to the board of directors for approval. No employee of SIC, SIPCO, or New Sipco has participated in these plans since April 1981 and in fact no employee of SIC or New Sipco, Inc. had ever done so.

Esmark, over the years, has operated incentive plans and growth plans on behalf of certain of its employees and employees of its subsidiaries. Since April 11, 1981, however, employees of SIC, SIPCO, and New Sipco have not participated in these plans either.

Esmark has historically filed a consolidated tax return reflecting its earnings and the earnings of its subsidiaries (those of which it owns 80 percent) including Swift & Company and Estech. The 1981 fiscal year tax report will include SIPCO income up to April 11, 1981, but not thereafter. The 1982 fiscal year tax report will not include SIPCO earnings. SIC and New Sipco have never been included in Esmark tax returns.

Over the years Esmark has been self-insured where state law permitted. Otherwise, where state law required, Esmark obtained outside insurance. In the former case, the practice has been for Esmark's subsidiaries to maintain risk management departments, which self-insured for product liability up to $50,000. Esmark's own risk management department maintained additional coverage to a certain higher dollar value. Outside insurance companies furnished insurance to a still higher amount. Subsequent to April 1981 Esmark continued these practices for Swift & Company and other subsidiaries. In October 1980, in preparation for its independence, SIPCO began to handle its own insurance, and by April Esmark no longer performed any insurance functions for SIC, SIPCO, or New Sipco.

Esmark's subsidiaries have always done their own advertising of their products. Esmark would advertise solely to the financial community in such newspapers as the Wall Street Journal and leading newspapers based in the financial centers of the country. The advertising was undertaken for the purpose of making potential Esmark investors aware of the various holdings of Esmark and, for that reason, would mention the subsidiaries by name as well as their chief products. Similarly, and for like reasons, Esmark would advertise on television. Since April 1981, Esmark has had no connection with advertising of SIC, SIPCO, or New Sipco products or services.

Although Esmark has itself prepared booklets describing health care available to employees, the administration of the health care plan is handled by an outside service agency. Esmark has nothing to do with any health care plan covering SIC, SIPCO, or New Sipco employees.

In sum, Esmark does not perform any services for SIC, SIPCO, or New Sipco nor does it share physical facilities or departmental or staff functions with SIC, SIPCO, or New Sipco.

2. Swift & Company

Since its separation from SIPCO, Swift & Company has been engaged in the manufacture, sale, distribution, and marketing of processed meats, turkeys, cheese, and dry grocery products in the United States, United Kingdom, Europe, Panama, Puerto, and Japan. Unlike before the separation of SIPCO, it no longer slaughters animals except turkeys. Swift operates no fresh meat plants in the United States.[82] Its executive offices are still located in Chicago at 115 W. Jackson Blvd. on the 11th and parts of the 8th, 9th, and 10th floors.

Swift & Company board of directors and officers, in large part, remained the same after the separation of its fresh meats division and the latter's conversion to SIPCO and public sale in April 1981 as they had been in 1980. Notable among the exceptions are, of course, Copeland and Knight, both of whom left Swift & Company for positions with SIPCO. Copeland, who had been on Swift & Company's board of directors and who was, at the time, president, fresh meats division and Knight who had been vice president, service, then vice president, beef, lamb and labor, broke all ties with Swift & Company when SIPCO became independent in April 1981.

Swift & Company's labor relations are procedurally administered today as they were prior to the creation of SIPCO. Joseph Sullivan, Swift & Company's president, is responsible for its labor relations but has delegated authority in this area to Richard Greene, vice president of industrial relations at the corporate level. At the plant level each plant manager negotiates his own contract,[83] assisted by his vice president and general manager in a given area. These people work closely with Greene. In plants covered by the master agreement, the same procedure is used for negotiating purposes as well as for purposes of administering the contract. In the grievance and arbitration field, the individual plant managers and the legal departments work closely with Green until the arbitration level is reached, at which point Greene and the Swift & Company legal department handle the matter. The individuals in charge of industrial relations and who negotiate on behalf Swift & Company are different from those who are in charge of industrial relations at, and who negotiate on behalf of, SIPCO and New Sipco.

[83] In such areas as insurance, Swift & Company may seek advise from specialists at Esmark just as it could in the past.

During the fiscal year 1981 Swift & Company's sales grossed $1.5 billion and purchases were valued at $1 billion. Of the purchases, between $70 and $80 million worth of products came from SIPCO and New Sipco. Purchases were of fresh meats for processing at Swift & Company's own plants. The same guidelines were used in making these purchases as were used in making purchases from any other sources, i.e., competitive price, quality of product, and service.

3. SIC, SIPCO, and New Sipco

Today, SIC is a publicly owned holding company that owns SIPCO and New Sipco. Like Esmark, it does not produce nor manufacture goods. Its primary concern is with selling its own stock, and this can best be achieved by making certain that the financial community is aware that its subsidiaries, SIPCO and New Sipco, are successful in selling their products.

Since April 1981, SIC has paid quarterly dividends to all of its stockholders of common stock, including Esmark.[84] As a matter of fact, following the separation of SIPCO from Swift & Company and the public sale of SIC stock, Esmark has been enjoying better returns from its combined investments in Swift & Company and in SIC[85] than it had from Swift & Company before the restructuring.

SIPCO is one of SIC's wholly owned subsidiaries. It processes fresh beef, lamb, pork, and manufactures frozen meats and markets them at various plants throughout the United States.

New Sipco, Inc. is the other of SIC's two wholly owned subsidiaries. It processes fresh beef at its Guymon, Oklahoma plant and fresh pork at its Moultrie, Georgia plant.

After April 1981, personnel at the various SIPCO and New Sipco plants remained pretty much the same as before. Plant managers and salaried employees[86] at the fresh meats plants as well as rank-and-file employees[87] remained the same after the public sale, after the closing of Guymon and Moultrie, and after their reopening as before. Similarly, customers and suppliers also remained the same. During the hiatus, between the time that the Guymon and Moultrie plants were closed by SIPCO while owned by Esmark and the time they were reopened by New Sipco while owned by SIC, which in turn was owned 65 percent by the public, management of these plants remained on the payroll, even though it required certain management personnel to take vacations and even though it required other management personnel to busy themselves at the plant doing maintenance work. Management personnel, in addition to Copeland and Knight, include Douglas Gray, executive vice president for SIC, SIPCO, and New Sipco, who had been with the fresh meats division; Charles Bedrosian, vice president and comptroller for SIC and SIPCO and director of New Sipco, who had been comptroller of fresh meats division; Joseph O'Bryant, vice president of public relations and marketing for SIC, SIPCO, and New Sipco, who had been president of the processed foods division of Swift & Company and a member of its board of directors; Richard Jaracz, in charge of pork for SIPCO and of the Moultrie plant, who had been with the fresh meats division; R. T. Vernam, director of purchasing for SIPCO, who had been with Swift & Company; Ed Heiter, director of quality assurance for SIPCO, who had held the same office at Swift & Company; W. J. Zautke, general sales manager for SIPCO, who had held the same position at Swift & Company; K. A. Nilson, general superintendent of operations for SIPCO sales units, who had held the same position at Swift & Company; H. G. Kuhlken, director of plant accounting for SIPCO, who had held the same position at Swift & Company's fresh meats division; L. D. Nye (retired) who had held a position in SIPCO's sales department and who had also held a similar position in Swift & Company's fresh meats division; W. D. Dillman, responsible for public relations, SIPCO who had been with the public relations department at Esmark; J. W. Swanson, director of taxes for SIPCO, who had held the same position at Swift & Company; and H. W. Vincent, director of sales unit accounting for SIPCO, who had held the same office at Swift & Company. All or most of these officers had been chosen by Copeland to be a part of the newly established SIC, SIPCO, and New Sipco group of companies. Similarly, other officers presently with SIC, SIPCO, and New Sipco had previously been employed at Swift & Company. Many of the senior officers of these companies are on the board of directors of SIPCO and New Sipco. Although all of these officers originally came over from Swift & Company, there has been no exchange of personnel between SIC, SIPCO, and New [84] Before April 1981 Esmark also received dividends.

[85] SIC is now sold on the American Exchange whereas previously it had been sold over the counter.

[86] Richard Knight openly testified that there was never any question that the same executives who were in charge before the closing of Guymon and Moultrie would remain in charge after their reopening. Thus, he, himself, who had been vice president, beef, lamb, and labor since October 1980, later became a vice president with SIC and responsible for beef and labor at New Sipco as of the spring of 1981. Knight was a member of the board of directors of SIPCO and SIC up until the public offering of April 1981. His responsibilities at New Sipco after April 1981 were the same as his responsibilities at SIPCO and SIC. These responsibilities were assigned to him by Copeland who, as noted above, has been the president and chief executive officer of SIPCO since October 24, 1980, of SIC since January 26, 1981, and of New Sipco since February 24, 1981.

[87] Twenty-five to fifty of SIPCO's employees remained covered by the Union's master agreement, while New Sipco's coverage by the master agreement remains here in dispute. (Compare the testimony of Copeland, Tr. 2373 and Thompson Tr. 2505, on UFCW master agreement coverage.)

Sipco on the one hand and Swift & Company on the other hand since April 1981. After April 1981 only one member of the SIPCO board of directors, Roger Briggs, still held any position with Esmark or Swift & Company. He is only one of nine members and has no more control than any of the other members. Accordingly to the credited testimony of John Copeland, no one from Esmark or Swift & Company has had any authority to control the day-to-day operations of SIC, SIPCO, or New Sipco after April 1981 nor has anyone from the latter group of companies had any authority or control over the day-to-day operations at Swift & Company. No employees of SIC, SIPCO, or New Sipco maintain any option to return to Swift & Company or Esmark, nor do any officers of the latter two companies have any rights to employment at SIC, SIPCO, or New Sipco.

At the time of the hearing, the legal department of SIC, SIPCO, and New Sipco was composed of Thomas McKay Jr., Bruce Thompson, and Dennis Goth. Thompson had been with the Esmark and Swift & Company legal departments at one time or another in the past. Goth too had worked for Swift & Company.

At the time of the hearing, the headquarters of SIC, SIPCO, and New Sipco was still located at 115 W. Jackson Boulevard on the 7th floor[88] and part of the 10th. As noted earlier, this is the same street address as Swift & Company although the latter is located in different offices and, in some cases, on different floors. SIPCO continues to rent its office space from Swift & Company, which enjoys a favorable long-term lease and can and does therefore offer reasonable rental rates. SIC and SIPCO share the same telephone numbers while New Sipco does not have a Chicago listing. Besides its headquarters in Chicago, SIC, SIPCO, and New Sipco have 5 pork plants, 3 beef plants, 1 lamb plant, 71 sales and distribution units, and 1 specialty plant.

The labor relations policies of SIC, SIPCO, and New Sipco are determined by Knight,[89] but Harry Niese,[90] vice president of personnel, and Copeland work on such matters as do other officers of these companies along with Knight. No one from Esmark or from Swift & Company have had anything to do with labor relations at these companies since the public sale nor have the officers of SIC, SIPCO, or New Sipco had anything to do with labor relations at Esmark or Swift & Company since the public sale.

According to Copeland, the Guymon and Moultrie plants would never have been reopened at all if it had to be done under the master agreement.[91] Rather, they would have been sold unless a competitive contract could be worked out. Moultrie, at the time of the hearing, was being operated without a contract while Guymon, as noted above, was operating under the terms of the local agreement negotiatied with Immesote. Copeland testified that New Sipco is saving $4 million per year by operating the Guymon and Moultrie plants outside the master agreement.

Since the public offering, Knight has negotiated 15 or 20 contracts on behalf of SIC, SIPCO, and New Sipco including labor agreements covering Des Moines, Iowa; Brownwood, Texas; San Antonio, Texas; and various sales units. No one connected with Esmark or with Swift & Company participated in these negotiations, nor did Knight consult with anyone from those two companies concering these negotiations or labor relations in general after April 1981.[92] In fact no departments or services are shared by SIC, SIPCO or New Sipco with Esmark or Swift & Company.[93]

Regarding the sales, SIPCO annually sells approximately $1.6 billion worth of products, about $1.1 billion of which is fresh meats produced at SIPCO's and New Sipco's own facilities. The remaining $.5 billion consists of purchased products, resold through SIPCO's sales units, 25 percent of which is processed meats.

Certain changes have occurred in the operation of SIPCO and New Sipco since October 1980 and April 1981. Thus, before October 1980 if Swift and Company did not want its fresh meats division to sell the products of other companies, it could not do so, although it did authorize certain sales of other companies' products. Today, the amount of SIPCO's resale of other companies' products is very large and its decision to sell or not to sell is independently its own. Today SIPCO has arrangements with a large number of producers in no way connected with Esmark or Swift & Company to sell processed meats. Thus, SIPCO counts among its suppliers of processed meats, Sunnyland, Pantry Pride, Peschke, Marval, Motts, and Rocco. It sells brands such as Plantation Pride,[94] American Farms,[95] Tender Pride, and Cornfield and the decision to do so is its own. The products consist of frankfurters, bacon, and bologna—all products in competition with Swift & Company's own Swift Premium brand. SIPCO also sells turkeys, cornish hens, geese, and ducks under copacking agreements with Marval, Motts, and Rocco. Some of these agreements had been made before and some after the public sale.

SIPCO still conducts business with Swift & Company. However, whereas prior to October 1980 transactions between the fresh meats division and Swift & Company were treated by means of intracompany transfer accounting rather than as cash accounts or accounts receivable and no charge was made because the purchase was merely a paper transaction after SIC, SIPCO, and New Sipco went public, transactions between the new companies and Swift & Company were handled just the same as any other transaction between Swift & Company and an independent unrelated customer. Purchases and sales between SIC, SIPCO, and New Sipco and Swift & Company were thereafter handled on an accounts receivable basis with the same carrying charges applicably charged to strangers. After April 1981 Swift & Company sold, and today sells, the same products to SIPCO as it does to its other customers on the same credit terms. If SIPCO finds Swift & Company's prices too high, it will not buy those products.

[88] Knight had been located on the seventh floor for 6 years while with Swift & Company. In October 1980, he moved to new offices still on the seventh floor.

[89] Knight is in charge of contract negotiations.

[90] Niese is in charge of labor administration and benefit programs, including pension plans.

[91] This decision was made by Knight at Guymon, Jaracz at Moultrie, and by Copeland and other key officers.

[92] Labor relations manuals used at SIPCO are based on the old Swift & Company manual, with modifications as they envolve based on changes decided on by SIPCO management.

[93] SIC, SIPCO, and New Sipco still purchase services from Swift & Company's R & D Laboratory, which had always done this work before the public sale. The cost of this work is about $125,000 annually, this sum having been arrived at through arm's-length negotiation.

[94] Sunnyland's trademark. SIPCO by agreement has exclusive use.

[95] SIPCO's own trademark to which Swift & Company has no rights.

Some SIPCO sales units sell both Swift & Company products and competing products. In North Carolina and South Carolina, for example, SIPCO today sells Swift & Company's processed meats to supermarkets whereas prior to the public sale SIPCO was permitted by Swift & Company to sell its products only to restaurants, hospitals, and institutions (food services). It sells Swift & Company's Butterball line while at the same time it also sells its own brands, unlike the situation prior to April 1981. Similarly, though it has the exclusive rights in these areas to sell certain Swift & Company brands of processed meats, it can still sell competing brands, again unlike the situations prior to April 1981.

In one instance SIPCO has a copacking arrangement with Swift & Company similar to copacking arrangements with other companies. This one exception is in San Antonio, Texas, where both fresh and processed meats have been produced since 1934. Here, the plant[96] that had been owned by Swift & Company was transferred along with the other fresh meats plants to SIPCO at the time of its creation. Swift & Company, however, requested that SIPCO continue to produce certain Swift & Company products, hams, picnics, etc., which had historically been produced at that site for Swift & Company. SIPCO agreed and though the employees producing these same products are the same employees working for the same supervisors, they are now SIPCO employees. The sales of these products are still handled as before, SIPCO selling to food service accounts; Swift & Company selling to supermarkets (retailers). The agreement, which requires SIPCO to sell raw materials to Swift & Company with SIPCO employees to process the materials on Swift-owned equipment and which also requires SIPCO to turn over a certain amount of the products to Swift & Company sales units for resale, was negotiated initially on October 27, 1980, and was renewed in February 1981. The agreement[97] appears to be a legitimate arm's-length transaction.

New Sipco, which is a wholly owned subsidiary of SIC, operates a pork plant at Moultrie and a beef plant at Guymon. It has no sales units of its own and does its marketing through SIPCO's sales organization. Some of Moultrie's production is sold locally to retail stores and some for further processing. Its marketing procedure has not changed since the public sale. Guymon produces carcass beef. It was stated at the hearing that SIC would file a consolidated tax return for SIC, SIPCO, and New Sipco.

Analysis

A. Procedural Questions

1. The question of service

Regarding the service of charges the record indicated that the original charge in Case 13-CA-21156 was filed on May 29, 1981, and named as respondents:

> Swift Independent Packing Company, formerly known as Swift & Company
> Swift Independent Corporation
> New Sipco, Inc.
> Esmark, Inc.
> All as alter egos, a single employer and/or joint employers.

Although the charge form does not name Swift & Company as an "Employer Against Whom Charge Is Brought," the "Basis of the Charge" contains the following language:

> Swift & Company (now known as Swift Independent Packing Company) . . .
> The above respondents and Swift & Company, acting in concert . . . have engaged in a plan . . . to repudiate the Master Agreement . . . to oust the Charging Party . . . and unilaterally abrogate the collectively bargained terms and conditions of employment at such plants. . . . By these actions the employer has violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the Act.

Thus, although the charge does not specifically identify Swift & Company, in box 1,a of the form as an "Employer Against Whom Charge Is Brought" it does, in fact, indicate in the body of the charge that Swift & Company is being charged with acting in concert with those companies, identified in box 1,a, who are specifically charged with violating the Act. In my opinion, if anyone from Swift & Company read this charge, he would be derelict if he were to ignore it as implicating his company in this case.

The charge indicates that the employer representatives to contact were Robert Palenchar at 55 East Monroe Street, Chicago, Illinois, and Richard Knight, 115 West Jackson Boulevard, Chicago, Illinois. On June 2, 1981, copies of the charge were sent to Swift Independent Packing Co. et al., c/o Robert Palenchar at the East Monroe Street address and to Swift Independent Packing Company, formerly known as Swift & Company, Swift Independent Corporation, New Sipco, Inc. & Esmark, Inc. at the Jackson Boulevard address, to the attention of Richard Knight. At this time Palenchar was vice president of corporate affairs and personnel at Esmark and had earlier been deeply involved in personnel matters and in labor negotiations with the Union on behalf of Swift & Company. Knight's position at the time and previously is fully described supra.

The return receipt for the copy of the charge sent to the Monroe Street address was signed by one A. Lykes, otherwise not identified. The return for the copies sent to the Jackson Boulevard address was signed by Jim Mellon, similarly unidentified. The dates of delivery were June 3 and 5, respectively.

[97] SIC Exh. 4.

On July 10, the complaint based on this charge issued naming Swift & Company as joint and/or single employers with and/or alter ego of the other Respondents. Swift & Company is specifically named in several allegations and included as one of the Respondents throughout. James Farren is specifically identified as "Vice-president of Respondent Swift" and is alleged to be a supervisor and agent of Respondent Swift & Company. Copies of the complaint were mailed to Palenchar at the Monroe Street address and to Swift & Company at the Jackson Boulevard address among others. The two copies of the complaint[98] sent to the Monroe Street address were received on July 13 and 14 and signed for by A. Lykes. The copy sent to Swift & Company at Jackson Boulevard was signed for by K. Small on July 13. Subsequently, orders scheduling hearing were mailed and return receipts were signed at Monroe Street, again by Lykes and at Jackson Boulevard by Small on behalf of both SIPCO and Swift & Company on July 20.

All parties filed answers to the complaint including Swift & Company, whose answer was dated July 23. Swift & Company's answer denied that it was served as alleged in the complaint on June 3 by certified mail.

On July 6 the charge in Case 13-CA-21274 was filed and named as respondents:

> Swift Independent Packing Company, formerly known as Swift & Company
> Swift Independent Corporation
> New Sipco, Inc.
> Swift & Company
> Esmark, Inc.
> All as alter egos, a single employer and/or joint employers.

Thus, the charge in Case 13-CA-21274 does, in fact, name Swift & Company as a respondent. Palenchar at the Monroe Street address and Farren and Knight at the Jackson Boulevard address were named as employer representatives to contact. On July 8, a copy of the new charge addressed to Palenchar was received at the Monroe Street address and the receipt therefore was signed by Small, the same individual who later signed the return receipt for the complaint address to Swift & Company at the Jackson Boulevard address on July 13. On July 8 also, a copy of the new charge addressed to Richard C. Knight and James Farren, Swift Independent Packing Company, was received at the Jackson Boulevard address and the receipt was signed by Lykes, who had previously signed for the receipt of documents addressed to Palenchar at the Monroe Street address.

On August 17 the complaint in Case 13-CA-21274 issued. Copies of the complaint were served on Swift & Company, among others, to the attention of Donald Bussman, Esq. at the Jackson Boulevard address on August 18. The return receipt for the copy of the complaint addressed to Swift & Company was signed for by Joe Doria, not otherwise identified. Joe Doria also signed for copies addressed to SIPCO, New Sipco, and to SIC, all at the Jackson Boulevard address.

Additional papers were served on the various Respondents after August 17. However, the above record of the various services convinces me that Swift & Company received actual notice, if not legal notice, of the charge and subsequent pleadings sufficient to enable it to adequately defend its position. Thus, the initial charge fully outlined the problem, and described how Swift & Company was considered to be the alter ego of the various other respondent companies and responsible for the unfair labor practice allegedly perpetrated by them. This charge was served on Swift & Company's alleged alter egos, in particular on Palenchar, vice president of Swift & Company's parent company. The language of the charge, having come to the attention of Palenchar at the very beginning, charging Esmark and its wholly owned subsidiary, Swift & Company, with being engaged along with its alter egos, or its joint employers, or as part of a single employer with SIC, SIPCO, and New Sipco with violating the Act, I find it impossible to believe that the parties served did not discuss this charge among themselves—all being charged as alter egos, among other things—as violators of the Act. All parties having only recently been totally entwined in each other's business, all having officers who had served on the staffs of each other's companies, all but Esmark doing business at the same address, how could Swift & Company not be actually make aware of the content of the charge? How could Esmark Vice President Palenchar read this original charge specifically naming Swift & Company as Esmark's alter ego, or as a joint and/or single employer with Esmark, as a correspondent and never advise Swift & Company, its wholly owned subsidiary, that it was so involved? How could Knight, on receipt of this charge, fail to discuss it with Swift & Company, named as the alter ego, etc., of SIC, SIPCO, and New Sipco, when Swift & Company, his prior employer, was located in the same building, perhaps the same floor, and the charge clearly alleged the same violations as having been committed by all corporate entities together? I cannot conclude otherwise but that Swift & Company obtained actual notice of the content of the charge about the same time notice was legally received by the other respondents, and that Swift & Company had plenty of time to organize its defense, offer evidence, and otherwise prepare for the hearing which, in any event, did not occur until January 1982. Thus, I feel that the minor procedural defect in the General Counsel's processing of the case did not in any substantial manner undermine Swift & Company's position, nor deny it due process. Indeed Swift & Company's subsequent full participation in all phases of these cases would certainly indicate otherwise. The notion to dismiss based on failure of service is denied.

[98] Both were addressed to Esmark, one to the attention of Palenchar, the other to the attention of Edward J. Harrison.

2. The 10(b) question

a. Case 13–CA–21156

Respondents take the position that inasmuch as the public expression concerning the planned closing of the Moultrie and Guymon plants was made on June 30, 1980, and the decision not to apply the master agreement was announced in September 1980 and the charge in Case 13–CA–21156 was not filed until May 29, 1981, the allegations in the complaint concerning these matters should be dismissed because of the 10(b) period bar. The General Counsel and the Charging Party take the position that the 10(b) period began at the time these two plants closed in April 1981 and that the filing of the charge several weeks later was timely. I agree with the General Counsel and the Charging Party on this point. The numerous cases cited by Respondents in support of their positions are clearly distinguishable on the facts.

b. Case 13–CA–21274

Respondent Swift & Company and Esmark take the position that the May 11, 1981 letter, which limited rights of employees to transfer to other locations covered by the master agreement was not a violation in itself but was "merely the consequence of or the enforcement of a decision made and communicated to the Union in June 1980." These respondents claim that the June 1980 announcement was made more than 6 months prior to the filing of Case 13–CA–21274 and that therefore the filing of the charge was barred by the 10(b) provision. The General Counsel and Charging Party, however, take the position that the 10(b) period did not begin to run until the May 11, 1981 notice issued so that the filing of the charge was timely. Once again, I find the cases cited by Respondents in support of their positions easily distinguishable. Consequently, all motions to dismiss based on Section 10(b) are denied.

B. Merits of the Cases

1. Case 13–CA–21156

Analysis of the background facts and of the circumstances existing in 1980 convinces me that the reorganization initiated in April of that year and Esmark's decisions to divest itself of the energy segment and of the fresh meats division of Swift & Company were economically motivated. The subsequently offered ESOP proposal was, in my estimation, made in good faith and its rejection eventually gave rise necessarily to new plans: first to sell the fresh meats division as a unit to yet unknown buyers, and later to sell the fresh meats division by means of a public offering, both plans conceived out of economic considerations free of antiunion animus. Indeed, throughout the planning of the ESOP offer and the eventual subsequent public offering, the Union was continually kept informed of progress made toward divestiture of the fresh meats division and the creation of the new independent companies.

When the public offering was made and Esmark ceased to be the sole owner of SIPCO and became instead a minority holder of SIPCO through SIC, ownership passed to a new set of owners through their purchase of SIC stock. The question at that point became, "Are the new owners bound to the old Teamster agreement or are they not?" The General Counsel and Charging Party replied in the affirmative, Respondents argued to the contrary.

None of the cases cited by the parties and none that I have independently analyzed are factually on all fours with the instant case. The General Counsel and Charging Party have cited a number of cases falling within the stock transfer line.[] But these cases appear to deal with situations where a single on-going corporate entity had a majority of its stock sold or transferred during the continued operations of the same corporation. The instant case, on the other hand, involves the incorporation of an entirely new and independent company with the issuance of new stock and the sale of a majority of that stock to the public; to new owners completely independent of the previous owners. In light of these facts, I conclude that the instant case is governed more properly by the hold in NLRB v. Burns Security Services, 406 U.S. 272 (1972).

The Supreme Court in Burns, might well have held that the existence of a valid collective-bargaining agreement between a labor organization representing the employees of a predecessor company and that company is sacrosanct and inviolable and that any purchaser of that company must be bound to the terms and conditions of employment contained in the existing labor agrement won for those employees through the collective-bargaining process. In short, the Supreme Court might well have said, "let the buyer beware," as it must be with regard to all other aspects of such a purchase—the condition of the buildings and equipment and the economic state of the business. Indeed, the Charging Party would have it so. The Supreme Court in Burns, however, recognized other considerations that had to be weighed along with the rights of employees covered by the existing collective-bargaining agreement and of the parties thereto. Specifically, the Court (406 U.S. at 287 to 291) stated:

> We also agree with the Court of Appeals that holding either the union or the new employer bound to the substantive terms of an old collective-bargaining contract may result in serious inequities. A potential employer may be willing to take over a moribund business only if he can make changes in corporate structure, composition of the labor force, work locations, task assignment, and nature of supervision. Saddling such an employer with the terms and conditions of employment contained in the old collective-bargaining contract may make these changes impossible and may discourage and inhibit the transfer of capital. On the other hand, a union may have made concessions to a small or failing employer that it would be unwilling to make to a large or economically successful firm. The congressional policy manifest in the Act is to enable the parties to negotiate for any protection either deems > appropriate, but to allow the balance of bargaining advantage to be set by economic power realities. Strife is bound to occur if the concessions that must be honored do not correspond to the relative economic strength of the parties.

> In many cases, of course, successor employers will find it advantageous not only to recognize and bargain with the union but also to observe the pre-existing contract rather than to face uncertainty and turmoil. Also, in a variety of circumstances involving a merger, stock acquisition, reorganization, or assets purchase, the Board might properly find as a matter of fact that the successor had assumed the obligations under the old contract. Cf. Oilfield Maintenance Co., 142 NLRB 1384 (1963). Such a duty does not, however, ensue as a matter of law from the mere fact that an employer is doing the same work in the same place with the same employees as his predecessor, as the Board had recognized until its decision in the instant case. See cases cited supra, at 184. We accordingly set aside the Board's finding of an 8(a)(5) unfair labor practice insofar as it rested on a conclusion that Burns was required to but did not honor the collective-bargaining contract executed by Wackenhut.

In my opinion, the Supreme Court's concern that saddling a new employer with a predecessor's old collective-bargaining contract might discourage or inhibit the transfer of capital has application to the facts contained in the instant case. Respondents SIC, SIPCO, and New Sipco freely admit that if Moultrie and Guymon had been forced to operate under the master agreement, they would not have been opened at all because they were not economically viable plants when operating under the agreement. I find that under Burns, SIC, SIPCO, and New Sipco are not bound by the master agreement. As it is, the Union and Respondents, as conceded successors, are free to negotiate new terms and conditions of employment more acceptable, if not totally satisfactory, to both sides.

The complaint in Case 13-CA-21156 alleges that Respondents Esmark, Swift & Company, SIC, SIPCO, and New Sipco Inc. are and have been at all times material a single-integrated business enterprise, a single and/or joint employer, and alter egos. I take the term "at all times material" to mean the dates listed in paragraphs XII and XIII, the dates when the unfair labor practices allegedly occurred. Regarding these dates, it is alleged that on April 17 Respondent collectively closed the Moultrie and Guymon plants and terminated the employment of employees at those plants in order to avoid its obligations under the 1979-1982 master agreement in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act. I find, however, that Esmark closed these plants in anticipation of, and as one of several steps to be taken in its overall lawful plan to completely divest itself of control of the fresh meats part of its holding[100] and as a transitional step in the creation of an entirely new set of companies—SIC, SIPCO, New Sipco—publicly owned and independent of itself and its subsidiaries. Inasmuch as the closing of the Moultrie and Guymon plants was not unlawfully motivated nor in violation of the Act, I find that the organizational interrelationship among the various corporate entities at this time, April 17, is immaterial.

The complaint further alleges that on May 4 Respondent reopened the Moultrie plant; that on May 14 they reopened the Guymon plant; that since about April 30 Respondents have unilaterally refused to adhere to and apply the terms and conditions of the master agreement at Moultrie and Guymon; and that by these collective acts Respondents have violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act.

Analysis of the facts clearly indicates that by May 4 and 14, indeed as of the the end of April, all arrangements for the final separation of SIC, SIPCO, and New Sipco from its previous owner Esmark and from Esmark's subsidiary Swift & Company had been completed. Neither Esmark nor Swift & Company can be considered the alter ego of SIC, SIPCO, or New Sipco because the latter three, as of the critical dates, could in no way be considered a disguised continuation of the former, if in fact, they[101] ever could be. The splitting off of the fresh meats division was openly accomplished through its sale to a newly created corporate entity, publicly owned. Following the separation and public sale, SIC, SIPCO, and New Sipco became a separate entity or set of entities managed by individuals who had broken all ties with Esmark, and with Swift & Company as well as their operations and business purposes. SIPCO and New Sipco's operation, i.e., the production, processing, and sale of fresh meats and related products, though similar, to some degree, to their operations before SIPCO's separation from Esmark and Swift & Company, were by May 4 no longer subject to either control or review by Esmark or its subsidiary Swift & Company. Similarly, the business purpose of SIC, SIPCO, and New Sipco, i.e., obtaining a fair return on investments through these operations, became the concern of the officers, directors, and owners of the new company, no longer subject to the control or review of the officers, directors, or owners of Esmark or Swift & Company. By May 4 the officers of SIC, SIPCO, and New Sipco were responsible solely to their own boards of directors and to their own stockholders, a great majority of whom had no connection whatsoever with either Esmark or Swift & Company. Though most of the equipment and real property in use at SIC, SIPCO, and New Sipco locations as of May 1981 had also been used by SIPCO when it was owned by Esmark, this fact is a natural consequence of the sale of the equipment and property to the new corporations and in any event is not controlling.[102] Similarly, many of the customers and suppliers of the new operating companies are the same, but, on the other hand, new ones have been added and the system of servicing has been changed to a large degree. All in all, and with particular emphasis on the change in ownership, I conclude that as of the critical dates in May SIC, SIPCO, and New Sipco were not the alter ego of Esmark or of Swift & Company.

[100] Esmark's role as a minority stockholder does not affect this decision.

[101] Contrary to other findings, it is quite apparent that after the public sale, SIC, SIPCO, and New Sipco operated as a single entity insofar as the matters have involved are concerned.

[102] John Fender Electric Co., 244 NLRB 957 (1979).

Regarding the allegation that SIC, SIPCO, and New Sipco were collectively on May 4 and 14 a single-integrated enterprise or joint employer with Esmark and with Swift & Company, it should be recognized that to prove this allegation the General Counsel would have to show that the two latter corporations shared common management, interrelations of operations, and ownership as well as centralized control of labor relations with SIC, SIPCO, New Sipco on the dates in question. The record indicates, however, and I find that none of these indicia were present on those dates or subsequently. Esmark's and Swift & Company's[103] officers and directors remained primarily the same after disposition of the fresh meats business as they had been before, but they no longer had control or right of review over the operations nor over the labor relations of the new corporation. Whereas before the sale, Esmark controlled 100 percent of SIPCO, and before SIPCO's existence, 100 percent of Swift & Company's fresh meats division, after the sale Esmark only another minority stockholders with no more control over the new corporation than any other minority stockholder relative to the number of shares held. I conclude, therefore, that Esmark and Swift & Company as of May 4 and 14 were not single enterprises nor joint employer with SIC, SIPCO, or New Sipco when the latter opened up the Guymon and Moultrie plants and refused to apply at those times the provisions of the master agreement. Indeed, I find that neither Esmark nor Swift & Company played any part in the decision of SIC, SIPCO, and New Sipco to open those plants and to refuse to apply the master agreement. Consequently, I find that neither Esmark nor Swift & Company violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) in this respect.

I have found that SIC, SIPCO, and New Sipco became totally independent of Esmark and Swift & Company at the time of the public stock sale in April. At that time SIPCO and New Sipco became successors to the fresh meats division of Swift & Company and to SIPCO when it was the transitional entity, both having been previously owned 100 percent by Esmark. When SIPCO and New Sipco became successors under the new owners, they were free to implement initial conditions of employment, subject to later negotiations with the bargaining representative of their employees. When New Sipco interviewed and hired employees to work at Moultrie and Guymon, it carefully advised these employees that they would be working for an entirely new corporation under working conditions other than those provided for in the master agreement previously in effect at those plants. The applicants were free to accept work under these new conditions or to reject the offer. As it turned out most of the prior employees of Esmark's SIPCO accepted New Sipco's new conditions of employment and it is patently clear that if they had not done so or had insisted on the application of the master agreement, they would not have been hired. Thus, until a substantial number of the old employees accepted the new terms, the employer could not be certain that the Union would be representing a majority of them. Under these circumstances New Sipco was within its rights as a successor to establish initial working conditions and not be saddled with the master agreement.[104] SIC, SIPCO, and New Sipco therefore did not violate Section 8(a)(1) and (5) in this respect, as alleged.

Inasmuch as I have found that neither Esmark nor Swift & Company were alter egos of nor operating as a single enterprise or joint employer with, SIC, SIPCO, or New Sipco after April 1981, and inasmuch as there is no evidence that anyone still connected with Esmark or Swift & Company participated in the negotiations with Local 340, which resulted in the May 6, 1981 contract between the local and New Sipco, I shall recommend dismissal of allegations XIII(d) as it refers to Esmark and Swift & Company. The record evidence, however, indicates that historically the International Union had been recognized as the sole and exclusive collective-bargaining representative for the employees at the Guymon plant. When New Sipco became the successor employer, a duty devolved on it to recognize and bargain with that Union concerning the wages, hours, and working conditions of employees in that unit. It chose, however, to circumvent this duty and to enter into negotiations with Local 340, executing with it a labor agreement on May 6. It should have been apparent to management at New Sipco that the Union could not logically claim the lawful application of the master agreement to Guymon and Moultrie as it had been doing consistently for at least a month prior to May 6 and at the same time acquiesce in or "give its blessing" to the negotiations on the local level between Local 340 and New Sipco. I find that SIC, SIPCO, and New Sipco[105] violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) through the decision of Copeland and Knight to have New Sipco negotiate directly with Local 340 rather than with the Union.

I have found that Swift & Company and Esmark, as of the date of the public sale, no longer had any control over SIC, SIPCO, or New Sipco, that they were not alter egos of, or single, or joint employers with SIC, SIPCO, or New Sipco but that the latter three corporations were completely independent of the former two. This being the case, SIPCO no longer had any right after the April public sale to transfer its employees from the Tampa facility to Swift & Company-owned facilities. Likewise, because I have found that SIC, SIPCO, and New Sipco were free to establish initial terms and conditions of employment at Moultrie and Guymon following the public sale, and did so by deciding not to apply the master agreement at those facilities, they were likewise free on May 11 to limit the transfer rights of employees at the closed Tampa facility to other facilities then covered by the master agreement since much transfer rights vested solely by virtue of the application of the master agreement, and these rights were limited therein to facilities covered by the master agreement, in accordance with the seniority provisions covering master agreement employees. Consequently, I recommend that Case 13-CA-21274 be dismissed in its entirety.

[103] Management personnel of the processed meats division and of the old Swift & Company remained in place to manage the new Swift & Company while management personnel of the fresh meats division of course moved on to manage SIC, SIPCO, and New Sipco.

[104] NLRB v. Burns Security Service, supra.

[105] The integrated operation of these three entities indicate that for purposes of this decision they should be considered a single employing enterprise.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On April 1, 1987, Administrative Law Judge David L. Evans issued the attached second supplemental decision. The Applicant filed exceptions and the General Counsel filed an answering brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the second supplemental decision and the record in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions[1] and to adopt the recommended Order.

We agree with the judge that the net worth statement submitted by the Applicant's accountant relies on the same unattested to and unaudited financial statements previously considered and previously found deficient by the Board in the original Order remanding this proceeding to the judge reported at 272 NLRB 1083 (1984).[2] Furthermore, we also find that the three affidavits of Merrill Gregory, the Applicant's administrative assistant, do not provide the requisite evidence of the Applicant's net worth. Gregory has stated in his affidavits that he has reviewed the net worth statement prepared by the accountant and has concluded that it accurately states the Applicant's net worth. However, Gregory did not explicitly declare that he prepared or reviewed any of the business records supporting the financial statement supplied to the accountant or how otherwise he knows that the accountant's net worth statement is accurate. We note that pursuant to Federal Rule of Evidence 901(a), evidence must be authenticated, and that Federal Rule of Evidence 901(b)(1) permits authentication through the testimony of a witness with firsthand knowledge. As Gregory has not claimed such knowledge, his affidavits are not admissible to prove that the statement is an accurate indication of the Applicant's net worth.[3] By contrast, under those rules, Gregory's affidavits concerning employee complement are admissible to establish that the Applicant had fewer than 500 employees. Gregory has averred in his affidavits that the employee complement statement, which was prepared under his supervision and direction, was compiled from business records and documents and that he has personal knowledge concerning the contents of those documents. Accordingly, while the Applicant has established that it has fewer than 500 employees, we conclude that the Applicant has failed to submit probative evidence of its net worth and its Equal Access to Justice Act (EAJA) application, therefore, must fail.

We recognize that this result may appear harsh. It should not be interpreted as meaning that every applicant for an award under EAJA must incur the expense of securing an audited statement of its records in order to satisfy EAJA's eligibility requirements. It should be read to mean, however, that an applicant must submit accurate and properly authenticated evidence of its net worth in order to satisfy the burden of eligibility that Congress has imposed. As the Applicant has failed to submit such evidence, we shall dismiss the application.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the application of the Applicant, Industrial Security Services Corporation, Houston, Texas, for an award under the Equal Access to Justice Act is dismissed.

MEMBER BABSON, dissenting.

I would find that the Applicant is eligible under EAJA and would therefore reach the merits of the Applicant's entitlement to an EAJA award. The Applicant has submitted the sworn affidavit of its certified public accountant who states that he has prepared the attached statement of the Applicant's net worth in accordance with "general accounting principles of certified public accountants." That statement indicates that the Applicant's net worth

---

[1] In affirming the judge's second supplemental decision, we do not rely on the judge's opinion that the accountant's use of the term "general accounting principles of certified public accountants" seemingly indicates a lower standard of accuracy than the term "generally accepted accounting principles."

[2] The key factor here, as emphasized by the judge, is that the accountant's January 21, 1987 affidavit states, in essence, that he applied his professional expertise only to the extent of verifying the summary arithmetic contained in the financial statement prepared by the Applicant. As the accountant had previously stated in his July 29, 1983 letter to the Applicant, he did not examine any of the underlying business records and therefore he refrained from expressing his professional opinion as to the accuracy of the financial statement "taken as a whole." This procedure is in sharp contrast to that employed in American Pacific Concrete Pipe Co. v. NLRB, 788 F.2d 586 (9th Cir. 1986), one of the two cases relied on by our dissenting colleague. There the financial statement itself was prepared in accordance with "generally accepted accounting principles" and thus was based on the accountant's professional opinion that the statement was accurate. In D'Amico v. Shipbuilding Workers, 630 F.Supp. 919 (D.Md. 1986), there is no indication by the court that the claim of eligibility was not based on the accountant's personal knowledge.

[3] Our dissenting colleague stresses Gregory's statement that he has "personal" knowledge of the Applicant's "financial status." However, Gregory does not state how he acquired that knowledge or what is meant by "financial status," a less exact term than "net worth."

is well below the statutory amount that a party must satisfy in order to be eligible for an EAJA award. Now read in conjunction with the affidavits of Merrill Gregory,[1] the Applicant's administrative assistant who, as the judge notes, has "personal knowledge of [the Applicant's] operations [and] financial status," the net worth statement provides sufficient evidence that the Applicant satisfies the EAJA net worth requirement. See generally D'Amico v. Shipbuilding Workers, 630 F.Supp. 919, 922 (D.Md. 1986); American Pacific Concrete Pipe Co. v. NLRB, 788 F.2d 586, 591 (9th Cir. 1986).[2] Furthermore, I agree with the judge that the Applicant's detailed statement reflecting the number of employees it had on the relevant date satisfies the other jurisdictional requirement that an applicant must meet. Consequently, notwithstanding whatever prudence guided the Board in its earlier deliberations in this matter, I find that the Applicant has now met its burden of establishing eligibility under EAJA. In my view, the evidentiary burden imposed on this applicant by my colleagues is inconsistent with the intent of Congress in enacting EAJA and inconsistent with the above court decisions that found similar documentary evidence submitted by EAJA applicants to be sufficient. Accordingly, I respectfully dissent.

[1] The affidavits of Gregory were submitted with the Applicant's initial and various supplemental applications for an award of attorneys' fees and expenses. All the affidavits state that in his capacity as the Applicant's administrative assistant, Gregory has "personal knowledge of the operations, financial status, and work force" of the Applicant. Gregory has also averred in his most recent affidavit that he has reviewed the financial statement prepared by the accountant and "know[s] that it is a true and accurate statement of the total net worth" of the Applicant.

[2] In Shipbuilding Workers, the applicant submitted the affidavit of the individual who performed its accounting services, which averred that the applicant satisfied the net worth requirement. Rejecting the argument that the applicant should have submitted a balance sheet showing its net worth, the court concluded that "an applicant's affidavit which indicates eligibility should be sufficient to meet the applicant's burden, absent some at least minimally factually supported argument by the government that the applicant is not eligible." Shipbuilding Workers, 630 F.Supp. at 922. By requiring Gregory to prove "how otherwise he knows that the accountant's net worth statement is accurate" and "how he acquired . . . knowledge" of the Applicant's financial status when the General Counsel has failed to present at least some minimally factually supported argument that the Applicant is not eligible, my colleagues have imposed the type of requirements that the court rejected in Shipbuilding Workers.

Further, the Ninth Circuit in America Pacific Concrete Pipe determined that the applicant had satisfied its net worth eligibility by submitting a financial statement that was prepared "in accordance with general accounting principles" and that showed a net worth below the statutory ceiling. I find unpersuasive my collegues' argument that the procedure used by the accountant in the present case stands in "sharp contrast" to that employed by the individual who prepared the financial statement in American Pacific Concrete Pipe. The court's opinion in that case is devoid of any further description of that accountant's procedure other than that the balance sheet prepared included an allowance for depreciation.

A. Martin Wickliff, Jr. (Mayor, Day & Caldwell), of Houston, Texas, for the Applicant.

SECOND SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION

Equal Access to Justice Act

DAVID L. EVANS, Administrative Law Judge. On 30 September 1985, by unpublished Order of that date, the Board, for the second time, remanded this matter to me for the purpose of receiving new evidence concerning Applicant's eligibility for any award of fees and expenses under the Equal Access to Justice Act (EAJA) and for the further purpose of considering, under EAJA, Applicant's petition for fees and expenses incurred following my supplemental decision issued 11 June 1984. The Board further ordered that I issue this second supplemental decision setting forth findings and conclusions on these issues.

On 26 January 1987, Applicant filed its second supplemental application for award of fees and expenses. Contained therein is certain information purporting to establish Applicant's eligibility under EAJA and further containing a statement of fees and expenses as provided for in the Board's Order. The General Counsel filed no response to this submission.

Eligibility of Applicant

The underlying complaint was filed on 17 May 1983; therefore, the eligibility standards for an award under EAJA are determined by 5 U.S.C. § 504 (1982); to wit, Applicant must have had at that date a net worth that did not exceed $5 million, and it must have employed no more than 500 employees.

1. Employee complement

Attached to the second supplemental application is the affidavit of M. V. Gregory, Applicant's administrative assistant. Gregory testified that in his capacity as administrative assistant he had personal knowledge of "the operations, financial status and work for of Applicant." Gregory further testified that the business records and documents of Applicant are under his "jurisdiction and control." Gregory testified that compilations submitted with his affidavit are based on such company records of which he had personal knowledge, and he knows such compilations to be accurate. The compilations reflect that Applicant, in its business of providing security services in Harris and surrounding Texas counties, employed during the month of May 1983, a total of 423 employees. The compilation also details the job descriptions and locations of these employees during the relevant period. Therefore, Applicant has produced probative, firsthand evidence that during the relevant period it employed no more than 500 employees.

2. Net worth

In its "Order Reopening Record and Remanding Proceeding for Further Hearing," dated 8 November 1984,[1] the Board reviewed an exhibit of net worth that had been submitted by Applicant. The exhibit contained a balance sheet, which, on its face, purported to reflect

Applicant's financial condition as of 31 March 1983. The Board found that the exhibit was not of probative value because it was not attested to by Applicant's accountant or any other responsible management official. The Board noted that a letter from Applicant's accoutant, Russell G. Davis, indicated that the financial statements submitted were prepared by Applicant's management and that the accounting firm merely reviewed them in a fashion that was "substantially less in scope than an exmaination in accordance with the generally accepted auditing standards." Finding this inadequate the Board remanded the case "for a hearing for the limited purpose of receiving new evidence with respect to the issue of Applicant's eligibility for an award of fees and expenses under the Equal Access To Justice Act."

On 16 January 1985, counsel for the General Counsel submitted a "Motion to Withdraw Portion of Answer and for Reconsideration." In the motion the General Counsel acknowledged that, on inspection of documentary evidence submitted to the General Counsel after the Board's 8 November 1984 remand, the General Counsel was satisfied that Applicant was eligible for relief under EAJA, and the General Counsel further moved to amend her previously submitted answer denying such eligibility.

On 29 January 1985, by order of that date, I granted the motion and resubmitted the matter to the Board for its consideration of the matter on the merits.

In its 30 September 1985 "Supplemental Order Reopening and Remanding Proceeding," the Board noted:

> While the General Counsel may now be satisfied that Applicant meets the EAJA requirements, we cannot decide this jurisdictional question based on an undocumented, off-the-record exchange of information by the parties. Based on the documentary evidence now before us, we are unable to ascertain whether Applicant has adequately established its eligibility for an award. Until this threshold question is resolved, we cannot determine the merits of the application.

The Board therefore ordered that the record be reopened "for the purpose of receiving new evidence concerning Applicant's eligibility for an award of fees and expenses under the Equal Access To Justice Act" and further ordered me to consider the petition for Applicant's fees and expenses incurred following my decision of 11 June 1984.

On 26 January 1987, Applicant submitted its "Second Supplemental Application for Award of Fees and Expenses under the Equal Access To Justice Act." As noted above, in this supplemental application Applicant submitted a detailed statement of employee complement by one having personal, firsthand knowledge on that issue, M. V. Gregory. However, regarding the net worth and issue, Applicant submitted no such evidence.

Applicant submitted an affidavit, dated 21 January 1987 by accountant Davis, the substantive paragraph of which states:

> The attached financial information (Exhibit 2A), showing total assets of One Million Seven Hundred Seventy-nine Thousand Seven Hundred Ninety-two and 00/100 Dollars ($1,779,792.00) and total liabilities of Two Hundred Sixty-nine Thousand Nine and 00/100 Dollars ($269,009.00) as of May 21, 1983 was developed from the financial statements of Industrial Security Services Corporation. The attached Exhibit 2A also shows a total equity of One Million Four Hundred Eighty-three Thousand Seven Hundred Eight-three and 00/100 Dollars ($1,483,783.00), representing a net worth of One Million Four Hundred Eighty-three Thousand Seven Hundred Eighty-three and 00/100 Dollars ($1,483,783.00). This net worth statement was arrived at by me in accordance with general accounting principles of certified public accountants.

The attached document "Exhibit 2A" is a letter to Applicant over the signature of Davis. The letter states:

> RE: Our review report dated July 29, 1983, on your unaudited financial statements as of May 31, 1983
> FINANCIAL INFORMATION.
> The following information is extracted from reference unaudited financial statements:

Total assets	$1,779,792
Total liabilities	296,009
Total equity	1,483,783

The "reference unaudited financial statements" to which Davis here refers are apparently the same unverified statements previously submitted, and rejected, by the Board in its original decision.

Obviously, Applicant has submitted no additional information by virtue of Davis' above-quoted affidavit and its "Exhibit 2A." The above-quoted affidavit of Davis does no more than state a simple proposition of subtracting and calls the result Applicant's "net worth." Davis did not state that he had reviewed Applicant's records, which demonstrate Applicant's May 1983 net worth; he testified only that he had reviewed unidentified "reference unaudited financial statements," and, accepting the accuracy thereof, a net worth can be computed by subtracting represented liabilities from represented assets. Perhaps the person who compiled the unidentified "reference unaudited financial statements" and submitted them to Davis has (or had) first-hand knowledge of what Applicant's records reflect, but that person's testimony has not been produced despite the opportunity given Applicant by the Board. In summary, the unattested information on which Davis relies is no more probative than the unattested balance sheets, and Davis' review thereof, which were previously found to be inadequate by the Board.[2] Therefore, I find and conclude that Applicant,

[2] Applicant's second supplemental application represents that Davis' 21 January 1987 affidavit "states, on his personal knowledge, the net worth of Applicant, as of May, 1983." Davis' affidavit states no such thing, but the representation, like Gregory's affidavit on the issue of employee complement, demonstrates that Applicant knows what character of evidence the Board requires. Note further that in the 21 January 1987 affidavit

although given ample opportunity to do so, has failed to prove a net worth of less than $5 million and, accordingly, has failed to prove that it is entitled to any award under the Equal Access to Justice Act.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[3]

ORDER

It is recommended that the applcation of Industrial Security Services Corporation, for an award under the Equal Access to Justice Act be denied.

Davis eschews the term of art "generally accepted accounting principles," although that term was employed in his original affidavit submitted to, and found inadequate by, the Board. This time Davis calls his process of subtraction "general accounting principles of certified public accountants," a seemingly lower standard of accuracy.

[3] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

DECISION AND ORDER

By Members Johansen, Babson, and Cracraft

On January 19, 1988, Administrative Law Judge Joel P. Biblowitz issued the attached decision. The General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Respondent filed an answering brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions as modified and to adopt the recommended Order.

We agree with the judge that the Respondent did not violate Section 8(a)(5) when it failed to furnish the Union with requested information regarding the prices for separate components of a New Year's Eve package offered by the Respondent. But, rather than finding that the information requested by the Union did not exist, we find that the Union has failed to meet its burden of showing the reasonable and probable relevance of the requested information.

Since 1976, the Union has represented the Respondent's employees. The parties' collective-bargaining agreement contains a special provision (art. XI, sec. 17) that allows for the parties to bargain annually on the wages of employment for waiters, waitresses, and bartenders for any New Year's Eve function offered by the Respondent. It is understood that the gratuity is based on food and beverage cost. If no agreement is reached, the contract provides for instant arbitration, and the arbitrator is precluded from awarding a gratuity in excess of 15 percent of the retail cost.

Prior to 1985, waiters and waitresses were compensated for the New Year's Eve functions in a fixed amount per customer with a guaranteed number of customers per waiter. In 1985 the Respondent changed from the fixed amount method of compensation to a gratuity system based on a negotiated percentage of the food and beverage cost. The record discloses that the Respondent's change in 1985 resulted in the waiters and waitresses receiving approximately $20 less for working the New Year's Eve function than had been received in prior years; however, bartenders received more after the change.

On October 29, 1986,[1] the Union requested information from the Respondent regarding its plan for New Year's Eve. On November 3, 1986, the Respondent sent a letter to the Union stating it would offer a dinner and reception on New Year's Eve that had an inclusive price of $86 per couple, and the price included tax and gratuity. The letter further stated that servers and bartenders would receive a 15-percent gratuity. The Respondent also included an advertisement of the function that listed the full menu for the dinner and the other items (open bar, free parking, deluxe accommodation for two, entertainment) included in the total package cost of $198.70 per couple.

On November 26, the Union informed the Respondent that the November 3 letter was inadequate and that the Union needed the cost breakdown for all components of the New Year's Eve package. On December 23, the Respondent informed the Union that the Union could get a breakdown of the cost of the dinner from its banquet office, but that the other information was not pertinent. Although the Respondent subsequently provided information that the cost of the open bar was $20 and the cost of the meal was $48, it has continued to refuse to provide the specific cost breakdown of the New Year's Eve package as requested by the Union.

The Union asserts that the reason it needed the requested information was to determine whether the $86 figure for food and beverages was accurate or was undervalued (and the remaining items inflated) in order to reduce the gratuity to which employees were entitled. At the hearing, the Union asserted that it suspected the Respondent had arbitrarily devalued unspecified portions of the package because employees received substantially less compensation when the Respondent changed to a percentage-based gratuity system in 1985.

Section 8(a)(5) obligates an employer to provide a union requested information if there is a probability that the information would be relevant to the union in fulfilling its statutory duties as bargaining representative.[2] Where the requested information concerns wage rates, job descriptions, and other information pertaining to employees within the bargaining unit, the information is presumptively relevant.[3] Where the information does not concern matters pertaining to the bargaining unit, the union must show that the information is relevant.[4] When the requested information does not pertain to matters related to the bargaining unit, to satisfy the burden of showing relevance, the union must offer more than mere suspicion for it to be entitled to the information. Southern Nevada Builders Assn., 274 NLRB 350, 351 (1985).

The information the Union seeks pertains to the cost of such items as an open bar, parking, accommodations, and entertainment. The parties agree that the employees' gratuity for the evening was properly based only on the food and beverage components of the package cost. Therefore, the cost of the other components of the package that entails the setting of rates for services separate from the food and beverage component was not presumptively relevant, and the Union must show the information is relevant.

The Union asserts that it needs the price on the nonfood and beverage items in the New Year's Eve dinner package in order to determine whether the Respondent had devalued the price of the food and beverages and shifted that cost to the other components of the New Year's Eve package. The sole basis for the Union's belief that food and beverage cost may have been devalued in the 1987 dinner package is the fact that some of the unit employees received less compensation under the system presently in effect than they had under a previous system. That some of the employees receive less under the new system of compensation may be grounds for dissatisfaction with the current system, but it does not satisfy the Union's burden to demonstrate that information regarding the price of nonfood and beverage items is relevant.[5] At best, the Union has advanced a hypothetical theory explaining how the information might be useful in determining whether the Respondent has violated the parties' contract. See Southern Nevada Builders' Assn., supra. We find that the Union's proffered reason for believing the information relevant is nothing more than mere suspicion.[6] We conclude that the Union has not demonstrated the reasonable and probable relevance of the requested information. For these reasons, we therefore adopt the judge's recommended Order dismissing the complaint.

ORDER

The recommended Order of the administrative law judge is adopted and the complaint is dismissed.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

JOEL P. BIBLOWITZ, Administrative Law Judge. This case was heard by me in Hartford, Connecticut, on 12 and 13 November 1987.[1] The complaint, which issued on 28 April, and was based on an unfair labor practice charge filed on 2 March by Local 217, Hotel and Restaurant and Bartenders Union, AFL–CIO (the Union), alleges that Sheraton Hartford Hotel (Respondent), violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act by refusing to provide the Union with certain information it requested from Respondent regarding a breakdown of the charges for its New Year's Eve party for 1986–1987.[2]

On the entire record including the briefs filed, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

There being no dispute, I find that Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act, and that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. FACTS AND ANALYSIS

Since about 1976, the Union has represented the following employees of Respondent:

> All regular full-time and regular part-time employees in the food and beverage preparation and service department, including banquet waiters, waitresses and bartenders, housekeeping department uniformed service department, heat, light and power department, repairs and maintenance department, laundry department, guest service agents, restaurant cashiers, head banquet housemen, PBX operators and reservationists employed at the Employer's Trumbull Street at Civic Center Plaza, Hartford, Connecticut location but excluding all other employees such as accounting, administrative, sales, managerial, security and guards, timekeepers and receiving clerks, clerical employees, banquet cashiers and checkers, storeroom personnel, assistant housekeeper, inspectress, assistant chef, head waiter, purchasing agents, food and beverage controllers, as-

[5] The General Counsel and the Union are not contesting the change in the method of compensation.

[6] We find this case distinguishable from Pertec Computer Corp., 284 NLRB 810 (1987), which concerned a union's request to examine the respondent's financial records. In Pertec the information was necessary to substantiate the respondent's contention that its financial circumstances were central to its decision to relocate its operation. Here, the Union has received the information that is pertinent to unit employees, namely, the food and beverage cost upon which the gratuity is based.

[1] Unless indicated otherwise, all dates referred to relate to the year 1987.

[2] Unless indicated otherwise, the phrase New Year's Eve party refers to the party beginning the evening prior to 1 January 1987.

> sistant restaurant manager, executive steward, banquet steward, confidential employees, casual employees and supevisors as defined in the Act.

This unit description is set forth in the Union's collective-bargaining agreement with Respondent, the last of which expired 30 September. Article XI, section 17 of this agreement provides:

> 17) The Parties to this Agreement shall, if possible, meet to resolve the terms and wages of employment for New Year's Eve no later than November 1st of each year, if the Hotel plans any special events for the evening, such as special package deals, parties, etc. If no agreement is reached, the issues shall be submitted to instant arbitration without briefs and a bench decision requested if it can be provided by the arbitrator. The arbitrator shall not render an award with respect to gratuities which provides in excess of fifteen percent (15%) of the retail cost, and shall not award premium wages for waiters, waitresses, and bartenders.

By letter to Respondent dated 29 October 1986, the Union, by Constance Holt, its organizer, wrote:

> That is to notify you that the Union wishes to commence negotiations concerning the terms and wages of employment for New Year's Eve. In order to begin that process the Union is requesting information concerning what plans the Hotel has. Specifically we are requesting: 1. what type of function (parties, special package etc.); 2. What price the Hotel is offering the public for New Year's Eve, and 3. what the company plans to pay the employees. If there is any other relevant information please include it.
> If you have any questions please contact me.

Holt testified that in addition to beginning the process referred to in article XI, section 17, the information she requested "what type of function" was, principally, to learn whether the event would be buffet or individual table service (which would affect the number of employees required), and whether there would be a flat fee for the serving employees or whether it would be on a percentage basis. The prior year's New Year's Eve party was the first that paid the employees on a percentage basis and the employees received less than they had in the prior 10 or 11 years. By letter dated 3 November 1986, Respondent, by Lori Lafemina, its director of personnel, wrote to Holt:

> Per your request in your letter of October 29th for information referencing the New Year's Eve Plans for dinner package, I have outlined what the payment will be for our staff who work the function.
> The dinner and reception is an inclusive pre-fix price of $86.00 per couple which includes tax and gratuity.
> The servers and bartenders will receive 15% gratuity which as you know is beyond the normal banquet gratuity distribution of 12.5%, 13% for beverage provided in the contract, yet does not exceed the contractual provisions.
> Please find attached the menu for public distribution. As we have met the contractual obligations, please accept this information as fulfillment of the disclosure provided for in Article XI Section 17.
> If there are any questions, please do not hesitate to contact me.

Enclosed was a flyer advertising the evening as a "Gala Package $198.70 per couple." The full menu was listed (with a choice of two main courses), and the flyer listed the other items that were included in the total package cost: open bar, dinner and dancing, champagne toast at midnight, deluxe accommodations for two, late checkout time New Year's Day, free use of health club and pool, and free parking. Holt testified that this letter did not satisfy her request because it was a flat statement that the food and beverage cost was $86, including tax and tips; it did not give the cost breakdown for the other components that the Union was looking for—the room, decorations, music, entertainment, the breakfast (although Holt testified that it was included in the total cost, the enclosed flyer did not list it), and any other components that they might not have known about. The reason the Union needed this information was to determine whether the $86 figure for food and beverages was accurate or was devalued, and the remaining items inflated so that the food and beverage cost would be less and the resulting gratuities to the employees would correspondingly be less.

On 26 November 1986 Holt met with Lafemina and informed her that this letter was inadequate and she told her the reason, as stated above. She told her that she needed the breakdown for decorations, entertainment, the room, and breakfast cost. Lafemina was noncommittal, but said that the package information was in the mail. Not having received this information, by letter dated 19 December 1986 Holt wrote to Respondent's general manager, Reginald McDowell (Lafemina had some medical problems) about a number of pending issues, including:

> Finally, I also want to reiterate my request for pertinent information regarding the New Years Eve Negotiations. Several times I have requested a price breakdown of the $112.00 that makes up the $198.00 New Years Eve package. I have yet to receive this information.

Having received no reply to this letter, Holt called Respondent on 23 December 1986 and spoke to McDowell, as Lafemina was on a leave of absence. She told him that she was calling because her request had not been satisfactorily answered and she wanted to resolve the matter before the Christmas holiday. She asked McDowell for a breakdown of all the components of the evening. He told her that if she wanted a breakdwon of the cost of the dinner she could get that from Respondent's banquet office, but the other information was not pertinent and he was not going to give it to her. They then discussed and agreed on the mechanism of the 15-percent gratuity and the number of guests guaranteed for each empoyee. That was the extent of the conversation. After this conversation, she asked the Union's steward in the banquet department to locate the banquet menu with the prices, but never received any further information in this regard.

By letter dated 24 December 1986, Holt wrote to McDowell:

> This is to confirm the agreement made thus for [sic] concerning the rates and working conditions for employees who will work the New Years Eve function.
> 1) The gratuity will be 15% of the cost of Dinner and reception.
> 2) Because the dinner is a buffet there will be a minimum of 24 per server.
> In addition to the above agreements, the Hotel is refusing to provide the price breakdown of the $86.00 Dinner/Reception and the remaining $112.00 in the $198.00 New Years Eve package. Specifically, the Union has requested for the purpose of negotiations the Menu items prices, the reception costs, and the price breakdown of the room, entertainment, decorations, breakfast, and any other costs that are included in the $198.00 package. In our conversation December 23rd, you refused to provide me this information.

Later in the day on 24 December 1986 Holt received a number of items from Lafemina, including another copy of the flyer advertising the Respondent's New Year's Eve gala, and its component parts. Unlike the earlier one that Holt had received from Respondent, this one had two handwritten notations: Next to the words "Open Bar from 8:00 p.m.-2:00 a.m." was written "20.00" and next to the food items on the menu was written "48.00."[3] There were no further notations or explanations.

On 30 December 1986, Holt and Lafemina executed the following agreement:

> The agreement, thus far, concerning the working conditions for the New Years Eve function is as follows:
> 1. The gratuity will be 15% of the retail cost of the dinner and reception, which you state is $86.00 inclusive of tax & grat.
> 2. Because the dinner is a buffet there will be a guarantee of 24 covers per server.

Prior to executing this agreement Holt informed Lafemina that the Union was reserving its right to arbitrate Respondent's computation of the $86 and that she would receive a letter to that effect. By letter dated 30 December 1986, Holt wrote Lafemina:

> Because the Hotel refuses to provide pertinent information regarding the specific cost breakdown of the New Years Eve package, we are unable to determine the validity of the $86.00 upon which the 15% grauity (sic) is based. We therefore reserve our right to arbitrate the new years eve agreement.

By letter dated 6 January, Holt wrote to Lafemina:

> As of yet the New Year's Eve function information has not been provided. The flyer you enclosed in two different letter [sic] does not address the information I requested. Several times I have asked for the price breakdown of the entire package. Specifically, I requested: 1) the menu item prices and reception cost and 2) the cost breakdown of the remaining $112.00 in the $198.00 New Year's Eve Package. I was told by you that the remaining $112.00 consists of the cost for decorations, entertainment, room, and breakfast. It was those items and any others that I asked for a dollar amount on.
> The information you have sent thus far is simply inadequate in determining the legitimacy of the $86.00.
> While you claim the information has been provided, Mr. McDowell informed me that the Hotel management refuses to provide the specific breakdowns. Thus, we shall exercise our right to arbitrate.

By letter dated 5 January, Lafemina wrote to Holt:

> We are in receipt of your letter dated December 30, 1986. Please be advised that the hotel has provided the Union with all pertinent information (see letters dated 12/18/86 and 11/3/86). The $86.00 breakdown was provided. Also the banquet function order was available prior to the function. If you check with the servers I am sure they will acknowledge this.
> An agreement was reached by the Union and the Hotel as to the wages and covers. The contract does not state that the price charged to customers is to be negotiated between the Union and the Hotel—only the gratuity and wage amounts. As this was negotiated and the Hotel agreed to pay food servers an additional 2-1/2% after food gratuity and bartenders an additional 1-1/2% of Beverage, as well as guarantee 24 covers per food server, we consider negotiations final and complete.
> The contract states that "if no agreement is reached, the issues shall be submitted to instant arbitration", etc., an agreement was reached.
> I hope this clarified the Hotel's position. Should you have any questions, please contact us.

By letter dated 15 January, Holt made a final request to Lafemina for the breakdown of costs for the New Year's Eve party; having received no reply, by letter dated 4 February she wrote to the Connecticut State Board of Arbitration requesting arbitration of the issue. The arbitration had not been scheduled at the time of the hearing.

As can be gleaned from the facts recited above, the General Counsel and the Union's argument is that they are entitled to this information in order to ascertain that the components that they are paid on, food and beverages, was not devalued compared to the other components, room, entertainment, etc. McDowell testified for Respondent. He testified that there is no relationship between Respondent's pricing of food and beverages and its pricing of room rates in packages. He testified that Respondent maintains a banquet office that distributes brochures listing menus with prices, payment, and credit plans; the food and beverage costs Respondent set for the New Year's Eve gala were consistent with its regular food and beverage costs listed in these brochures. Although these are generally fixed prices, there is some degree of price flexibility depending on the number of guests at the function and whether it is a busy time for Respondent's banquet business. Respondent's position is that the Union is not entitled to this information because it would make no difference; as counsel for Respondent asked Holt, what difference would it make if Respondent told the Union that the room rate component was $50 or $100? In addition, what the Union was attempting to do was bargain about Respondent's rates, which admittedly it cannot do. Finally, if the Union really wanted to learn of the authenticity of the $86 rate for food and beverage, it could have checked this with Respondent's banquet office, which it did not bother to do.

[3] The agreed-on gratuity rate of $68, plus the applicable tax, equals $86.

The law is clear that an employer, on request, must provide a union representing its employees with information that is relevant to it "in carrying out its statutory duties and responsibilities." NLRB v. Acme Industrial Co., 385 U.S. 432, 437 (1967). Chief among a union's responsibilities is its obligation to enforce and administer the collective-bargaining agreement, and any information relevant to the Union in this regard must be provided to it, on request. Conrock Co., 263 NLRB 1293 (1982). In Pfizer, Inc., 268 NLRB 916, 918 (1984), the Board stated: "This, information need not necessarily be dispositive of the issue between the parties, it need only have some bearing on it."

The facts are clear and all three witnesses were extremely articulate and credible. The General Counsel alleges that the Union is entitled to the dollar value of the other components of the cost of the New Year's Eve package because only with this information could it be certain that the food and beverage portion (the only portion for which its members are paid) was not undervalued in relationship to the other components of the package's cost. However, this argument assumes one factor that I find was not established—a connection between the food and beverage charge and the total package cost. McDowell, who testified in a very convincing way, testified that there was no relation between the food and beverage charge and the total cost of the package; that Respondent priced the food and beverages from its banquet price list as it would for any affair, taking into consideration the food and liquor served and the type of service employed. The factors employed in determining the package cost were the desire to remain competitive with the other nearby comparable hotels while, at the same time, maximizing revenue for an evening that would otherwise be a low-revenue evening. This testimony is supported by other evidence as well. When McDowell commenced his employment at Respondent in August 1985, he learned that the prior New Year's Eve party generated 125 guests at a rate of $235 per couple. His research showed that this price was too high considering the competition and left, unused, available space—the Respondent's ballroom accommodates 550 people. For the 1985–1986 New Year's Eve party, Respondent lowered the price to $198.50 (this was in line with the competition) and had 300 guests. McDowell testified that Respondent "still had more room to grow," and, in determining the price for the 1986–1987 party, "we did a marketing ploy" by setting the price at $198.70, which resulted in 500 guests.

The above convinces me that, in determining the cost for the 1986–1987 New Year's Eve party, Respondent did not set a price for each component of the evening and add these components to reach the final price. Rather, the price was determined by competitive reasons and the desire to fill the ballroom, and by the "marketing ploy" of rigging the price to the year—$198.70. I therefore find that the information the Union requested did not exist. The information that it was entitled to, and that did exist, was the banquet menu, which Respondent informed the Union they could inspect (as could anyone) to determine the accuracy of the $86 figure for food and beverages; the Union chose not to take advantage of this offer.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.
2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.
3. Respondent had not engaged in any conduct in violation of the Act as alleged here.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[4]

ORDER

It is recommended that the complaint be dismissed in its entirety.

---

[4] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

June 30, 1988

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS BABSON AND CRACRAFT

On February 11, 1988, Administrative Law Judge Bernard Ries issued the attached second supplemental decision. The Respondent filed exceptions, a brief in support of exceptions, and a motion to reopen the record or, in the alternative, for reconsideration,[1] and the General Counsel filed a brief in answer to the Respondent's exceptions and its motion. The Charging Party also filed a brief opposing the Respondent's motion.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.[3]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, National Posters, Inc. and National Litho, a Division of National Posters, Inc., Baltimore, Maryland, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Refusing to bargain collectively concerning rates of pay, wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment with Baltimore Graphic Communications Union, Local No. 61-C as the exclusive bargaining representative of its employees in the following appropriate unit:

> All production and maintenance employees including truck drivers, employed by the Employer at its 800 Debelius Avenue and 4206 Shannon Drive, Baltimore, Maryland locations; but excluding all office clerical employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) On request, bargain with the above-named labor organization as the exclusive representative of all employees in the above-named appropriate unit with respect to rates of pay, wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment and, if an understanding is reached, embody the understanding in a signed agreement.

(b) Post at its facilities at 800 Debelius Avenue and 4206 Shannon Drive, Baltimore, Maryland, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[4] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 5, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(c) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

[1] In its prior decision and order remanding this case for further hearing (282 NLRB 997 (1987)), the Board, inter alia, found no merit to the Respondent's contention that the high turnover rate among its employees since the last election required the holding of a new election. In its motion, the Respondent seeks to have the record reopened so that it could introduce into evidence an affidavit from its vice president, Diane Hild, describing the additional turnover and changes that have occurred since the Board's prior decision and, alternatively, requests that the Board reconsider its prior ruling that the "turnover" argument lacked merit. The Respondent's motion, having been duly considered, is denied as lacking in merit and raising matters previously considered by the Board.

[2] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[3] In his recommended Order, the judge directs that the Board's Order in the original proceeding in this case (265 NLRB No. 115, dated December 10, 1982) (not reported in Board volumes) be reissued. We agree. As the Board's Order and notice in that proceeding were not published, we shall reissue the Order and notice in full here, modified only to reflect the Charging Party's correct name.

[4] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

> All production and maintenance employees including truck drivers, employed by the Employer at its 800 Debelius Avenue and 4206 Shannon Drive, Baltimore, Maryland locations; but excluding all office clerical employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

Sandra J. Hughes, Esq. (Delson & Gordon), of Washington, D.C., for the Charging Party.

SECOND SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION[1]

BERNARD RIES, Administrative Law Judge. On 15 December 1981, a representation election was conducted by Region 5 among the approximately 53 eligible voters at Respondent's two plants in Baltimore, Maryland. The tally of ballots showed that 24 employees voted in favor of the Charging Party[2] here, 21 unfavorable votes were cast, and 4 ballots were challenged.

Without holding a hearing, the Regional Director for Region 5 ruled, inter alia, that the ballot cast by employee Samuel John and another ballot should be opened and counted. Further action on the remaining two challenges was deferred pending the results of the revised tally. The Board adopted the proposed procedure.

Without holding a hearing, the Regional Director for Region 5 ruled, inter alia, that the ballot cast by employee Samuel John and another ballot should be opened and counted. Further action on the remaining two challenges was deferred pending the results of the revised tally. The Board adopted the proposed procedure.

The two ballots were opened and the revised tally showed the Union ahead by 25 to 22. The Regional Director issued a certification of representative to the Union, and the Respondent refused to bargain in order to test the validity of the certification. The Region issued a complaint asserting the Respondent's refusal to bargain to be unlawful.

On 10 December 1982, the Board issued a Decision and Order in which it granted the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment and held that Respondent was violating Section 8(a)(5) of the Act by refusing to bargain with the Union. 265 NLRB No. 115 (not reported in Board volumes).

On 3 November 1983, the United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit held, contrary to the Board, that a hearing was required on the issue of Samuel John's eligibility to vote. (720 F.2d 1358.) Accordingly, by Order dated 6 April 1984, the Board directed that a hearing be held to determine the status of employees Samuel John, Albert Amend, and Wesley Souders. The right of alleged Supervisors Amend and Souders to vote had not previously been resolved because once the revised tally had issued in June 1982, the Union had enjoyed a lead of 25 to 22, thus making immaterial the votes of Amend and Souders. In directing the hearing, the Board recognized that the disposition of John's vote could make determinative the ballots of Amend and Souders.

A hearing on the eligibility of John, Amend, and Souders was held before me in June 1984. On 23 November 1984, I issued a decision recommending that the ballots of John and Souders be counted, but that Amend should be disqualified from voting as a statutory supervisor. Because John's ballot had already been counted, and the Union was ahead by 25 to 22, I further recommended that the Board's original bargaining order be reaffirmed.

[1] In fn. 2 of its Decision and Order remanding for further hearing (282 NLRB 997, the Board pointed out that I should not have entitled my first decision in this case "Supplemental Decision," because "there had been no prior judge's decision written in this case." Despite the fact that the Board's first Decision and Order in the case (265 NLRB No. 115 (Dec. 10, 1982), not reported in published Board volumes) might arguably have made my first decision on remand a supplemental decision, the Board's comment is, of course, authoritative. Because there has now been a "prior judge's decision," I suppose that this one would properly be headed "Supplemental Decision," and, indeed, the Board's remanding Order directs the preparation of a supplemental decision. To avoid confusion, however, I have entitled this decision as shown above.

[2] In his brief, counsel for the General Counsel has requested that the name of the Charging Party be amended to reflect its present correct title. The motion is granted.

Appeals from my recommendations were filed with the Board. In addition, on 27 December 1984, Respondent filed a motion to reopen the record for two purposes. One objective was to submit evidence of substantial employee turnover since the election; a supporting affidavit was attached. The other was to "present evidence that the Petitioner no longer exists, or has undergone fundamental change without due process participation by Respondent's employees."

In support of the second contention, Respondent attached reprints of reports in labor newsletters, dated 5 April and 10 June 1983, regarding the merger of the Charging Party's parent organization with another International labor organization effective 1 July 1983, as well as copies of certain pages from what purported to be the Charging Party's "former by-laws." Respondent explained that the evidence "was not adduced previously, in part because some of the necessary evidence was not known by the Respondent until recently,[3] and also because the evidence was not relevant to any issues in this case until now. The Board's previous Order Directing Hearing . . . did not authorize the Administrative Law Judge to consider any issue other than the voting eligibility of the three challenged employees. . . . The evidence sought to be adduced in this motion, therefore, which previously might have been premature if presented to the Judge, is now extremely relevant to the resolution of the case."

On 4 February 1987, the Board issued a "Decision and Order Remanding for Further Hearing" (282 NLRB 997). Although the Board affirmed my rulings, findings, and conclusions, it also decided to reopen the record to determine whether the 1983 merger had "so substantially changed Local 61 as to raise a question concerning its continued status as the certified bargaining representative of the Respondent's unit employees." A hearing for the mandated purpose was held on 29 July 1987.

Briefs were filed by the General Counsel and Respondent on 25 September 1987. I have reviewed the transcript proceedings,[4] the exhibits, and the briefs, and I recommend that the Board conclude that the merger did not substantially affect the identity or continuity of the Charging Party as collective-bargaining representative of Respondent's employees.

The merger referendum was held in April 1983. Of an active IPGCU membership of 91,000, affiliated in about 540 locals, more than 49,000 members voted in favor of the merger and over 13,000 against. Active members of GAIU, which had on its rolls at the time about 76,000 members in 2000 locals, similarly approved the merger by more than a 4 to 1 majority. The effective date of the merger was 1 July 1983.

I. THE BASIC FACTS

The Charging Party, formerly known as Baltimore Printing Pressmen and Assistants' Union No. 61, was for many years a local of the International Printing and Graphic Communications Union, AFL-CIO, CLC (IPGCU). After some period of discussion, IPGCU and another International, Graphic Arts International Union, AFL-CIO, CLC (GAIU), decided to merge into an organization called Graphic Communications International Union (GCIU).

In approving the merger, the members adopted three basic documents—an agreement for merger, an implementation agreement, and a constitution. These documents provided for a "transition period" of 9 years, in recognition of a perceived "need to smoothly and efficiently integrate the policies, programs, officer structure, staff and personnel of the two merging internationals." (Agreement For Merger, G.C. Exh. 34 at 2, sec. 4.) During this period, various temporary provisions put into effect at the commencement of the merger would gradually be phased out by 1992.

II. THE BASIC LEGAL PRINCIPLES

In NLRB v. Financial Institution Employees, 475 U.S. 192 (1986), the Supreme Court rejected the Board's holding that all employees, including nonmembers of the union, should have been given an opportunity to vote in an election in which an independent union decided whether to affiliate with an International union. In its opinion, the Court also noted a second Board rule that came into play when changes occur in a union's organizational structure. If such changes are, in the Court's words, "sufficiently dramatic to alter the union's identity," a "question of representation" will arise, authorizing an employer to lawfully refuse to deal with the affected entity until the Board has conducted a representation election. Such a representation question may arise, said the Court, when the changed circumstances make it "unclear whether a majority of employees continue to support the reorganized union." Id. at 202.[5]

By this standard, the Court appeared to be adopting an underlying approach akin to that applied by the Board and the courts in determining whether a new employer is in law a successor employer, i.e., can it be concluded that employment conditions are sufficiently similar so as to raise the inference that employees would, as in the past, still desire representation by the incumbent union? United Maintenance & Mfg. Co., 214 NLRB 529, 532 (1974); Ranch-Way, 183 NLRB 1168, 1169 (1970); NLRB v. Albert Armato, 199 F.2d 800, 803 (7th Cir. 1952).

The conceivable organizational and structural modifications of labor organizations are manifold. The reorganizations that, on their surface, present perhaps the most likely prospect that a change of identity has occurred are affiliations of independent unions with national unions and mergers of two local unions. Less superficially compelling, perhaps, is such restructuring as the change of affiliation by a local union from one parent union to another, or a merger of a parent with another national union; in such cases, the local has previously surrendered some control over its own shape and destiny to a superior authority, and its members have presumably contented themselves with the knowledge that changes affecting them might be wrought by the superior entity without their consent.

[4] Errors in the transcript have been noted and corrected.

[5] See also Id. at 205: "We repeat, dissatisfaction with the decisions union members make may be tested by a Board-conducted representation election only if it is unclear whether the reorganized union retains majority support."

In making assessments of bargaining representative "continuity," however, the Board has not expressly created presumptions about the particular nature of the modification, but rather has generally examined each case to determine the effect of the changes, if any, on the essential identity of the bargaining representative. "[S]tructure, administration, officers, assets, membership, autonomy, bylaws, size, and territorial jurisdiction," NLRB v. Pearl Bookbinding Co., 517 F.2d 1108, 1111 (1st Cir. 1985), have all come under scrutiny; while none of these factors has been denominated as critical or dispositive, it is obvious that some are of more significance than others.[6] The burden of demonstrating a change in identity has been allocated to the party making the claim, even when the forum is an unfair labor practice proceeding. Insulfab Plastics, 274 NLRB 817 (1985), 821, enfd. 789 F.2d 961 (1st Cir. 1986).

III. AN EXAMINATION OF THE PERTINENT FACTORS

Local 61–C experienced very little immediate change in its structure and operations as a result of the 1 July 1983 merger of its parent union with GAIU. Virtually all the elected officers of Local 61 as of January 1983 remained incumbent in January 1984 and, in fact, most were still serving at the time of the hearing in 1987. The bylaws of Local 61–C were changed (by adoption at a membership meeting) in only a few respects subsequent to the merger: the oath of office was, although not required, amended to conform to the new GCIU constitution; the oath of membership, which is constitutionally mandated was adopted, but had no apparent substantive effect on the obligation of membership when compared with the former Local 61 oath; the jurisdictional and "Form of Organization" clauses of the Local's bylaws were broadened slightly, but not to the full extent of the scope of such clauses in the new GCIU constitution;[7] and the appropriate name changes were made throughout the Local's bylaws.

After 1 July 1983, Local 61–C continued to increase dues periodically, following the same procedure it had employed prior to the merger.[8] All increases have been occasioned by revenue needs, according to the testimony of longtime Local 61–C President and Business Agent Brown, and had no connection with the merger. The new GCIU constitution does not contain any provision prescribing standards that local unions must apply in formulating dues.

The merged constitution essentially carries forward the per capita taxes paid by the former IPGCU locals to the International prior to the merger. A provision in the merger agreement specifies that while a per capita structure that will apply to all GCIU members is contemplated, "there will be no changes in the Per Capita payments as a result of merger, and the matter of changes in the Per Capita structure need not and will not be considered as an issue at the 1984 Convention and can only be modified thereafter by Convention action or referendum of the entire membership of the GCIU." (G.C. Exh.34, Merger Agreement, p. 3, item 7.) Brown testified without controversion that, as of 1987, there have been no changes in per capita taxes paid to the GCIU by Local 61–C.

At least up to the end of 1986, the last information of record on the subject, there is no evidence that Local 61–C has suffered financially from the merger. For the year ending 31 December 1982, annual net revenues equaled $963 and members' equity was $17,668; as of 31 December 1986, the net revenue amounted to $2726, and members' equity was $21,111.

Local 61–C has a membership of about 190 and represents (both prior to and since the merger) employees in three bargaining units in Baltimore; the largest unit comprises those employees employed by an association called Printing Industries of Maryland. President Brown has been the chief negotiator for all three contracts since 1972. For the Printing Industries contract negotiated in 1982, he appointed to his negotiating team IPGCU members Kaplan and Hosza; in 1984, he appointed Kaplan and Local 61–C Vice President Edwards; and in 1986, he selected local officer Spies and Chapel Chairman Berry.

In 1984, after six or eight fruitless bargaining sessions, Brown asked Robert Callahan, a former IPGCU and then GCIU International representative, to assist in the Printing Industries negotiations. Callahan attended the last two meetings. In 1986, lack of progress again led Brown to call Callahan to the negoiations; the latter appeared for 1 day, and he was supplanted, also for 1 day, by James Mitchell, a onetime IPGCU vice president then serving as GCIU vice president. Brown testified that, about 1973, he had also sought the assistance of IPGCU International officers for such a purpose.[9]

The new GCIU constitution provides that if a local believes that it might have to strike, a membership vote for strike sanction is presented to the GCIU secretary-treasurer, who then asks the International's general board for approval. Such approval is only preliminary, however; it is thereafter up to the International president to make the final decision about approving an actual strike, and subsequently there must be authorization of the strike by a two-thirds vote of members in the affected unit as well as approval by the local union as a whole. (G.C. Exh. 34 at 51–52, ch. XIII, A.)

[6] Pearl Bookbinding involved the 1972 merger of the International Brotherhood of Bookbinders and the Lithographers and Photengravers International Union, which produced the Graphic Arts International Union. That Union, as set out above, merged with the IPGCU in 1983. IPGCU was itself the product of an earlier merger.

[7] The record raises a question whether these changes even became effective. See R. Exh. 100, letter of International Recording and Financial Secretary Norton to Local 61–C President Brown dated 2 February 1984.

[8] R. Br., which states that the Local's dues "increased by $2 per journeyman over those of former Local 61 in the year following the merger," does not quite comport with the record. Eight journeyman classifications had dues increases of $2; one was increased by $1.50, two by $1, and one had no increase. The record also shows a $2 across-the-board increase (except for the "specialty" classification) in January 1982; a $1 general increase (with the same exception) in January 1983; and $1 general increases in April 1985 and January 1986.

[9] The negotiating team for the American Bank Stationery unit in 1982 was Brown, Chapel Chairman Cirri, and pressman Daniels; and in 1984 and 1986, Brown and Daniels. Brown has been the sole negotiator for the AFSCME unit, consisting of one employee.

Similar restrictions also applied, however, under the IPGCU constitution, although the procedure differed: the board of directors of the IPGCU was empowered to finally decide whether a strike was authorized (but the local then was required to secure a two-thirds approval from the entire membership, rather than just the unit involved). (G.C. Exh. 33 at 59–60.) Thus, both before and after the merger, Respondent's bargaining unit employees were powerless to decide for themselves whether to strike.[10]

With respect to the approval of collective-bargaining agreements, Brown testified that both before and after the merger, once the membership had ratified a contract, "we usually send a copy of that, at that time, for the International's approval."[11] But he went on to state his belief that "[i]t is still a contract on the local level, whether the International approves or not, actually," and that an agreement signed by a local and an employer is, without more, a "legal and binding" contract.

The new constitution provides, in a section entitled "Collective Bargaining," part 2, chapter XIII, Ch. 13.2, that "All collective bargaining contracts shall be subject to approval by the International President." (Emphasis added.) The General Counsel argues that the sentence does not require that every contract must be submitted for approval, and "it does not state that the contract is rendered nugatory if the International President does not approve it." Support for this contention may be found in the argument that a clearly mandatory provision could easily have been written: e.g., "All collective-bargaining agreements must be approved by the International President." That the drafters were capable of such clarity is found in the immediately following provision (Ch. 13.3): "No agreement shall be entered into with any employer who has establishments within the jurisdiction of more than one Local Union without consultation with the International President." (Emphasis added.) Not only is this prohibition more plainly mandatory, but its substance implies that locals may, in other situations than the one cited, "enter into" agreements that are immediately effective.

Respondent, in arguing on brief that, prior to the merger, Local 61–C "was completely subordinate to and controlled by the International," asserts, inter alia, that IPGCU "approved or disapproved local collective bargaining agreements ([G.C. Exh. 33], Art. XIII, §§ 1-3)." The cited provisions, under the heading "Contracts and Agreements," read:

> Section 1. No subordinate union or member thereof or any person shall enter into negotiations in the name or on behalf of the International Union for the purpose of making any contract or agreement with any organization, corporation, association, firm or individual, which may, in any manner, affect the interests of the International Union, or of any subordinate union thereof, or of any person affiliated therewith, without having been first authorized by the Board of Directors.
> Section 2. When negotiations involving [sic] the formulation of an agreement or contract which may effect [sic] the interest of the International Union, the subordinate union or person desiring to enter into such negotiations shall submit to each member of the Board of Directors a complete statement of all the facts pertaining thereto. Each member of the Board shall, thereupon, without delay, examine the same and forward his decision thereon to the President. The President shall notify such subordinate union or person of the decision of the Board of Directors.
> Section 3. No member or subordinate union shall act as an agent for or on behalf of the International Union without specific prior written authorization of the Board of Directors.

Assuming that the foregoing applies to bargaining agreements in the first place, a literal reading of this language would have only prohibited a local from "enter[ing] into negotiations" without authorization from the former IPGCU board. Although, as noted, Respondent concedes that the IPGCU constitution vested in the board a right of approval or disapproval of bargaining agreements, a board reading of the language is needed to reach that conclusion. On the other hand, if the provisions should be construed to mean that the IPGCU board had to preliminarily approve the main themes of bargaining proposals, it could arguably be termed retention of the right of approval.

Section 4 of the same article clearly seems to have assumed local autonomy in negotiating agreements:

> Joint Local Agreements
> Section 4. Where there are two or more subordinate unions in any jurisdiction in the book and job branch or in the newspaper branch of the business, no local contract or agreement shall be entered into without every effort being made for all such subordinate unions to join them.

But whatever inferences the reader may choose to draw about IPGCU's right of approval from the foregoing provisions, the remainder of the old constitution indicates that IPGCU did, in several respects, limit the authority of locals to agree to certain terms of employment. (See, e.g., G.C. Exh. 33 at 58, 134–137 (all local wage agreements shall not exceed a 3-year duration unless waived by the president; no contract shall require or permit any member to work in excess of 7-1/2 hours per day or 5 days in a week; no regular shifts shall exceed the established number of hours constituting a day's or night's work; and similar requirements).)

[10] On brief, in an effort to show that the GCIU "established greater authority over the local after the merger and permitted less local autonomy than had the IPGCU," Respondent erects a strawman and then flails away at it. At 12–13 of its brief, Respondent asserts that "whereas the IPGCU had not disapproved one of Local 61's requests for strike sanctions in recent memory, the GCIU leadership has disapproved one of two such requests submitted by Local 61–C since the merger. (Tr. 26.)" At Br. 18 fn. 8, Respondent refers to this as "increased review and disapproval of local requests for strike sanctions." At 21, Respondent states that "whereas the IPGCU had never disapproved a Local 61 request for sanctions, the GCIU disapproved such a request immediately following the merger." These assertions overlook Brown's further testimony, on the same transcript page cited by Respondent, that the sanction was disapproved "on procedural grounds" because Local 61–C had "asked for strike sanction before it was voted by the membership, and at Tr. 27, that once the procedural defect was corrected, the sanction was granted.

[11] Subsequently, he testified that he "think[s]" the Local has always submitted a copy to the International since the merger, and that he "always" did prior to the merger.

There is considerable ambiguity in the record on this topic; I shall return to it later.

It appears that the grievance procedures between Local 61–C and its related employers have remained the same since the merger. Brown testified that the only arbitration in which the Union has been involved in the last 20 years was handled by International representative Callahan; but he was "[n]ot real sure whether it was before or after the merger."[12] Brown asked Callahan to represent the local because he himself had never handled an arbitration.

In size of membership, the merger has had no discernible effect on Local 61–C. Respondent states on brief:

> [O]fficials of Local 61–C have discussed the possibility of merging with at least one other GCIU local in the Baltimore area. (Tr. 61.) Such mergers are being encouraged by the International (G.C. Exh. 34), and additional mergers can be expected to occur in the Baltimore area during the "transition period." (Tr. 68–73.)

The first sentence is accurate so far as it goes. Brown testified that he had talked about merger at some unstated time to one of the officers of Local 41–S (with which Local 61–C was sharing offices), but got no "feedback" from the other officers of Local 41–S to whom he had sent materials on the subject. The matter was "just dropped."[13] The first clause of the second sentence is also accurate, but could use some amplification: The merger agreement states that locals will be encouraged to merge, but, "in recognition of the principle of Local autonomy and self-government, such mergers will not be compelled."

The final clause, however, can only represent Respondent's personal sentiment because it does not reflect Brown's testimony at the pages cited (or anywhere else). The closest Brown came to the notion of "mergers can be expected to occur in the Baltimore area" was the somewhat less affirmative "Anything is possible." There is no basis for this speculation so far as Local 61–C is concerned or, for that matter, any other Baltimore local.

Respondent contends on brief that the "trial and appeal procedure for IPGCU members has been entirely revamped under the GCIU constitution" (G.C. Exh. 34, art. XXI). Although the relevant provisions have been changed, it does not appear to me that, insofar as they affect members of Local 61–C, any significant substantive changes have been made.

There are some differences in approach. The new constitution expands the due-process rights of the charged member by, in effect, requiring two pretrial investigations—one by the local executive board and one by the membership. It also makes final a trial board's finding of innocent. Under the old system, a member could be expelled only by a two-thirds membership vote, but now a majority is sufficient. On a finding of guilty, the local membership has now lost the authority to increase the penalty recommended by the trial board. The channels of appeal at the national level have decreased from three to two.

The modifications of the former IPGCU constitution trial and appeal procedure do not seem sufficiently radical to render Local 61–C a new and different local; nor are they the kind of changed circumstances that would appear to bring into play the Supreme Court's standard (NLRB v. Financial Institution Employees, supra) of whether the reorganization makes it "unclear whether a majority of employees continue to support the reorganized union."

The Respondent also asserts that "[t]he new GCIU General Board has new authority to receive charges directly without prior local rulings . . . ([G.C. Exh. 34], Art. XXI, § 7)." The reference is probably to section 2 of article XXI, which apparently contemplates that certain charges can be filed with the general board (while the provision is not very clear, presumably those charges that may be "brought" by the general board—"Against an Officer or Other Official of a Local," "Against a Local," and "Against a Grouping"—are the ones that should also "be filed with . . . the General Board)." Although the IPGCU constitution contained no comprehensive provision relating to charges received and acted on by its governing board of directors, that constitution made references to action taken by the board that would undoubtedly have been board initiated (e.g., G.C. Exh. 33 at 29, art. V, sec. 3: Board has "power to suspend or revoke the charter of a subordinate union, or conference, or council, or to suspend or cancel the cards of members thereof for violations of the laws of the International Union"; p. 40, art. VI, sec. 16: subordinate unions failing to honor a traveler's card "shall be subject to a fine of $50 in the first instance"; pp. 59–60, art. XIV, sec. 1; any local failing to obtain strike sanction "may be disciplined by fine, suspension, or the revocation of its charter, as the Board of Directors may determine"). Manifestly, some level higher than the local one had to be authorized to entertain certain kinds of charges; in this respect, the new constitution is not materially different from the one that governed the old IPGCU.

Respondent's brief stresses the changes wrought by the merger at the national level. The merger agreement provides that "there will be a need for all of the Officers of the two organizations during the early years of merger, but that ultimately, the number of positions can and shall be reduced." It goes on to mandate that, as the "first officers" of the GCIU, the incumbent president of the GAIU would become president of the new union; the president of the IPGCU would become "President Emeritus," an essentially advisory position, of the GCIU; the IPGCU secretary-treasurer would occupy the same position in the merged organization; the GAIU secretary-treasuer would fill the office of GCIU recording and financial secretary; the GAIU executive vice president would hold that office with the GCIU (but the office would be eliminated for the term beginning 4 June 1984; however, in 1988, the office of recording secretary would become executive vice president), and of the 15 vice presidents, 8 of them would be incumbent IPGCU vice presidents and the other 7 would be incumbent GAIU vice presidents. These officials were to serve on the general board of the GCIU; the remainder of the general board included "the fourteen incumbent Councillors from among the ranks of the GAIU" and "[f]ourteen General Board members elected on a regional basis from among the ranks of the IP & GCU."

[12] Despite this testimony, Respondent states on brief that "[t]he GCIU . . . has handled the only arbitration that Local 61–C has had under its collective-bargaining agreements."

[13] In addition to Locals 61–C and 41–S, there are two other GCIU locals in Baltimore. Brown testified that "[t]here is very little in competition with each other."

Thus, the GCIU general board, the central governing body of the Union between conventions, was to be composed of an equal number of representatives of each of the merging unions; and the merger agreement provided that as the number of officers and general board members was gradually reduced, "Every effort will be made to maintain an equal balance in the number of members of the general board from each of the merging organizations during the transition period. In any event, regardless of any imbalance in actual numbers, there shall always be equality of voting strength between the members of the General Board representing each of the merging organizations during the transition period." (G.C. Exh. 34 at 4, sec. 12.) The offices delineated above were to be filled only from the ranks of the respective merged organizations until 1992 when there would be only 10 offices (the president, the secretary-treasurer, and 8 vice presidents) that would be filled without regard to prior affiliation.

The merger agreement recognizes a need for the two memberships to feel secure that the amalgamated union would continue to represent each of them fairly and forcefully, as the foregoing provision implies. Although respecting this perception, the agreement at the same time phases in through the transition period an organization that will, eventually, achieve "the ultimate and strongly desired goal of one International Union for the entire graphic communications industry, with greater job security and economic prosperity for the thousands of men and women who contribute their labor to produce the diverse quality products of the industry."

The initial governing structure of GCIU was, as noted, 20 officers from the 2 Unions (to be gradually reduced to 10 officers by June 1992) and a "General Board" composed of those officers and 28 other members equally divided between the Unions (to be reduced by June 1992 to 12 such other general board members). It is difficult to agree with Respondent that the merger agreement "established an entirely new governing structure for the GCIU from that which previously governed the IPGCU."

The latter Union was governed by a president, a secretary-treasurer, and eight vice presidents (the latter being required to have specific kinds of craft-oriented membership, such as one vice president with a "commercial journeyman membership," one with a "newspaper journeyman membership," etc.).[14] These 10 officers constituted the IPGCU board of directors, which exercised dominant power over the Union between conventions.

There are differences between the two kinds of administrations. The new governing board of GCIU consists not only of officers, but also of other members of the two Unions. Since the latter seats are equally divided during the transition period, the change seems to be of little importance. In addition, the GCIU would not, by 1992, be selecting vice presidents by any kind of craft identification, as did the IPGCU; however, for the 1984 election, the eight IPGCU candidates for the offices of vice president were nominated according to their membership in the craft-related locals as had been spelled out in the former IPGCU constitution (G.C. Exh. 34 at 15, art. III, sec. 5). Thus, the terms of office being 4 years, the new constitution continued the practice of vice presidential craft representation from 1983 until at least 1988 for the eight vice presidents of IPGCU origin. Unlike the IPGCU constitution, however, the nonofficer general board members of GCIU were to be selected on a regional basis. (G.C. Exh. 34 at 18-19, art. X, sec. 2, A-E.)

The significance to the IPGCU members of such changes seems questionable. On cross-examination, Local 61-C President Brown admitted that just before the merger, he stated to his members that he "felt that the commercial section of the IPGCU wound up being underrepresented on that General Board." The "commercial" vice president on the IPGCU board of directors had been but 1 (or at most 2, if the Canadian vice president was "commercial") person out of 10, however, so it is hard to conceive that any potential additional dilution could have seemed to be a serious matter.[15] It should furthermore be noted that the new constitution has made special provision for the preservation of craft identification and control in the following paragraph found in the "Conventions" article of the new constitution (G.C. Exh. 34 at 28, art. XVII, sec. 13):

> Section 13. The Commercial, Paper Handler, Specialty, Newspaper, Stereotyper and Electrotyper Branches shall each have full jurisdiction in all matters pertaining to regulation and control of its own branch of the printing industry, insofar as the interest of other crafts is not affected; and when the Chairman and Secretary of the caucus held by the Branch certify over their signatures in the Convention that such a proposition has been adopted in caucus, it shall be announced by the chair and shall become the law of the International Union, unless two-thirds (2/3) of the delegates vote against such amendment.

[14] The IPGCU constitution had provided that chartered locals be designated as "commercial, newspaper, assistants, paper handlers, stereotyper and electrotyper and specialty." G.C. Exh. 33 at 3, art. I, sec. 6.

[15] As earlier stated, Brown sent a letter to his members in April 1983 urging approval of the merger.

This provision is taken verbatim from the former IPGCU constitution, where it resided as the second section of an article entitled "Legislation" (the first section of which authorized the International to change the constitution and laws as it deemed necessary). (G.C. Exh. 33 at 69–70, art. XVIII.) It was not referred to at the hearing. On its face, it seems to both preserve the vitality of craft identity and to repose a great deal of power in the separate branches to regulate their crafts. In addition, chapter XVII, page 53 et seq., of the new constitution contains, under the heading "Practices Of The Former IP&GCU Unique To Their Respective Divisions," detailed provisions governing the work and benefits of the members of the various craft locals.

The extent to which the jurisdiction of the GCIU has been expanded, if any, in contrast to that of the IPGCU, is difficult to ascertain. The new constitution reproduces verbatim the first significant clause of the former IPGCU jurisdiction provision by stating: "The trade jurisdiction of this International Union shall cover every aspect of printing, publishing, graphic and other forms of communications and related fields of operations." The new constitution continues, however, "including but not limited to all work processes, operations and products directly or indirectly in whole or in any part incident to, associated with or related to lithography, offset, photoengraving, letterpress, gravure, intaglio, bookbinding and finishing, paper converting, and all workers wherever located and however described working in any industry whatsoever." In contrast, the rest of the former IPGCU jurisdiction clause seems more limited: "The work jurisdiction of this International Union shall cover all employees of private and public employers including printing, offset, intaglio and gravure pressmen, assistants, flymen, paper handlers, printing specialties and paper products workers, ink and roller makers, circulation workers, stereotypers, electrotypers and workers in associated operations."

The words "lithography," "photoengraving," and "letterpress" do not appear in IPGCU's clause; these processes all constitute printing," which does appear there. "Bookbinding and finishing" and "paper converting" were not expressly included in IPGCU's provision, but may well fall under "paper products workers" or "workers in associated operations." Although certain specific job titles (e.g., ink and roller makers stereotypers) found in the old IPGCU constitution do not appear in the new clause, they must surely be covered by the board language of the new clause "all work processes, operations and products directly or indirectly in whole or in any part incident to, associated with or related to."[16] Although the new constitution refers, finally, to "all workers wherever located and however described working in any industry whatsoever," I very much doubt that the GCIU intends a literal interpretation of that phrase to include, e.g., fishermen and poultry eviscerators. The preamble of the new constitution states, "This International Union is part of and dedicated to the trend toward the formation of one Union in the graphic communications industry" (emphasis added), and thereafter refers to "our industry" and "the growth and expansion of the graphic communications industry."

It is interesting to note that under neither constitution has Local 61 sought to duplicate the range of the respective constitutional clauses. Prior to the merger, the relevant provisions of Local 61's bylaws provided jurisdiction over "all printing pressmen, assistants, apprentices, and all offset pressmen, assistants, and preparatory workers employed in the industry in the territorial jurisdiction above described, except those employed in newspaper printing pressrooms." The changes proposed by Local 61–C to its bylaws after the merger afforded jurisdiction over "all pressmen, assistants, offset preparatory workers, duplicator operators, bindery, specialty, art, typesetting office workers, or any other workers in departments organized by this local and all registered apprentices in the various crafts employed in a particular plant in the territorial jurisdiction described above."[17] It can be seen that while Local 61–C attempted to expand its jurisdiction after the merger to specify certain coverage not previously named, it did not, just as it had not pre-GCIU, try to make its jurisdiction expressly coextensive with that of the respective International constitutions. Brown testified that the present jurisdictional clauses of the four Baltimore locals "includ[e] each other's employees," but Local 61–C has "not organized anyone in that line . . . . We just made it a possibility. If we do, we are covered."

The changes made here are not substantial. They arguably expand the potential jurisdiction of Local 61–C which, it seems, would be a more congenial modification in the eyes of the membership than a contraction, and yet the changes have not loosened the bonds of Local 61–C to the graphic communications industry.

Respondent argues, "General administration, including servicing of local unions, organizing and legal activity, was also merged, with a mandate that such services be reduced [G.C. Exh. 34, sec. 6]." In point of fact, there was no "mandate" to "reduce services." The merger agreement simply provides that the foregoing functions "are just a few areas wherein economic efficiencies can be effectively introduced," a matter to be studied by a committee of the top officers.[18]

[16] As earlier noted, the new constitution expressly refers to the election of ex-IPGCU vice presidents in 1984 from such "divisions" as "Paperhandler," "Stereotyper" and "Specialty," and also to permanent "caucases" of those crafts.

[17] Whether these changes are in effect is unclear. Local 61–C submitted them to GCIU. In a response from recording secretary Norton in 1984, Norton appeared to be saying that it was too soon to tell whether the proposed clauses would be in conflict with the clauses of other Baltimore locals, and that any such conflict would be resolved by the International president. Brown thought that the changes had taken effect.

[18] It was, however, contemplated, as one of the areas of economic efficiency, that the number of International representatives servicing the GCIU locals would be reduced by attrition. As of 1 July 1983, there were 33 International representatives on the GCIU payroll. Since the merger, death and retirement have reduced the number of representatives by 15, and only 3 new representatives have been hired, leaving a total of 21 representatives. Since the representatives of each premerger union presumably covered the same territory, there was most likely a considerable amount of duplicative travel and expense that has now been eliminated; and, since in 1983 these employees earned roughly $35,000 each, the economic value of merger in such areas becomes apparent.

IPGCU's constitution had provided for the establishment by at least two local unions, with board of directors' approval, of "conferences," "councils," and "joint councils," and the board of directors could also charter "regional, national or other conferences" of locals; locals apparently could affiliate with these groups at their discretion. (G.C. Exh. 33 at 5–6, art. I, secs. 10–15.[19]) The merger agreement allowed these groupings to "continue to operate in the same manner as they did at the date of merger," but stated that the general board would not "expand the funding for Councils or Conferences, or charter new Councils or Conferences except in the case of consolidation or merger." The effect of these provisions, as testified to by GCIU Secretary-Treasurer McNally, was to leave existing councils and conferences (of both IPGCU and GAIU) in place and even capable of increasing their affiliations, but they could not have an "expansion in funds."

The record is silent regarding the amount of funding that the board of directors had ever furnished to the councils and conferences. The matter, however, appears to have been of no moment to Local 61–C, since there is no evidence that it has ever been a member of any such council or conference,[20] and there is no reason to believe that the freezing of funds to such groups would ever have any material effect on Local 61–C.[21]

Respondent argues that the merger agreement "established new procedures for delegate selection and voting representation at the governing international convention." The agreement provided that for the upcoming 1984 convention, voting would be weighted to equalize the voting strength of the two former groups. For the 1988 convention and thereafter, the number of delegates would be based on the number of members in a local according to a formula that differed from that in the old IPGCU constitution, but "[t]he principle of equal voting strength shall continue in force throughout the transition period, regardless of the number of actual delegates." (G.C. Exh. 34 at 7, sec. 16.)

It appears, from the formula contained in the old IPGCU constitution, that Local 61–C would have been entitled to about three delegates to an IPGCU convention. (G.C. Exh. 33 at 47, sec. 1.) How meaningful these 3 delegates would have been at a convention representing about 91,000 other IPGCU members is conjectural. Under the new constitution, in 1988 and thereafter, a local's delegate or delegates are entitled to vote on behalf all the local's members. (G.C. Exh. 34 at 29, art. XVII, sec. 17,C,IV.)

In the end, it does not appear to be accurate to speak of "new procedures for delegate selection" for the convention; the procedures differed, but still were essentially the same. There was, however, new "voting representation," in the sense that more people would be voting at GCIU conventions than at IPGCU conventions. If that fact were sufficient to change the "identity" of a local, then all mergers of International unions would automatically destroy all their subordinate locals' "identity." The Board has never so held.

As Respondent points out, unlike the former IPGCU constitution, the new constitution contains a "Code of Ethics," which imposes certain standards of conduct on officers, agents, representatives, and trustees of the various constituent bodies and benefit funds of GCIU, and requires the establishment of a committee of ethics in each local, together with annual reports. These provisions have no direct impact on the rank-and-file memberships of the locals, and many of the standards of conduct are already applicable by virtue of the common law and the Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act. Moreover, one sentence of the IPGCU's old obligation of membership "I further promise that I will not wrong a brother member or see him wronged if it is in my power to prevent" arguably covers most of the fiduciary responsibilities spelled out in detail in the Code of Ethics.

A basic contention made by Respondent is that the merger constituted a "takeover" of IPGCU by GAIU.[22] One of the more specific allegations made in this catagory has to do with the finances of the parent organizations.

Respondent asserts on brief that "[p]rior to the merger, the IPGCU general fund contained more than two million dollars while the GAIU general fund ran a deficit of $16,276 (R. Exh. 106)." The last-named exhibit is a memorandum to IPGCU board members dated 1 November 1982.[23] Financial statements for GAIU (G.C. Exh. 36) as of 30 June 1983 tell a somewhat different story. As of that time, GAIU had in its general fund cash resources of $43,584 and liquid investments of $582,932; however, for the 13 months ended 30 June 1983, the general fund had shown a loss of $552,888 (compared with a loss of $168,822 for the year ending 31 May 1982). Nonetheless, GAIU's balance sheet for the general fund as of 30 June 1983 showed a net balance of $330,010.

IPGCU, however, also displayed some weaknesses in its general fund for the year ending 30 June 1983, showing excess expenses of $96,205. But IPGCU's apparently strong general fund balance of that date was $4,597,456.

[19] GCIU Secretary-Treasurer McNally, however, testified to an instance in which the IPGCU board had "turned down" an effort by a Denver local to affiliate with a California council, because "it was too far away."

[20] McNally testified that councils are formed to assist small locals, some as diminutive as eight members. Local 61–C, on the other hand, has for some years had nearly 200 members.

[21] The Local has, however, continued its premerger affiliations with four union and craft organizations, such as the Metropolitan Baltimore Council of AFL–CIO Unions and the Allied Printing Trades of Baltimore. Local 61–C's representatives to these four groups have been President Brown and, with one change in 1983 or 1984, essentially the same individuals since at least 1981.

[22] On brief, Respondent has renewed its complaint about my refusal to grant a delay so that it might subpoena GCIU Vice President James J. Mitchell, a resident of New Jersey, to testify (1) about the history of the authority of the GCIU and IPGCU governing boards to pass on proposed affiliation of locals with councils, and (2) about Mitchell's opinion that some persons in the new organization desire to erase from it all vestiges of the IPGCU. I found that the first objective concerned a remote matter, particularly as it related to Local 61–C, and the second would have involved the hearing in a useless controversy about the existence of a conspiracy. I see no reason to believe that my ruling was erroneous.

[23] It was evidently this document to which GCIU Secretary-Treasurer McNally referred when he agreed at trial that the GAIU general fund showed a $16,000 deficit "prior to the merger."

Analysis of the copious financial statements seems undesirable in this lengthy opinion, but two points may be worth making. One is that the 1983 GAIU general fund balance sheet lists as liablilities "Inter-fund payables" of $2,086,349, derived from general fund debts to other funds operated by the GAIU; it also shows a separate loan payable to the GAIU mortuary fund of $800,352. The IPGCU financial statements, on the other hand, note that "All interfund transactions and balances have been eliminated." (G.C. Exh. 40 at 5, item 1.) Thus, comparison of the general fund balances of the two Unions as of the merger date is not possible.

Secondly, the GAIU owned a headquarters building that it had purchased in 1971 for $3,625,000; at the time of the merger, it was valued on a cost basis less depreciation at almost $3 million. An appraisal on 9 December 1982, however, valued the building at $16.5 million. (G.C. Exh. 36 at 10-11, item 2.) After the merger, this building would be commonly owned by all GCIU members. The IPGCU, on the other hand, owned no real estate and was renting its headquarters under a lease arrangement that would rise from $330,744 in 1984 to $438,460 in 1987.

The essential problem with the GAIU, McNally reported in his November 1982 memorandum, was its comparative inefficiency, causing a cash-flow problem. There is no reason to believe that the two unions did not, in fact, as stated in the merger agreement, "anticipate accelerating financial stress during the immediate period ahead" and did not sincerely share the opinion that "economic efficiencies can be effectively introduced, which will moderate the financial burden of the merged membership." (G.C. Exh. 34 at 2, item 6.) Subsequent to the merger, 36 employees have left the GCIU payroll and only 8 new employees have been hired. Annual GCIU excess expenses in the general fund account dropped from $1,358,988 for the year ending 30 June 1984 to $326,109 for the year ending 30 June 1986 (G.C. Exhs. 37 to 39).

Another aspect of the "takeover" alleged by Respondent is that the merged organization, including Local 61-C in this litigation, is now represented by Delson & Gordon, GAIU's former law firm. Local 61-C President Brown "thought" he recalled that the director of organizing for the International had made the decision for his Local to be represented by the firm, although the Local had not previously been represented by it, but he seemed to be attributing the need for a new attorney to the fact that the Baltimore, Maryland attorney who had previously represented the Local was no longer available.

It is at least clear that the choice of Delson & Gordon was, as Brown testified, directed by higher GCIU authority, but the issue does not seem very consequential insofar as the continuation of the Local's identity is concerned. The Local's regular attorney left town; the former GAIU counsel was retained because counsel was needed. New legal representation is, obviously, unavoidable in such circumstances. Moreover, that GCIU has employed GAIU's former counsel as its attorneys seems to no more demonstrate a "takeover" by GAIU than the fact that GCIU now employs as its auditor the firm that used to work for IPGCU demonstrates the primacy of the latter.[24]

Respondent advances an argument that the provisions of the GCIU constitution assigning the offices of president, recording and financial secretary, and executive vice president during the transition period only to former GAIU members is violative of section 401(e) of the Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act. (LMRDA), 29 U.S.C. § 481(e).[25]

Record evidence shows that the U.S. Department of Labor warned GCIU International President Kenneth Brown in 1983 that the transitional constitutional restrictions on the eligibility of general officers would "constitute a violation of Title IV of the LMRDA, and subject those officer elections to challenge, pursuant to Section 402 of the LMRDA." Nonetheless, an election held in 1984 apparently went unchallenged. Minutes of a general board meeting in February 1987 state that Vice President Mitchell had written the president that the procedures "may be in violation of the law" and that if the general board did not act to assure compliance with the statute, Mitchell would file a complaint. The president noted that the same transitional procedures had been used by "all the former International Unions that now make up the GCIU" and that if a complaint were filed regarding the 1988 elections, the matter would be dealt with at that time.

Respondent argues, first, that the continuing dispute over the eligibility requirements "makes it impossible to state with certainty that no additional changes will take place in the near future which could further affect the union's claim to continuity." However, if a complaint is filed in 1988, under any scenario the most that could happen would be that a special election would be held (before the unrestricted 1992 elections roll around) without such built-in preferences. That sort of result, however, would hardly militate in favor of Respondent's claim that the continuity of Local 61-C could be even more attenuated by future events. In 1992, as previously pointed out, the union-origin restrictions will disappear.

[24] Respondent urges that President Brown not be credited in certain areas "in view of the repeated contradictions between his testimony on cross-examination and both his direct testimony and his sworn prehearing affidavit." As an example, Brown testified on direct examination that the merger brought about only a few changes in the Local's bylaws: that the Local was "instructed" to change the name, but that the modifications of the jurisdiction and "form of organization" clauses were adopted by the Local on its own initiative. Respondent asserts on brief that Brown wrote in his affidavit that "there had been no changes in Local 61's 'bylaws, officers, or dues' following the merger (Tr. 45-46)."

The language purportedly quoted by Respondent on brief does not appear in the transcript. It does not even appear in the affidavit (at the hearing, I felt it unnecessary to receive the affidavit because I was led to believe that any inconsistencies had been brought out in the testimony; I now reverse my ruling). The affidavit states that "[t]he same officers, local dues structure, Local Constitution and Bylaws and geographical jurisdiction that existed prior to the merger between the IP&GCU and GAIU were retained by Local 61 after the effective date of the merger." The record does not show these assertions to be untrue: the bylaws were not changed until a membership meeting on 23 October 1983, and then in the relatively minor manner earlier noted; the date of resignation of Local Vice President Hosza in or around 1983 is not clear, but he retired perhaps in May as a result of disability, not the merger, and was evidently replaced soon after the date of the merger by a sitting member of the Local's executive board; and, as Brown expressly pointed out at the hearing, he had said in the affidavit that there had been no change in the "dues structure," not the "dues."

It appeared to me that Brown was doing his best at the hearing to recall some relatively ancient history. He probably did not recollect everything accurately, and he demonstrated some unfamiliarity with the details of both the old and new constitutions, but he tried. I was impressed by his admission that he told the members that the "commercial" section would be "underrepresented" on the new board. To the extent that my conclusions here rest on Brown's credibility, I view his testimony with favor except when the evidence otherwise shows that his memory failed him.

[25] The statute requires that "every member in good standing shall be eligible to be a candidate and to hold office (subject to section 504 of this title and to reasonable qualifications uniformly imposed."

As the second prong of this argument, Respondent asserts that the "illegal and discriminatory structure also constitutes an independent ground for Respondent's refusal to bargain, as the Board has in the past revoked the certifications of unions engaged in unlawful, invidious discrimination," citing Metal Workers Local 1, 147 NLRB 1573 (1964), and Handy Andy, Inc., 228 NLRB 447, 456 (1977). Respondent contends that in Handy Andy, the Board failed to act on the allegations of union discrimination "solely because they were raised in a representation proceeding, rather than in an "appropriate unfair labor practice proceeding," and that the present case falls into the latter category. Respondent misreads Handy Andy. The Board at least three times (228 NLRB at 451, 453) stated that it was addressing the question of raising a union discrimination defense in a "certification and bargaining order" context, and also made singularly clear that it will entertain such an issue only in those "unfair labor practice proceedings" in which the union stands formally accused of discrimination. Id. at 455-456.

Moreover, I very much doubt that the type of "discrimination" under discussion would, in any event, be that contemplated by the Board in Handy Andy. Nor is it clear that the reservation of designated national positions for members of each union for a transitory period in a merger situation is violative of 29 U.S.C. § 481(e). Respondent offers no citations to support its claim of illegality. In Wirtz v. Hotel & Restaurant Employees Union Local 6, 391 U.S. 492 (1968), the Court found unreasonable a bylaw that made 97 percent of the membership ineligible to run for office, pointing out that "[u]nduly restrictive candidacy qualifications can result in the abuses of entrenched leadership that the LMRDA was expressly enacted to curb" (id. at 499). The present circumstances do not appear to present a case of "entrenched leadership"; in any event, if by some chance a determinative finding should be made prior to 1992, when the union-affiliation restrictions terminate, that the restrictive provision is unlawful, an article in the GCIU constitution would invalidate it. (G.C. Exh. 34 at 47, art. XXXIII.)

Because it refers to the matter at four different places in its brief, Respondent obviously attaches some significance to the fact that "Local 61-C's office address following the merger also was different from that of Local 61 [Tr. 46-47]." The cited source makes clear, however, that the reason for the relocation, which in fact did not occur until "a year and a half ago," was that the original office building was "torn down," which makes it somewhat difficult to comprehend why this change might seem merger-related.

IV. ANALYSIS AND CONCLUSION

In NLRB v. Financial Institution Employees, supra, 475 U.S. at 203, which involved the affiliation of an independent union with a national union, the Court made the broad statement that "[i]n many cases, a majority of employees will continue to support the union despite any changes precipitated by affiliation," citing with apparent approval the even broader statement in American Range Lines, 13 NLRB 139, 154 (1939), that affiliation "has no probative value concerning the employees' choice of the [union] as their collective bargaining representative."

As earlier discussed, this latter fiat is more expansive than the Board has since been willing to be. And even the Court in Financial Institution Employees accepted that if changes in the affiliating entity "are sufficiently dramatic to alter the union's identity, affiliation may raise a question of representation." Id. at 206. The Court decisively disagreed with the employer, however, that "affiliation necessarily changes the union's identity."

In so stating, the Court appeared to put in question the position of the Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit, which, while examining the facts in each such case, has generally viewed the superimposition of a national structure on a formerly independent union as almost inevitably creating a change in identity. See Sun Oil Co. of Pennsylvania, 228 NLRB 1072 1977), revd. 576 F.2d 553 (3d. Cir. 1978), and cases cited at 554. The Board has nonetheless persisted in holding that if the effects of the affiliation are such that the localized authority and character of the indendent are not significently impaired by the association with the International union, the baggage that always accompanies such affiliations (e.g., per capita taxes and other obligations to the adoptive parent) does not affect the essential identity of the former bargaining representative. Indeed, in New Orleans Public Service, 237 NLRB 919, 921 (1978), involving the affiliation of an independent with an International, the Board assumed "an entirely new set of bylaws . . . a new system of internal union discipline . . . . a different fee schedule, and that persons outside the unit may be involved in the removal of officers, the investigation of membership applications, the amount of initiation fees, and the expenditure of funds," but still found "no essential change in the identity of the bargaining representative" in view of the retention of various insignia of local control after the affiliation. Circuit courts have agreed: St. Vincent Hospital v. NLRB, 621 F.2d 1054 (10th Cir 1980); NLRB v. Insulfab Plastics, supra.

In the present case—a local already affiliated with an International union that merges with another International—the theoretical basis for concluding, in the Supreme Court's words in Financial Institution Employees, supra, that "it is unclear whether the reorganized union retains majority support," is considerably more narrow. Here the unit employees voted in the first instance to be represented by a labor organization that itself was under the governance of another larger organization; they chose to be part of a national structure, with all the added freight that such a relationship entails and portends. It thus cannot be said here, as it was in U.S. Steel Corp. v. NLRB, 457 F.2d 660, 664 (3d Cir. 1972), in which an independent became associated with a national union, "The very act of affiliation here is a commitment to change in the fulcrum of union control and representation."

Although the GCIU constitution was a new one (blending, however, many provisions of both former constitutions), "[t]he factual determination at issue revolves not around superficial criteria such as . . . organizational differences in the national unions of which they become a part." J. Ray McDermott & Co. v. NLRB 571 F.2d 850, 857 (5th Cir. 1978). In cases like this one, the Board (consistently) and the courts (frequently) have paid little attention to the fact that the merger of international unions necessarily wrought changes in the governing entity. When the International Brotherhood of Bookbinders merged in 1972 with the Lithographers and Photoengravers International Union to become the GAIU, and an employer raised the issue of the changed identity of a local of the former Bookbinders, neither the administrative law judge nor the Board even made reference to the new constitution, Pearl Bookbinding Co., 206 NLRB 834 (1973), and the Court of Appeals for the First Circuit, in NLRB v. Pearl Bookbinding Co., 517 F.2d 1108, 1111 (1975), other than summarizing the Respondent's argument predicated on the local being "subordinate to a new international with a new president and constitution," concentrated entirely on those local factors reflecting a continuity of representation.

Similar superficial treatment by the Board was accorded the affiliation of Retail Clerks International Association and the Amalgamated Meat Cutters and Butcher Workmen of North America when, in 1979, they joined together as the United Food and Commercial Workers International Union. The Board briefly recited certain aspects of the merger agreement, such as the integration of the national officers of the two unions into a single hierarchy, the transfer of membership, property, rights, and obligations from both unions into the new one, the allowance of "some discrepancies" between the constitutions of the locals and that of the new organization, and the like, and concluded that the newborn organization and its locals succeeded to the representational rights of the merged organizations. Warehouse Groceries Management, 254 NLRB 252, 255-256 (1981), enfd. per curiam 683 F.2d 418 (1st Cir. 1982).

In the instant case, there were no changes in the higher echelon governance by virture of the merger that could be deemed to seriously raise the question whether a majority of the Respondent's bargaining unit employees would continue to desire Local 61-C as their bargaining representative. And at the local level, Local 61-C essentially retained its longstanding identity. Respondent argues that "[l]ack of local autonomy following an international merger is one of the most significant factors leading to a Board finding of change in identity." In my view, however, the proper question in a case like this one is not whether there is a "lack" of local authority, but whether the preexisting local authority, with which the unit employees had presumptively been satisfied, has substantially changed for the worse. The record shows that almost all the same officers (with an exception unrelated to the merger) continued to serve after the merger; the Local's bylaws remained virtually the same, with a few changes that are, as a practical matter, of no consequence; the dues structure, including the procedure for increasing dues, remained intact, as did the per capita payments to the parent union; the Local's assets remained its own; the negotiating committees stayed basically the same, with only normal, nonmerger-related turnover; and strike sanctions are still, as they were prior to the merger, subject to higher level approval.[26]

Only one factor gives me pause, but not for long. As previously discussed, Respondent believes that under the IPGCU constitution, the International had "approved or disapproved local collective bargaining agreements." If that were true, and the GCIU simply continued to exercise similar authority, the merger would have effected no change in the relative autonomy of Local 61-C. If, however, the members of the Local possessed the authority before the merger, but did not thereafter, to finally consummate their own bargaining agreements, a question of continuation of identity would be raised.

In previous discussion of this issue, it appeared, in my view, that the former IPGCU constitution did not require submission of bargaining agreements for prior clearance by the International, but did impose various requirements that must be included in the agreements; failure to win employer acquiescence in such provisions would, I assume, have effectively precluded an IPGCU local from entering into agreements. The new GCIU constitution, which states that local agreements are "subject to approval" by the International president, may mean only that the president can intervene to prevent the execution of an agreement, and not that he must formally approve every contract before it takes effect; or it may mean the latter.

Brown was of little definitive help on this issue. He testified to his belief that once a local and an employer agree on a contract, it is "legal and binding." But he also said that he "thought" Local 61-C had "always" submitted contracts for International "approval," both before and after the merger. He maintained, however, that "it is still a contract on the local level, whether the International approves or not, actually." I note that Brown testified that he sends copies of "proposals" to the International to make sure the local is not violating any Federal law or International bylaw, and he may send copies of the consummated contracts to the International for the same purpose.

On the other hand, Respondent may be correct in asserting that the IPGCU International routinely approved or disapproved local bargaining agreements, based on knowledge Respondent would have acquired from an examination of the Union's records. At the hearing, counsel for the Union stated, in summarizing the documents provided to Respondent pursuant to a subpoena to the International, "We provided in response to specific paragraphs requesting information about such items, the strike sanction, contract approvals, documents discussing the merger." Counsel further stated that, from the files of 10 randomly selected Locals, "[f]ive from the former GAIU and five from the former IPGCU," the Union "provided files of the contract and research department, reflecting contract refusals, which was—approvals which was a stack about five inches high." Respondent did not contradict these representations, and the files thus produced may account for the position taken on brief that the former IPGCU approved or disapproved bargaining agreements.

[26] These facts render distinguishable the cases cited by Respondent, all of which (other than the Third Circuit cases) involved complete and new dominance over, or absorption of, one labor organization by another, e.g., Gas Service Co., 213 NLRB 932, 933 (1974), "a new and different labor organization with its own officers and a complete change in the representative."

Given the ambiguity of the evidence and of the "subject to approval" clause, as originally discussed above (compare G.C. Exh. 34 at 51, Ch. 13.2, with Ch. 13.3), together with the fact that the IPGCU constitution itself had imposed various limitations on the ability of locals to negotiate their own contracts with total independence, I am not persuaded that a sufficient showing of substantial change has been made on this issue. I might further note that the Board has not found a change in identity where, in addition to other constitutional restrictions and obligations assumed by an independent's affiliation with an International, the International did not permit its locals to sign bargaining agreements that failed to incorporate a prescribed national wage floor. Sun Oil Co., supra.

Accordingly, I conclude, as a matter of law, that the 1983 merger of the International unions did not cause a substantial change in the identity of Local 61-C and a consequent lack of continuity of representation by Local 61-C with respect to the Respondent's employees in the certified unit.

Sampson Steel and Supply, Inc. and Chauffeurs, Teamsters, Warehousemen, and Helpers Local Union No. 377. Case 8–RC–13666

June 30, 1988

DECISION AND ORDER REMANDING TO THE REGIONAL DIRECTOR

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS BABSON AND CRACRAFT

The National Labor Relations Board, by a three-member panel, has considered the objections to and the determinative challenges in an election held September 18, 1987, and the hearing officer's report recommending disposition of them. The election was conducted pursuant to a Stipulated Election Agreement.[1] The tally of ballots shows five for and four against the Petitioner, with two challenged ballots.

The Board has reviewed the record in light of the Employer's exceptions[2] and brief and the Petitioner's brief in response to the Employer's exceptions and adopts the hearing officer's findings,[3] conclusions, and recommendations only to the extent consistent herewith.

The only issue raised by the exceptions is the hearing officer's disposition of Norman Cunningham's ballot. The hearing officer rejected the Petitioner's contention that Cunningham was a statutory supervisor, but sustained its alternative position[4] that he is managerial and does not share a community of interest with unit employees. The Employer excepts. We find merit in the Employer's exceptions.

Cunningham was hired by the Employer in 1980. He had been a purchasing agent for a large steel manufacturer for 23 years and thereafter worked as warehouse manager for a different employer. Larry Herman, the Employer's president, met Cunningham while Cunningham was working for the other employer. When Herman started his own business,[5] he hired Cunningham to be his warehouse supervisor. As warehouse supervisor, Cunningham hired and fired employees and directed their work on a day-to-day basis.

In the spring of 1985, Larry Herman's son, Roger, became the warehouse supervisor[6] and Cunningham became a self-described jack-of-all trades.[7] Cunningham's duties include operating a lift truck, working in the pipe yard, making deliveries in the pickup truck, and running errands. According to Cunningham, his principal duty of driving the pickup truck requires several trips a week to take care of small and emergency customer needs. Cunningham also has the keys to the shop and the code to the Employer's alarm system. He opens the shop for the morning shift employees. In addition, Cunningham is responsible for preparing mileage reports and has a desk in the warehouse office where he prepares these reports. Cunningham testified that he spends from 15 to 20 minutes a day in the office.

Although Cunningham does not work a regular shift and adjusts his schedule to his assignments, sometimes working extra hours and at other times working a short day, he does work a 40-hour week. Unlike other employees, he does not punch a clock and is paid a salary. Like other employees, Cunningham makes use of a car owned by Mrs. Herman to run errands on the Employer's behalf. While Cunningham also has personal use of the car and drives it back and forth to work, this is because Cunningham had damaged his own car on the Employer's property. Cunningham held the Employer responsible for the damage. Rather than pay for repairing Cunningham's car Mr. and Mrs. Herman decided to allow Cunningham to use Mrs. Herman's car.

All the employees run errands for the Employer. However, the bulk of the errands are performed by Cunningham. Cunningham, unlike the other employees, has the authority to charge items to the

[1] The unit is:

> All warehousemen and drivers, excluding all office clerical employees, professional employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

[2] The Employer excepts to that portion of the hearing officer's report requiring that exceptions to the report be directly filed with the Board. This requirement is in accord with the requirements of Sec. 102.69(i) of the Board's Rules and Regulations. Accordingly, we find the Employer's exception to be without merit.

[3] In the absence of exceptions thereto, we adopt, pro forma, the hearing officer's recommendations that the objections be overruled and that the challenge to the ballot of Roger Churn be sustained.

[4] The Employer excepts to the hearing officer's reliance on the Petitioner's alternative argument that Cunningham is a managerial employee. It contends that the Regional Director limited the hearing in this case to Cunningham's alleged supervisory status and that by raising the managerial issue in her report after the record had been closed, the hearing officer prejudiced the Employer and denied it procedural due process. We find no merit in the Employer's exception. Counsel for the Petitioner in his opening remarks at the hearing asserted that Cunningham was managerial. The Employer's counsel did not raise an objection. Further, evidence with respect to Cunningham's managerial status was introduced by the Petitioner at the hearing, without objection. Witnesses were examined and cross-examined on the subject. In his closing statement counsel for the Petitioner reiterated the Petitioner's position that Cunningham is "either a supervisor or a managerial employee." Accordingly, we find that the Employer was sufficiently notified that Cunningham's status as a managerial employee was in issue and that under the circumstances the Employer was not prejudiced, taken by surprise, or otherwise denied procedural due process.

[5] The Employer maintains a warehouse from which it sells and delivers metal tube and pipe products.

[6] John Brown was also made warehouse supervisor in the spring of 1985. However, he ceased being warehouse supervisor in March 1987 and Roger Herman was the sole warehouse supervisor after that time.

Employer's charge accounts. These charges have sometimes exceeded $200, but those amounts are usually for recurring items such as motor oil for the trucks.[8] In addition, Cunningham can purchase items on his own volition to remedy supply shortages in the warehouse or office. These items can also be charged on Employer accounts but often Cunningham pays cash for the purchases and is reimbursed by the Employer. Other employees also purchase needed items such as kerosene and gasoline and then are reimbursed by the Employer.

Cunningham maintains a regular expense account which includes such items as gasoline, turnpike tickets, and meals while on the road. On the average he receives $200 a month for expenses. Also on Cunningham's expense account are "entertainment expenses." The Employer has encouraged Cunningham, in the course of making deliveries, to "entertain" customer purchasing agents by taking them to lunch. Cunningham obtains information about possible future orders and customer complaints, which he passes on to Larry Herman, but does not take customer orders, sign contracts, or remedy complaints. Larry Herman testified that these lunches constitute good public relations because of Cunningham's experience and reputation in the business. Although the Employer utilized Cunningham's past experience as a purchasing agent for Jones and Laughlin by seeking his advice prior to purchasing two large warehouse saws,[9] it is unclear whether Cunningham was advising the Employer on the desirability of the purchase or was simply along to aid in determining how to transport the saws to the Employer's facility. In any case, there is no evidence that this was a regular part of Cunningham's responsibilities.

In General Dynamics Corp., 213 NLRB 851, 857 (1974), the Board defined managerial employees as:

> . . . those who formulate and effectuate management policies by expressing and making operative the decisions of their employer, and those who have discretion in the performance of their jobs independent of their employer's established policy [footnote omitted].
> . . . managerial status is not conferred upon rank-and-file workers, or upon those who perform routinely, but rather is reserved for those in executive-type positions, those who are closely aligned with management as true representatives of management.

The hearing officer found Cunningham managerial relying on the fact that Cunningham had pledged the Employer's credit in making both routine and nonroutine purchases. She noted that the mere possession of authority to extend an employer's credit did not confer management status but found that Cunningham's ability to determine on his own the purchases to be made together with the fact that he had no express dollar limitation on his purchasing authority denoted the possession of "independent discretion." The hearing officer also found that the Employer's utilization of Cunningham's past experience and his business contacts by promoting lunches between Cunningham and customer purchasing agents and by its seeking Cunningham's assistance in the purchase of major machinery proved that the Employer viewed Cunningham as a managerial employee. The hearing office further found that Cunningham was responsible for gauging employee performance both at the shop and in his dealings with customers, and concluded that such responsibility signified a close alignment with management.

Cunningham is a jack-of-all-trades. He shifts continually to where he is needed and it is his responsibility to make certain that necessary supplies are purchased. His past experience and general expertise permit this flexibility. Cunningham's work and the purchases he makes, however, are not independent of the Employer's established policy but are essential to maintain an operational status quo. Thus while the Employer may have consulted Cunningham prior to the purchase of the two large saws and while he can at times pledge the Employer's credit for nonroutine items, his advice is that of a knowledgeable employee and his purchases are a routine part of his duty to maintain a supply inventory. They do not involve independent judgment, nor the exercise of independent discretion and are not indicia of managerial status.[10] Further, while Cunningham's lunches with the customer purchasing agents promoted business, they were mainly for information-gathering purposes and did not involve Cunningham in the formulation and effectuation of Employer policies.[11] Accordingly, we find that Cunningham is not a managerial employee.

[8] Cunningham believed that the Employer had placed a $75 limitation on his authority to charge nonrecurring items. However, no one told Cunningham of such a limit and there is no evidence in the record that any limitation had been imposed.

[9] The saws are approximately 3 feet wide and 6 feet long. There is no evidence as to the value of the saws.

[10] See J/B Industries, 225 NLRB 162 169 (1976).

[11] See Marine Engineers District I, 259 NLRB 1258, 1266 (1982).

Contrary to the hearing officer, we find little in the record to indicate that Cunningham gauges employee performances either in the shop or away. Cunningham testified that at various times he admonished the employees for not working hard enough, but there is no indication that the Employer sought his opinion of employee performance or that he in fact gave it. Further, while there is evidence that Cunningham did pass on to the Employer customer complaints he had gleaned during his lunches with customer purchasing agents, there is no evidence as to how the Employer responded to this information and in any event these were not Cunningham's criticisms but those of the customers.

In addition to excluding Cunningham from the unit on the grounds that he was a managerial employee, the hearing officer found that Cunningham's exclusion could be based on his lack of a community of interest with the unit employees. The hearing officer relied on Cunningham's differing duties as well as his terms and conditions of employment, which she found to be significantly different from those of the unit employees. These differences include Cunningham's use of the warehouse office, his responsibility for paperwork other employees do not share, his making purchases in behalf of the Employer, his entertainment of customer purchasing agents, his personal use of a company car, and his method of compensation and his hours of work.

None of the Employer's employees have clearly defined job classifications. Although some employees spend most of their worktime doing a particular job, all are expected to do any work that needs to be done. Thus, although Cunningham is assigned the bulk of the errands, all the unit employees do this type of work. Moreover, they, as Cunningham, use the Employer-owned car to run assigned errands. Although Cunningham does have some duties that differ from the unit employees, a substantial portion of his time on the job is spent doing unit work.[12] As Cunningham performed a substantial amount of bargaining unit work along with the other warehouse employees, we find that he had a strong community of interest with them. The difference in his hours[13] and method of pay or the fact that he uses Mrs. Herman's car are not sufficient here to require a contrary conclusion. Accordingly, we find that Cunningham is properly included in the unit.[14]

ORDER

It is ordered that the Regional Director for Region 8, within 10 days from the date of this decision, open and count the ballot of Norman Cunningham and thereafter prepare and cause to be served on the parties a revised tally of ballots, on which basis he shall issue the appropriate certification.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the above-entitled matter is referred to the Regional Director for Region 8 for further processing consistent herewith.

[12] Cunningham testified that he spends only 15 to 20 minutes a day in the warehouse office and it is uncontroverted that his principal duty is making deliveries in the pickup truck.

[13] Cunningham was responsible for opening the warehouse for the first-shift employees. Thus, it appears he started work at the same time as the other first-shift unit employees. Although his hours varied from those of other employees there is no evidence that he worked a shortened week.

First Class Maintenance Service, Inc. and its Alter Ego, Clean Sweep Janitorial Services, Inc. and Local 200, Service Employees International Union, AFL-CIO. Case 3-CA-13279

June 30, 1988

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS BABSON AND CRACRAFT

On January 28, 1987, Administrative Law Judge George L. McInerny issued the attached decision. The General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and Respondent First Class filed an answering brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.

This case presents an extremely close question regarding application of the Board's alter ego doctrine. The General Counsel has alleged in substance that First Class Maintenance Service, Inc. (First Class) and Clean Sweep Janitorial Services, Inc. (Clean Sweep) are alter ego corporations and violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act by refusing to apply First Class' collective-bargaining agreement with Local 200, Service Employees International Union, AFL-CIO (the Union) to employees of Clean Sweep. The General Counsel also alleges that the Respondents violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by causing the loss of employment of First Class employees who worked at the Arcata Graphics Building. For the reasons stated below, we hold that no alter ego relationship exists herein and we affirm the judge's dismissal of the 8(a)(5) allegations of the complaint. For the reasons stated by the judge, we also agree that Respondents did not violate Section 8(a)(1) or (3) of the Act. Accordingly, we shall dismiss the complaint in its entirety.[1]

An alter ego relationship may be found when two nominally separate entities share substantially identical management, business purpose, operation, equipment, customers, supervision, and ownership. Advance Electric, 268 NLRB 1001, 1002 (1984); Crawford Door Sales Co., 226 NLRB 1144 (1976). Unlawful motivation is an additional factor frequently considered in determining whether alter ego status exists. See Gilroy Sheet Metal, 280 NLRB 1075 fn. 1 (1986), enfd. 816 F.2d 685 (9th Cir. 1987); Fugazy Continental Corp., 265 NLRB 1301, 1302 (1982), enfd. 725 F.2d 1416 (D.C. Cir. 1984).

The facts are largely undisputed and indicate that there is substantially identical business purpose, operation, equipment, and customers between First Class and Clean Sweep. Thus our analysis focuses on the remaining indicia of alter ego status: substantial identity of management, supervision, and ownership as well as the presence or absence of evidence of unlawful motivation.

In approximately 1971, William T. Held Sr. and his wife Carolynn began a commercial cleaning service that they eventually incorporated as Held Janitorial Services (Helds).[2] In December 1985 W. and C. Held were awarded a contract with Arcata Graphics and were told they would "have to join this local [union]." W. and C. Held complied, formed a new corporation, First Class, hired all the former cleaning service employees at Arcata Graphics and executed the union contract. William T. Held Jr., the elder son of W. and C. Held, worked as a supervisor for First Class at the Arcata Graphics Building.

After submitting a bid for calendar year 1986 based on the union contractual rates, First Class was notified in January 1986 that its contract with Arcata was not being renewed for another year but, rather, would be extended on a month-to-month basis. Shortly thereafter, W. and C. Held were told by Greg Fodero, Arcata Graphics' buyer, that Arcata would accept only nonunion bids for calendar year 1986. Although C. Held submitted a "nonunion" bid on behalf of Helds,[3] W. Held withdrew the bid in May 1986 on advice of counsel.

Word of the tentative nature of the First Class contract with Arcata Graphics was well known by the employees. William Jr. had heard of First Class' problems with the Arcata contract both at work and at home where he lived with his parents. William Jr. approached his parents about forming his own corporation and bidding on the Arcata

[1] The General Counsel has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings. In so holding, we find it unnecessary to rely on the judge's comments in fn. 11 of his decision.

[2] The General Counsel has excepted to the judge's refusal to include in the record a newspaper article provided to him by counsel for Respondent First Class. Apparently discussion regarding this newspaper article occurred off the record. However, the judge acknowledged in fn. 3 of his decision that he reviewed the article for purposes of background information. Because of this acknowledgement, the General Counsel's motion to include the newspaper article in the record is granted.

[3] The General Counsel correctly notes that the judge mistakenly stated that First Class, not Helds, submitted the bid based on nonunion rates.

contract. W. Held spoke with Greg Fodero about his son's proposal. Greg Fodero said Arcata would look at any responsible bid. The judge credited W. Held Sr.'s testimony that he did not guarantee his son's work or promise to oversee it in any way.

On May 27, 1986, William Jr. submitted a bid for the Arcata Graphics work. Although the amount he bid, $10,270 per month, was identical to the "nonunion" bid submitted by Helds, the judge credited William Jr.'s testimony that his calculations were independently performed based on a percentage of the labor cost in the First Class operation, with which he was familiar.

Two "nonunion" bids were received by Arcata. Although William Jr.'s was slightly higher, he was awarded the work due to his familiarity with the building and the specifications for the cleaning required.

By letter dated May 30, 1986, the First Class employees were notified that Arcata Graphics had hired a new cleaning contractor. Employees were advised they could apply for another position by calling the First Class office.

Employees who called the First Class office to apply for positions were told about possible jobs for Helds on a nonunion basis or other jobs with First Class under union contract. Calls regarding the Arcata work were referred to William Jr. who recruited for Clean Sweep by advertisements and hiring some of the laid-off First Class employees.

The credited evidence indicates that William Jr. made the hiring decisions without assistance from his parents except in two instances occurring during the first week of Clean Sweep's operation in which C. Held was involved.[4] Thus, William Jr. set the terms and conditions of employment, effected his own hiring and firing decisions, and scheduled and trained employees. The evidence further indicates, the judge found, and we agree that William Jr. managed Clean Sweep independently. He hired a lawyer to set up the corporation, hired an accountant for tax purposes, hired a payroll service, opened accounts at suppliers, and in all other manner of operations maintained entirely separate management.

Aside from performing these management functions, William Jr. was present to oversee all three shifts of the operation and filled in for employees as needed. Two supervisors performed the day-to-day supervisory duties. One of these supervisors, Fran Urbanczyk, had previously worked for First Class at the Arcata Graphics Building while the other supervisor, David Nightingale, came from a nonsupervisory position at Helds' United Parcel Service operation. There is no evidence that W. or C. Held participated in supervision of the Clean Sweep operation. We thus adopt the judge's conclusion that First Class and Clean Sweep did not have substantially identical supervision.

Clean Sweep is a State of New York corporation. William Jr. owns 100 percent of the outstanding shares of stock in the corporation. Initially William Jr. financed his operation with his lifetime savings of about $3200. Additionally his parents gave him a gift of used commercial cleaning equipment valued at approximately $2500.

The Board has held that a finding of substantially identical ownership is not compelled merely because a close familial relationship is present between the owners of two companies. Victor Valley Heating & Air Conditioning, 267 NLRB 1292, 1296–1297 (1983); Shellmaker, 265 NLRB 749, 754–755 (1982); Friederich Truck Service, 259 NLRB 1294, 1300 (1982). Rather, each case must be examined in light of all the surrounding circumstances. In particular, the Board focuses on whether the owners of one company retained financial control over the operations of the other. Id.

In this case, First Class is owned by W. and C. Held, while Clean Sweep is owned by their 20-year-old son, William Jr. who utilized his life savings as well as a gift of used equipment from his parents to start up the operation. The gift of used equipment is insufficient evidence on which to conclude that substantially identical ownership exists. We have found that William Jr. managed Clean Sweep independently, and there is no evidence that W. and C. Held retained financial control over its operations as a result of the gift of used equipment.

In so holding, we distinguish Kenmore Contracting Co., 289 NLRB 336 (1988). In Kenmore the children of Jacqueline and Hugh Hanley Jr. formed a nonunion steel erection and equipment rental company. Their parents were the sole owners of an identical unionized operation. The two corporations shared the same premises, office equipment, and customers. Further, the parents were integrally involved in the day-to-day operation of the children's corporation and were vested with decision-making authority. Indeed, the evidence indicated that the children were unfamiliar with the operation of their own corporation. For capitalization of their corporation, the Hanley children used the proceeds from the sale of one of their cars which had been a gift from the parents and a student loan which became unnecessary for school expenses when the parents paid for these items. Thus the Hanley children were able to provide capitalization for their corporation only through aid from their parents: the gift of a car, the subsequent sham lease of another car, and the payment of college fees. In sum, the Board characterized the relationship between the children's company and the parent's company as one of near total dependence.

[4] The General Counsel has excepted to the judge's refusal to allow certain rebuttal testimony which, if credited, would have shown an additional instance of involvement by W. or C. Held in Clean Sweep's hiring during the first week of its operation. The General Counsel seeks reopening of the record in order to place this additional testimony before us. The motion is denied. Not only would such evidence have been cumulative, but also denial of the request was an appropriate exercise of the judge's discretion where, as here, counsel for the General Counsel was on notice 9 days prior to seeking to call this "rebuttal" witness that he might desire the testimony but he did not have the witness available at the time he sought to introduce the testimony.

William Jr.'s capitalization was not due solely to his parents' assistance. The record reflects that he had been working in the cleaning industry for 6 years, that he had routinely estimated and prepared bids for jobs on his own, and that his savings were from these years in the industry. Furthermore, Clean Sweep is not dependent on or subject to the control of First Class. Rather, as the judge found, William Jr. "is in fact running his own business."

Finally, we adopt the judge's determination that unlawful motivation was not a factor. First Class knew that it was losing the contract with Arcata Graphics due to an internal decision within that organization and outside the control of W. and C. Held. Given this state of affairs, the senior Helds' decision to assist their son in going into business does not indicate an unlawful motivation.

Although the record reflects that there are substantially identical customers, operation, equipment, and business purpose, we have also found that there is not substantially identical ownership, management, or supervision. Nor is there sufficient evidence to establish unlawful motivation on the part of William Jr. or his parents. Based on these findings, we conclude on the record as a whole that the General Counsel has failed to prove by a preponderance of the credible evidence that First Class and Clean Sweep are alter ego corporations. See Victor Valley Heating & Air Conditioning, supra.

ORDER

The recommended Order of the administrative law judge is adopted and the complaint is dismissed.

DECISION

GEORGE L. MCINERNY, Administrative Law Judge. Based on a charge filed on 2 June and 4 September 1986[1] the Regional Director for Region 3 of the National Labor Relations Board (the Board) on 17 July issued a complaint alleging that First Class Maintenance Service, Inc. (First Class or Respondent First Class) and its alter ego, Clean Sweep Janitorial Services, Inc. (Clean Sweep or Respondent Clean Sweep) had withdrawn recognition from and refused to recognize Local 200, Service Employees International Union, AFL-CIO (the Union), all in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 151 et seq. (the Act). On 21 July First Class filed an answer denying the commission of any unfair labor practices.

Pursuant to notice contained in the complaint, a hearing was held before me at Buffalo, New York, on 8, 9, and 18 September,[2] at which time Respondent First Class was represented by counsel, the Union by its business representatives, and Clean Sweep by its president and sole stockholder. At the hearing all parties had the opportunity to present testimony and documentary evidence, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, to make objections and file motions, and to argue orally. After the close of the hearing, the General Counsel and counsel for First Class filed briefs, which have been carefully considered.

Based on the entire record in this case,[3] including my observation of the witnesses and their demeanor, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

The complaint alleges, the answer admits, and I find that First Class is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

Local 200, Service Employees International Union, AFL-CIO is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Alter Ego Issue

First Class is a New York corporation that is wholly owned by Willam T. Held Sr. (W. Held) and his wife, Carolynn (C. Held). C. Held is the president and W.

[1] All dates are in 1986 unless otherwise specified.

[2] The complaint was amended at the hearing to include an allegation that Respondent First Class had also violated Sec. 8(a)(3) of the Act. This was also denied by the Respondent.

[3] As a part of his brief, the General Counsel submitted a copy of a newspaper article concerning the history of Helds and Respondent First Class. A copy of the article had previously been given to me by counsel for First Class. I note that I have read the article but I have used it only for background material because it does not pertain to the issues of this case. The General Counsel's request that the article be made a part of this record is denied.

Held the vice president. The Helds own another corporation, Held Janitorial Services (Held's). W. and C. Held began the business that eventually became Held Janitorial Services some time in the late 1960s. C. Held handled the office, did bookkeeping, and handled the financial end of the business, and W. Held did the sales and marketing, estimated jobs, and supervised employees at the locations where the work was to be performed. Both W. and C. Held began by doing the actual cleaning work themselves and they continued to do so until the business grew so large that they hired others to do the actual work.

Around 1980, the Helds obtained a contract to clean at a company called Arcata Graphics. This job had been performed by a union contractor and after being awarded the job, the Helds hired the prior contractor's employees and signed a contract with the Union for the work. In order to seperate this new union business from other nonunion operations, the Helds formed a new corporation called First Class Maintenance, to bid on and perform cleaning and janitorial services with union employees. After obtaining the Arcata Graphics contract, First Class entered into cleaning contracts with the Buffalo Evening News, and with the management of a downtown building called the Brisbane Building.

Arcata Graphics occupies a large plant containing over 7 acres and First Class was responsible for cleaning all offices, the cafeteria, and toilets throughout the main building and a distribution center some distance away from the main plant. The cleaning contracts were awarded on the basis of competitive bids, with some discretion on the part of Arcata's buyer, Gregory Fodero. Late in 1985 the management of Arcata became concerned with the costs of cleaning services and, after having received bids from First Class for the calendar year 1986, management instructed Fodero to find out what they could save if "non-union work was brought in." Fodero then requested various cleaning services to submit either nonunion or union bids.[4]

As a result of Fodero's request, First Class submitted a bid that was based on nonunion rates, as well as the bid based on its current (January 1, 1984, to December 31, 1986) contract with the Union. However, the Helds were advised by counsel that they could have legal problems under article II of the union agreement. Similar problems would exist even if the job was awarded to the Helds instead of First Class.

Faced with the almost certain loss of the Arcata account, the Helds were very concerned. The situation dragged on into 1986, with the Helds hanging on to the account on a month-to-month basis. During this time the matter must have been discussed at their home in the presence of their son, William Held Jr. (Bill). Bill lived at the Held home and was at that time 20 years old, a graduate of a local community college, and a veteran of over 6 years' experience in the Held family cleaning business. He had started as a sweeper and worked up to stripping of floors, supervising other employees, and even using a computer in connection with business accounts. For a year and a half before the end of 1985 Bill had been a supervisor for First Class, working at the Arcata Graphics location.

At some point, and in some fashion, the idea occurred to the Held family to have Bill set himself up in the cleaning business and, from that position, submit his own bid on the Arcata work.

According to Fodero, W. Held asked him if he would allow Bill to put a bid in on the Arcata work. Fodero asked W. Held if he thought Bill was capable of doing the work. The answer being affirmative, Fodero told W. Held that he would be glad to look at a bid from Bill.

Shortly after that, in May 1986, Fodero received two bids. Bill's was a little higher than the other, but Fodero testified that he took into account his experience with the Helds over the years and the experience Bill had had in the Arcata plant, in awarding the contract to Bill. The evidence shows that the bid that Bill submitted to Arcata Graphics was identical with the bid previously prepared by C. Held and submitted as a nonunion bid on behalf of Helds Janitorial Services.[5]

On receiving the award, Bill proceeded to get himself into business. He first approached his parents' attorney, Thomas Gill. Gill referred him to another attorney in his firm, Timothy C. Cashmore, who proceeded in June to secure the incorporation of Clean Sweep Janitorial Services, Inc., under the laws of the State of New York. Bill is the only officer, the only director, and the only shareholder of Clean Sweep. Bill also secured the services of Joseph Muffaletto, a member of his parents' accounting firm, to act as his own accountant; selected Barber Insurance, also used by the family, to purchase his business insurance; arranged with Marine Midland Bank to provide a payroll service, exactly the same service used by First Class; and chose, as his suppliers of cleaning materials and supplies, the same firms used by the Helds.

These factors show that in the fundamentals of establishing and operating this small business, preparing and submitting the bid, arranging for incorporation (for tax and accounting) services, for insurance, supplies, and payroll, Bill followed his parents in their corporate practices. The evidence further shows that the Helds donated to Bill, at no cost, equipment that they valued at $2500, to allow Bill to start up his operation at Arcata without making a substantial capital outlay.[6] There is no question but that Bill continued to live at his parents' house during times material, using their facilities and telephone not only for his personal convenience, but also to run his business. There is no indication that Bill paid any rent, any share of telephone or utility bills, or other household expenses up to the time of this hearing.

[4] While the record here confirms that the words "union" and "nonunion" were used in connection with the bids on the cleaning work, I do not believe that these were inspired by antiunion motivations either by Arcata or First Class. Rather, these words were understood by the parties involved to refer to the relative costs of the work if done under union scale or not.

[5] According to Fodero he relied heavily on Arcata's experience with W. Held, although the latter did not guarantee the son's work and gave no indication that he was going to keep an eye on the work. In any event, according to Fodero, the contract had a 30-day cancellation provision, and could be terminated if the services were less than satisfactory to Arcata.

[6] Bill testified that if he had purchased all new equipment for the Arcata operation it would have cost him much more than $2500.

The General Counsel maintains that the senior Helds regarded Clean Sweep as an addition to their other two corporations, Helds and First Class. I have some questions about this theory. In the initial stages of Clean Sweep's assumption of the Arcata contract, there is evidence that C. Held and Pam Zugger, at that time sort of an office manager and dispatcher for Helds and First Class, discussed wages and assignments with employees who were being laid off by First Class. Indeed the testimony of former First Class employees Anni Wrobel and Lynn McGuane shows that C. Held was influential in determining wage rates at the beginning of the Clean Sweep operation. Pam Zugger's function seemed to be more in the nature of an informant to the newly laid-off employees regarding other positions available either at union rates with First Class, or nonunion rates with Helds or Clean Sweep. At the same time, however, Bill also seemed to be making employment decisions. He did inform former First Class employee Lynn McGuane that she could have a vacation that year, and he was also referred to by Pam Zugger in her discussions with employees as the new owner and the person responsible for wages and other benefits.

In the 3-month period between the assumption of the Arcata contract by Clean Sweep and the time of this hearing there are no clear indications of participation by the senior Helds in the management of Clean Sweep. A former employee named Bruno Stra testified that Bill told him that W. Held was still in charge, but Bill denied this and I credit the latter's testimony. Stra had a poor memory and a confused recollection of several incidents during his employment. Anni Wrobel, who did impress me as a credible witness testified that she heard Bill discussing the discharge of another employee with W. Held on the telephone, but her testimony is not clear whether Bill was asking for a decision to be made on the discharge, or was, as Bill indicated in his testimony, merely seeking his father's advice on a decision that Bill had already made. Two employees of Helds testified that, at various times, they went to Arcata after Clean Sweep had taken over the contract and took equipment out of Clean Sweep's storeroom on Arcata's premises. Paul Eaton, one of these employees, testified that he thought the equipment still belonged to Helds.[7]

Apart from the single instance related by Lynn McGuane concerning her conversation with C. Held, there is no direct evidence that either W. or C. Held participated in any way in the operation or management of Clean Sweep after the end of May 1986. Further, both W. and C. Held testified credibly that Bill was on his own in this business, and that they would not share in his profits, nor underwrite any losses. Insofar as those views reflected the then-current situation, I accept them as accurate.

However, we do not have much to go on when determining whether Clean Sweep is a legitmate, independent operation, or whether it is merely an extension of the family-owned Held enterprises. The only financial data in this record are Bill's checkstubs for the period 17 June to 3 September 1986 from the Clean Sweep account on which he had scribbled figures showing deposits and expenditures into and out of this account.[8] The figures show a deposit of $3000 early in June, which Bill testified represented his savings used for captilization of the business. Arcata Graphics made two payments that were then deposited in Clean Sweep's account, in mid-June for $11,710.17 and another for $11,977.60 early in August. The stubs show payment of bills for payroll and payroll services, tax and unemployment deposits, supplies, and payments on a truck. As of 3 September the balance shown was $6,149.64, with another payment from Arcata Graphic due shortly. My own rough calculations from these sketchy figures show that the business should show a profit of about $1000 per month, a little over 10 percent of the Arcata contract. There were no deposits or indications that the senior Helds were contributing any money to the enterprise. Receiving no outside assistance, Bill would realize around $12,000 annual profit from the Arcata contract. Adding to this his own $7 per hour wage for what his payrolls show as a 50-hour week, or a total of some $18,000, Bill would gross about $30,000 per year. This appears to be a respectable and a legitimate sum, warranting the inference that Clean Sweep is a viable enterprise, capable of functioning on its own outside of the Helds home.

In determining whether one entity is the alter ego of another, the Board looks at a number of factors. One of these factors is the purpose behind the creation of the alleged alter ego. The Board is concerned whether the creation of the alter ego was a legitmate act, or whether it was taken to evade responsibilities under the Act; Fugazy Continental Corp., 265 NLRB 1301 (1982). A finding of unlawful motivation is not essential to a finding of alter ego status, but it is one factor that the Board considers in each case; Gilroy Sheet Metal, 280 NLRB 1075 (1986).

The question of motive here is not clear. If there were any antiunion motive, it would have been the result of the decision of the management of Arcata Graphics to reduce the costs of cleaning and maintenance of its facility. From the testimony of Greg Fodero it really appears that the Company's motive was not so much to hurt the Union as to reduce costs. First Class, which had contracts both with Arcata and the Union, was then caught in a dilemma. If they stuck with their bid based on the Union's wage scales and benefits, the Helds knew that First Class would lose the Arcata contract. If they lowered their bid to obtain the Arcata contract, they would, presumably, have lost money.[9] So they lost their contract and laid off the employees. At the same time they encouraged and assisted Bill to set up Clean Sweep, to bid on and to receive the Arcata contract.

[7] At Held's and First Class it was common for employees to take equipment from one location to service another.

[8] I appreciate the fact that this kind of evidence is self-serving, but between the state of the document and the testimony of Bill Held, I am convinced that the figures reflect Bill's financial condition accurately for the short period covered.

[9] Noting that Bill's percentage of profit is not high, I cannot envisage the Helds making a profit on the same contract at union rates. I am not aware of anything in the Act that would require the Helds to make and accept a money-losing bid on this kind of job.

I do not believe these facts show that the Helds set up First Class in order to avoid dealing with the Union. As the situation developed during the first 6 months of 1986, First Class, as a union employer, was out at Arcata, and someone, a nonunion contractor, was going to be in. The question of retaining the Arcata contract by First Class was settled. The fact that the Helds decided to assist Bill in setting up his own company does not, in my opinion, affect the First Class-Union relationship that had existed before 1986. Thus, I find that there was no intention on the part of Bill, or his parents, to evade union responsibilities in the setting up of Clean Sweep.

Other factors considered by the Board in determining the existence of an alter ego situation are "substantially identical management, business purpose, operation, equipment, customers and supervision, as well as ownership"; Advance Electric, 268 NLRB 1001 (1984). Here we have a substantially identical business purpose, the supply of cleaning and janitorial services; essentially the same kind of operation, the use of part-time cleaners under a contract with building owners; the same equipment, in this case the equipment donated to Bill by his parents; and identical customers, Clean Sweep's only customer was a customer of First Class.

The differences in this case are in ownership, management, and supervision. There is no question that Bill owned no stock in First Class, and while he had been a supervisor for that company, he had not participated in management decisions. There is, further, no question that either W. or C. Held have any equity position in Clean Sweep, and, as I have found, they exercise no management function at Clean Sweep. In regard to supervision, one of the supervisors who worked at Arcata for First Class remained as an employee of Clean Sweep. Bill Held, who had been a supervisor for First Class at Arcata moved up to management and another supervisor was hired from Helds.[10]

There are, in this situation, indicators that point to an alter ego situation if one considers the identity in business purpose, supply of services, customers equipment, and methods of operation; and those that point in the opposite direction, considering ownership, management, and supervision.

Based on all these factors, and considering my observation of the witnesses, particularly my observation of Bill Held as he testified under extended and vigorous cross-examination, I do not find that the establishment and operation of Clean Sweep is merely a technical change in structure or identity of First Class, the predecessor employer. Bill showed in his testimony that he had experience in this business, learning all aspects of the business for over 5 years prior to starting up Clean Sweep. He showed me that he is an intelligent, mature young man with a grasp of the economics and practice of the cleaning business and the strength and determination to make a go of it. Despite his continuing physical dependence on his parents, I find that he is fully capable, and is in fact running his own business independent of, and not the alter ego of, either of his parents' two corporations. Advance, supra; Gilroy, supra; Howard Johnson Co. v. Detroit National Joint Executive Board, 417 U.S. 249 (1974); Crawford Door Sales Co., 226 NLRB 1144 (1976).

B. The Alleged Refusal to Bargain

The complaint alleges that the Respondent, First Class, repudiated its collective-bargaining contract with the Union on or about 1 June 1986 and thereafter refused to recognize or bargain with the Union. However, the undenied testimony of W. Held shows that he was aware that First Class was going to lose the contract, and that he communicated the fact to the Union before 1 June, but received no response or request from the Union to discuss the matter further. When the contract between Arcata and First Class finally ran out, Business Representative Paul McQuillen testified that he called C. Held. They discussed pay and vacations due employees, and C. Held told McQuillen that they were going to try to place the Arcata employees at other First Class locations, continuing them under the Union's contract. McQuillen made no further attempt to contact the Helds, and so far as I can determine no other union representative did so.

In these circumstances, I can find no violation of the law. Both W. and C. Held tried to do what they could to serve the Arcata contract. When they could not, the evidence shows that they notified the Union, that they responded to union telephone calls, were willing to discuss any matters concerning the loss of the Arcata contract with the Union, and that they attempted to place employees who wished at their other union locations at the Buffalo News and the Brisbane Building.

C. The Alleged Discrimination Against Employees

The complaint contains two separate allegations of discrimination against employees. The first of these states that "Respondent" told unit employees that they would have to work nonunion to remain at Arcata. The facts show that after First Class lost the Arcata contract the company addressed letters to its employees informing them of that fact and suggesting that if they wanted to continue working for First Class they could apply through the First Class office. C. Held and Pam Zugger testified that employees did call the office, and suggestions were made for alternative positions under the union contract. Employees like Lynn McGuane corroborated this testimony, but she and other employees did not care for the hours or the locations of the proffered positions. The employees were then referred to Bill Held. Either C. Held or Bill told them that they would have to accept rates that were lower than those called for by the union contract. This evidence does not, in my opinion, establish a violation of Section 8(a)(1) or (3) of the Act.

Debra Kemp testified that she was notified on 29 or 30 May that First Class no longer had a contract with Arcata. She continued to do her job at the request of Bill Held, who also told her to call "the office" in the morning. The next day Kemp called the Held office and talked to Pam. Pam told Kemp that she should not worry, that "we will find all you people jobs." Kemp was also told that Bill was in charge at Arcata. Kemp returned to work at Arcata, but on the following Tuesday morning, 3 June, Pam called her and said that she would not be working at Aracata anymore because, as Kemp quoted Pam, "We have too many ex-union members working at Arcata Graphics for us." Pam did arrange a job for Kemp at another of the Helds locations, Sierra Research. Kemp refused this job.

[10] This move of an individual from a nonsupervisory position at Held's United Parcel Service location to a supervisory position at Clean Sweep is the only reported transfer to Clean Sweep from either First Class or Helds after 1 June.

Bill Held told a different version of the Kemp situation, testifying that he actually hired Kemp as the result of a telephone call. He stated that he had had trouble with Kemp doing one of her assignments and he had spoken to her about it while First Class was still on the Arcata contract. He said that they had a problem about assignments early in the first week of June and he discharged her.[11]

Bill's version of this situation was more detailed, more logical,[12] and more credible than that related by Kemp. Based on this, and on my observation of both while they were testifying, I credit Bill's story and do not credit Kemp.

I therefore do not find any violation in Kemp's separation from First Class or from Clean Sweep.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. First Class Maintenence Service, Inc. and Clean Sweep Janitorial Services, Inc. are New York corporations engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. Local 200, Service Employees International Union, AFL-CIO is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. Clean Sweep Janitorial Services, Inc. is not an alter ego of First Class Maintenance Service, Inc.

4. Neither Clean Sweep nor First Class has caused employees to suffer loss of employment because of their activities on behalf of the Union.

5. Neither Clean Sweep nor First Class discharged Debra Kemp or refused to employ her because of her activities on behalf of the Union.

6. First Class has not failed or refused to bargain with the Union.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[13]

ORDER

The complaint is dismissed in its entirety.

---

[11] There is not much logic in Kemp's story that Pam told her she was being fired because she was a supernumerary exunion employee at Clean Sweep, but immediately arranged for her to obtain a job at another Held operation.

[12] Pam Zugger had no specific recollection as to her conversations with Kemp, only that she had had one or more conversations in the late May-early June period.

[13] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

MIS, Inc., and its alter ego M & H Riggers and Erectors, Inc. and International Association of Bridge, Structural and Ornamental Iron Workers, Local Union No. 70, AFL-CIO. Case 9-CA-22555

DECISION AND ORDER

By Chairman Stephens and Members Johansen, Babson, and Cracraft

On March 25, 1987, Administrative Law Judge Stephen J. Gross issued the attached decision. Respondent MIS, Inc. (Misco) filed motions, exceptions, and a supporting brief. The Charging Party filed an answering brief, and the General Counsel filed limited exceptions and brief in support thereof.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the motions,[1] exceptions,[2] and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.

There are two issues. One issue is whether the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act by repudiating midterm its 1984–1987 8(f) prehire agreement with Local 70 of the International Association of Bridge, Structural and Ornamental Iron Workers and thereafter failing and refusing to apply the terms of this prehire agreement to employees employed by M & H Riggers and Erectors, Inc. (M & H), the alleged alter ego of Misco.

The other issue is whether the Board should defer to the arbitrator's decision on the above-described issue. As more fully set forth in the judge's decision, Local 70 filed a grievance against Misco in August 1985. The arbitrator was presented with substantially the same issues facing us, namely, did Misco effectively repudiate its contract with Local 70, and is M & H the alter ego of Misco.

We agree with the judge's finding that, under John Deklewa & Sons, Inc., 282 NLRB 1375, 1389 (1987), enfd. 843 F.2d 770 (3d Cir. 1988), deferral to the arbitrator's award on the repudiation issue is unwarranted because the Board had determined to apply Deklewa "to all pending cases in whatever stage." As the judge correctly points out, it would create an anomaly for us to defer to an arbitrator's award which applied pre-Deklewa law when we would not apply this law ourselves at this stage in the proceedings. Insofar as the arbitrator relied on law which has now been overruled in reaching his conclusion that Misco effectively and lawfully repudiated its contract with Local 70, the arbitrator's conclusion became "palpably wrong"[3] once Deklewa issued with the retroactive component. Thus, to defer to the arbitral award on the repudiation issue, in the circumstances of this case, would necessitate reviewing the award under a legal standard which the Board has decided frustrates the Act's purposes.[4]

Further, as far as deferring to the arbitrator's resolution of the alter ego issue is concerned, given that the arbitrator relied, in part, on pre-Deklewa law for his finding and given the reasons discussed infra, the arbitrator's finding on this point similarly cannot arguably be reconciled with Board precedent in this area, is internally inconsistent, palpably wrong, and, therefore, is not a proper basis for deferral.[5]

We adopt the judge's findings that M & H Riggers and Erectors is the alter ego of Misco. We rely not only on the facts discussed by the judge, but rely additionally on the facts discussed below and the case precedent found in Advance Electric.[6] In Advance Electric, the Board stated that it would find alter ego status where two employers have "'substantially identical' management, business purpose, operation, equipment, customers, and supervision, as well as ownership." In addition, the Board considers whether there has been any hiatus in operations, whether the companies use the same building, and "whether the purpose behind the creation of the alleged alter ego was legitimate or whether, instead, its purpose was to evade responsibilities under the Act."[7] No one factor is determi-

[1] The Respondent has requested oral argument. The request is denied as the record, exceptions, and briefs adequately present the issues and the positions of the parties.

The Respondent has also requested that we hold this case in abeyance pending the Third Circuit's decision on the appeal of John Deklewa & Sons Inc., 282 NLRB 1375 (1987). Both the Charging Party and the General Counsel filed motions in opposition. The Respondent's request is denied inasmuch as the Third Circuit's opinion enforcing the Board's Decision and Order in Deklewa in its entirety issued on April 12, 1988.

[2] The General Counsel requested a visitatorial clause. We deny the General Counsel's request as unnecessary here. See Cherokee Marine Terminal, 287 NLRB 1080 (1988).

[3] In Olin Corp., 268 NLRB 573 (1984), the Board held that it would defer to an arbitration award where the proceedings appear to have been fair and regular, all parties have agreed to be bound, the arbitrator has adequately considered the unfair labor practice issues, and the decision of the arbitrator is not clearly repugnant to the Act. The Board held that unless the award is "palpably wrong," i.e., unless the arbitrator's decision is not susceptible to an interpretation consistent with the Act, we will defer.

native of alter ego status, and not all of these indicia need be present to find that an alter ego relationship exists.[8]

The judge discussed these factors and found that Daymond Hardin and Michael Moore were the sole owners of both Misco and M & H. Both were equally involved in the management of the two companies, both having served sequentially as president of both companies. Both companies were engaged in the steel erection business and, by and large, Misco could have performed M & H's work had it not ceased operations in June 1985. When M & H began operations in June 1985, its only equipment was, with minor exception, equipment it received from Misco, the consideration for which was M & H's promissory note and its agreement to pay $1417 per month in lease payments to Misco. M & H, however, has not complied with the terms of either the promissory note or the lease agreement by which it acquired Misco's equipment. As evidence of the lack of arm's-length dealings between the two companies, the judge described how Misco has not sought to compel M & H to comply with the terms of the promissory note or the lease agreement and when Misco was faced with a Federal tax bill and had no funds to pay it, M & H "loaned" Misco the money to pay it.

In addition to these facts outlined by the judge, we note also that regarding supervision, Michael Moore, the current president of Misco, as well as M & H, testified that he was the field supervisor and did estimates for jobs for both companies. The evidence also shows that both Hardin and Moore participated in significant management and labor relations decisions for both firms. Both men handled negotiations with the Union in an attempt to work out a targeted job agreement which would allow Misco to pay only 80 percent of the union wage scale should it be the successful bidder on a Colonel Sanders Research and Development project. Thus, there is no doubt about common supervision and management of the two corporations.

Finally there remains for consideration whether the purpose behind the formation of M & H was to evade responsibilities under the Act. It is clear from Moore's testimony and that of Hardin that they formed M & H because they believed their bids could not be competitive, at least in part, because they were constrained to pay union wages and fringe benefits under the Misco contract. The parties differed, under the pre-Deklewa law, in their interpretation of the nature of this agreement. As they formulated their arguments before the judge, the dispute centered on whether under the law prevailing at the time, which included the so-called "conversion" doctrine, Misco could lawfully repudiate the collective-bargaining agreement. Thus, they apparently questioned their ability to repudiate Misco's contract as long as they operated under that name. Given this set of circumstances, it is only reasonable to conclude that Hardin and Moore chose the subterfuge of setting up another company rather than merely repudiating the prehire agreement.

Applying the standards and principles set forth in Advance Electric, supra, to these facts, we conclude, in agreement with the judge, that a preponderance of the evidence shows that M & H Riggers is the alter ego of Misco.

We further find, in agreement with the judge, that the principles announced in John Deklewa & Sons, Inc., supra, are appropriately applied to the facts of this case. Thus, we find that the Respondent unlawfully repudiated the Misco 1984–1987 contract with the Union during the term of the agreement. However, under Deklewa, the Union enjoyed no presumption of majority status following the contract's expiration date of May 31, 1987, and thus at that point the Respondent was free to repudiate the 8(f) bargaining relationship. Therefore, we find that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by repudiating the 1984–1987 contract with the Union during the contract term and shall limit the make-whole remedy accordingly.

AMENDED REMEDY

The judge's recommended remedy provides that the Respondent be directed to make whole employees in accordance with the method prescribed in Ogle Protection Service, 183 NLRB 683 (1970). We find merit in the General Counsel's contention that Ogle applies only to situations where employees remain employed by the employer but are not compensated in accordance with the existing collective-bargaining agreement. Thus, while M & H employees must be made whole in accordance with Ogle, those employees who were in the past referred to Misco by the Union and were no longer employed by Respondent Misco must be made whole in accordance with the method set forth in F. W. Woolworth, 90 NLRB 289 (1950), which provides that employees be made whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits on a quarterly basis less any net interim earnings. We shall accordingly order the Respondent to make the M & H employees whole in the manner set forth in Ogle, supra, and to make the former Misco employees whole in the manner set forth in F. W. Woolworth, supra, for any losses they may have suffered as a result of the Respondent's failure to adhere to the contract from June 1, 1985, through May 31, 1987, with interest on any amounts due, paid in the manner prescribed in New Horizons for the Retarded.[9]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, MIS, Inc., and its alter ego M & H Riggers and Erectors, Inc., Louisville, Kentucky, their officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

DECISION

STEPHEN J. GROSS, Administrative Law Judge. This case presents three questions. First, did MIS, Inc. (Misco) effectively repudiate its contract with the Charging Party, the International Association of Bridge, Structural and Ornamental Iron Workers, Local Union No. 70, AFL–CIO (Local 70 or the Union). Second, should Misco's contract with Local 70 be deemed applicable to M & H Riggers & Erectors, Inc. (M & H), a company formed by the owners of Misco. And third, to what extent, if any, should the Board defer to a decision of an arbitrator in respect to the first and second questions.

My conclusion is that Misco did not validly repudiate its contract with Local 70; that M & H is an alter ego of Misco and that the Misco-Local 70 contract accordingly covers M & H; and that the Board should not defer to the arbitrator's decision.[1]

Misco's Attempted Repudiation of its Contract with Local 70

Misco is no longer in business. While it was operating it did steel erection work in the Louisville, Kentucky area. At all times all of Misco's employees who were engaged in steel erection work were members of Local 70. Misco entered into two contracts with Local 70. The first was for the period 1 June 1983 through 31 May 1984. The second, signed in September 1984, covered the period through 31 May 1987. The parties agree that both contracts were prehire contracts subject to Section 8(f) of the Act.

On 27 February 1985, Misco's counsel wrote to Local 70 stating that the owners of Misco "expressed regret that they must terminate their contractual agreement with Local No. 70 effective June 1, 1985." According to the letter, the reason for Misco's action was that Misco's owners felt that the wages and fringe benefits required by the contract were too high to permit Misco to compete effectively.[2] Local 70 wrote back, objecting.

Misco had no employees on the purported effective date of the repudiation (1 June 1985). Misco stopped operating a short time later.

Conclusion

In September 1984, Misco voluntarily signed a contract with Local 70, thereby entering into an 8(f) relationship with Local 70 for a period that does not end until May 1987. The contract accordingly was, and is, "binding, enforceable, and not subject to unilateral repudiation" by Misco. John Deklewa & Sons, Inc., 282 NLRB 1375, 1395 (1987) (Deklewa).[3] Thus by purporting to repudiate its contract with Local 70, Misco violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act. Deklewa, supra at 1390; see also 1391 (concurring opinion).

The Relationship Between Misco and M & H

Misco and M & H are separate corporations, have separate tax numbers and separate bank accounts, and much of the time M & H's records have been kept at a location different from where Misco's records were kept. In addition M & H's employment policies differ from Misco's. Misco's employees rarely worked for Misco for more than a few days per week and did not necessarily work for Misco on consecutive weeks. M & H's employees work for M & H on a full-time (40 hours per week), week-in week-out basis. Nonetheless, as the discussion below indicates, M & H is Misco's alter ego. Indeed, it is hard to imagine a more obvious alter ego relationship.

[1] This proceeding began with a charge filed by Local 70 on 1 November 1985. A complaint dated 20 October 1986 followed. Respondents Misco and M & H admit that they are employers engaged in commerce within the meaning of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act), and that Local 70 is a labor organization within the meaning of the Act. But Respondents deny that they violated the Act in any respect. I heard the case in Lousiville, Kentucky, on 10 December 1986.

Briefs have been filed by the General Counsel, by Local 70, and by Misco and M & H (jointly). The General Counsel has also filed a reply brief.

[2] In one instance the Union authorized Misco to pay less than normal wages and fringe benefits required by the Misco-Local 70 contract (via a "targeted job agreement"). But Misco found that it could not successfully bid even at that lower compensation level.

[3] Deklewa issued after the hearing closed and briefs had been submitted. Thus the parties' arguments are based on prior law, with the principal issue being—in respect to Misco's purported repudiation of its contract with the Union—whether Misco at any time had had a "permanent and stable workforce." See Construction Erectors, 265 NLRB 786 (1982); Deklewa, 282 NLRB at 1378. In view of Deklewa's retroactive applicability that issue is no longer relevant.

Ownership. Daymond Hardin and Michael Moore were the sole owners of both Misco and M & H.[4] Moreover, their interests in each of the corporations were the same: Hardin and Moore each had a half interest in both Misco and M & H.

Management. Hardin initially was president of both Misco and M & H. Subsequently, Moore became president of both.

Reason for M & H's Creation

As Hardin put it, as of early 1985 Misco "was basically out of work" because it was "being outbid [that is, underbid] by non-union competition."[5] Hardin and Moore decided that it was hopeless to continue trying to operate under a union contract. They accordingly created M & H in April 1985. M & H has never entered into any contract with Local 70 or any other union, and the compensation that M & H pays its employees is less than the amounts provided in Misco's contract with Local 70.

Equipment. On 15 April 1985, Misco agreed to transfer all of its equipment to M & H. The consideration for the transfer of some of the equipment was M & H's promissory note: the consideration for the transfer for the rest of the equipment was M & H's agreement to pay $1417 per month in lease payments to Misco. (Hardin signed the lease on behalf of both Misco and M & H.) No cash changed hands. When M & H began operations its only equipment was, with minor exception, the equipment it received from Misco.

Operations. Misco was, and M & H is, in the steel erection business in the Louisville area. Insofar as the nature of the work undertaken by the two companies is concerned, while the scope of M & H's work came to be somewhat broader than Misco's, M & H could have performed Misco's work and, by and large, Misco could have performed M & H's work.

Misco stopped operating on or about 5 June 1985. M & H began operating later in June, doing the steel erection work for the "Colonel Sanders Research and Development Center." Misco's last bid (which it withdrew) was for the same work on the same project.

Absence of arm's-length dealings. The relationship between Misco and M & H has not been characterized by arm's-length dealings. Most importantly, M & H has not complied with the terms of either the promissory note or the lease agreement by which M & H acquired Misco's equipment and Misco has not sought to compel compliance by M & H. Secondly, in April 1986, Misco was faced with a Federal tax bill and no cash to pay it. According to Hardin, M & H "loaned" Misco the necessary funds.[6]

Obviously M & H is Misco's alter ego. And because it is, it is subject to Misco's 1984–1987 contract with Local 70. M & H has not complied with the contract and accordingly has violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1).

Deferral to Arbitration Issues

In August 1985 Local 70 filed a grievance against Misco alleging that Misco: (1) employed persons who were not members of Local 70 to do work covered by Local 70's contract with Misco; (2) paid such persons "substandard wages and fringe benefits"; and (3) failed to utilize Local 70's "referral system." The grievance went to arbitration in December 1985. The arbitrator issued his decision in March 1986.

The arbitrator sought to resolve two principal issues: did Misco effectively repudiate its contract with Local 70; and is M & H the alter ego of Misco.

As for Misco's purported repudiation of the contract, the arbitrator concluded that it was effective. The arbitrator's reasoning was that the Misco-Local 70 contract was a prehire agreement, that Misco clearly and unequivocally communicated to Local 70 that Misco did not intend to be bound by the agreement, that there was no showing "that the Union had ever petitioned to show majority status" at Misco, that Misco had never had any "full time employees" apart from owners Hardin and Moore, and that an employer is entitled "to prospectively terminate" a prehire agreement "at any time."[7]

Turning to the alter ego issue, the arbitrator found that "the ownership and control" of Misco and M & H were "the same" that M & H was formed "for the admitted purpose of non-union contracting," and that M & H "purchased or leased its equipment from MIS." Nonetheless, said the arbitrator, M & H was not Misco's alter ego.

I confess to having some trouble following the arbitrator's reasoning. But as I understand the decision, its gist seems to be that: (1) at the time Hardin and Moore formed M & H, they had already terminated their agreement with Local 70 (albeit prospectively); and (2) given the termination of that agreement, there was no legal bar to Hardin and Moore establishing M & H "as a separate vehicle for them to compete in bidding in the market for construction under non-union conditions."[8] (Another possible interpretation of the arbitrator's decision is that Misco was in the business of contracting for unionized work, M & H was in the business of contracting for nonunionized work, and, as a result of that difference, M & H may not be deemed an alter ego of Misco.)

Conclusion

Insofar as the arbitrator concluded that Misco effectively repudiated its contract with Local 70, the arbitrator's conclusion became "palpably wrong" once Deklewa issued.[9]

---

[4] In April 1986 Hardin ended his ownership interest in M & H and ended his relationship with both M & H and Misco.

[5] Tr. 112, 114.

[6] The General Counsel urges that there is still further evidence of less than arm's-length dealings between Misco and M & H; namely, although the Misco-M & H equipment lease was signed in April 1985, Misco retained the equipment until June, and did so without compensating M & H. Br. 4. But the equipment lease itself provides that the term of the lease begins "on the date each piece of equipment or property is delivered to the Lessee."

[9] The "palpably wrong" standard has been enunciated in many cases, most notably Olin Corp., 268 NLRB 573, 574 (1984). I have considered

Continued

As for the arbitrator's conclusion that M & H is not Misco's alter ego, the arbitrator apparently based that conclusion on his determination that the Misco-Local 70 contract had been effectively repudiated which, as just stated, is wrong. (In any event, in light of the facts both as found by the arbitrator and as presented in this proceeding, any arbitral conclusion that M & H is not an alter ego of Misco would have to be palpably wrong.)

I accordingly recommend that the Board not defer to the arbitrator's decision.

THE REMEDY

The accompanying recommended Order requires that Respondent Misco and M & H cease violating Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act and requires that Respondents take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.[10]

Respondents must make whole their employees, as prescribed in Ogle Protection Service, 183 NLRB 682 (1970), for any losses the employees may have suffered as a result of the Respondents' failure to adhere to Misco's 1984–1987 contract with Local 70 since 1 June 1985, with interest as computed in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).[11]

The Misco-Local 70 contract appears to require Misco to make payments to certain truths and funds (e.g., the "Fringe Benefits Welfare Trust"). Respondents' obligation to make its employees whole includes making whole such trusts and funds.[12]

Finally, the Respondents' obligation to make its employee whole also includes the requirement that Respondents remit to Local 70 all dues and fees the Respondents should have deducted from the employees' wages pursuant to the terms of the collective-bargaining contract.

The General Counsel urges that the recommended Order include a visitatorial provision authorizing the Board to engage in discovery, if necessary, to monitor compliance with the Order. But it does not appear to me that the imposition of this kind of provision would be appropriate given the circumstances of this case. See O. L. Willis, Inc., 278 NLRB 203 (1986).

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[13]

ORDER

The Respondents, Mis, Inc., and its alter ego, M & H Riggers & Erectors, Inc., Louisville, Kentucky, their officers, agents, successors and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Withdrawing recognition during the term of a collective-bargaining contract from the International Association of Bridge, Structural and Ornamental Iron Workers, Local Union No. 70, AFL–CIO as the exclusive bargaining representative of the Respondents' employees covered by the contract.

(b) Refusing to adhere to Mis, Inc.'s 1984–1987 collective-bargaining contract with the Union.

(c) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Make whole the above-described employees, in accordance with the remedy section of this decision for any losses the employees may have suffered as a result of the Respondents' failure to adhere to the contract.

(b) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(c) Post at their facilities copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[14] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 9, after being signed by the Respondents immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Respondents shall take reasonable steps to ensure that the notices are not related, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(d) Sign and return to the Regional Director sufficient copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix" for posting by the International Association of Bridge, Structural and Ornamnetal Iron Workers, Local Union No. 70, AFL–CIO, if willing, in conspicuous places where notices to employees and members are customarily posted.

the fact that the arbitrator's decision issued prior to the Board's issuance of Deklewa. But the Board has determined to apply Deklewa "to all pending cases in whatever stage" at 1389, quoting Deluxe Metal Furniture Co., 121 NLRB 995, 1007 (1958). While the Board did not specify that Deklewa's standards should be used to determine whether to defer to pre-Deklewa arbitral decisions, in view of the broad retroactive applicability the Board has given to Deklewa, it would be anomalous to do otherwise. I accordingly make no finding about whether the arbitrator's decision regarding the effectiveness of Misco's purported repudiation is "susceptible to an interpertation consistent with the Act" (Olin, supra at 574) as the Board interpreted the Act at the time the arbitrator issued his decision.

[10] Such action includes, of course, posting notices. The record suggest that Respondents may have no facilities where their employees would be likely to see the notices. But because the matter has not been litigated, the recommended Order imposes no special notice posting or notice mailing requirements. See Dependable Maintenance Co., 276 NLRB 27 fn. 3 (1985). Respondents will, however, be required to sign sufficient copies of the notice to permit posting by Local 70 if the Union wishes to do so. See Deklewa, supra at 1397.

[11] In no event, however, shall the make-whole period extend beyond the 31 May 1987 expiration date of the Misco-Local 70 contract. See Deklewa, supra at 1396.

[12] The determination of which such trusts and funds Misco was required to make payments to, and, of course, the amounts necessary to make such trusts and funds whole, will be left to the compliance stage. In that latter respect, see Merryweather Optical Co., 240 NLRB 1213, 1216 fn. 7 (1979).

[13] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[14] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

(e) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps Respondents have taken to comply.

June 30, 1988

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS JOHANSEN, BABSON, AND CRACRAFT

On November 25, 1987, Administrative Law Judge James M. Kennedy issued the attached decision. The General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Respondent filed a brief in answer to the General Counsel's exceptions.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions[1] and to adopt the recommended Order.

We agree with the judge that the Respondent did not violate Section 8(a)(5) of the Act by withdrawing a previously agreed-to union-security clause from the new contract proposal it submitted to the Union on January 28, 1987. The General Counsel excepts to this finding, asserting that Dresser Industries, 264 NLRB 1088 (1982), supports her position that the Respondent improperly relied on the filing of a decertification petition as a reason for changing its bargaining position.

The General Counsel's reliance on Dresser Industries is misplaced. There the Board held that "the mere filing of a decertification petition will no longer require or permit an employer to withdraw from bargaining . . . ." Id. at 1089. The Respondent did not withdraw from bargaining; it merely withdrew from a tentative agreement that it had made with the Union on one issue and, significantly, thereafter continued to engage in negotiations for a new contract. Thus, we find no merit to the General Counsel's argument in this regard.[2]

Furthermore, we find, contrary to the General Counsel's contention, that the Respondent's explanation for its change of position does not indicate a lack of good faith. The judge found that

> [t]wo significant things had happened before Respondent made the decision to withdraw from that tentative agreement. The first was the 2-month strike which the Union abandoned without having obtained a new contract. The second was the filing of the decertification petition.[3]

Because a substantial number of the Respondent's employees after the strike was over had expressed a desire not to be represented by the Union, we find that the Respondent's decision to withdrew its prestrike union-security proposal does not warrant an inference of bad-faith bargaining in the circumstances of this case. See Olin Corp., 248 NLRB 1137, 1141 (1980).

The Board has held that the withdrawal from a tentative agreement is not a per se violation of the Act, but rather > represents only one factor to be considered in determining good- or bad-faith bargaining. In ruling on an allegation that a party has failed to bargain in good faith, it is well established that we look to the totality of circumstances reflecting the party's bargaining frame of mind.

Merrell M. Williams, 279 NLRB 82 (1986). Having considered all the circumstances of this case, including the Respondent's explanation for its retraction of its prior agreement regarding union security, its willingness to continue to engage in negotiations, the absence of evidence that the Respondent sought to frustrate the bargaining process or avoid reaching agreement, and the fact that the Respondent's conduct occurred in a context free of other unfair labor practices, we agree with the judge that the complaint should be dismissed.

ORDER

The recommended Order of the administrative law judge is adopted and the complaint is dismissed.

[1] We find it unnecessary to rely on the judge's discussion of H. K. Porter Co. v. NLRB, 397 U.S. 99 (1970).

[2] Member Cracraft agrees that Dresser Industries is inapposite. She does not pass on the question whether it was correctly decided.

[3] On December 12, 1986, an employee gave the Respondent a list of employee signatures on a document that read, "We, the employees at Aero Alloys, do not wish to have a union in our establishment." On December 16, 1986, a formal decertification petition was filed with the Board's Regional Office.

289 NLRB No. 63

June 2–4, 1987. It is based on a complaint issued by the Acting Regional Director for Region 21 of the National Labor Relations Board on March 19, 1987. The complaint is founded on charges and amended charges filed by Warehouse, Processing & Distribution Workers' Union, Local 26, International Longshoremen's & Warehousemen's Union (Union). The initial charge was filed on February 2, 1987; it was subsequently amended on February 23 and March 5. The complaint alleges that Aero Alloys (Respondent) has engaged in certain violations of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act (Act).

Issues

There are two principal issues presented by this complaint. The first is whether an individual named Lourdes "Lulu" Martinez solicited or encouraged Respondent's employees to sign a petition to decertify the Union. Subsidiary to that question, if Martinez did solicit employees to sign such a petition, is whether her conduct is attributable to Respondent because she was either its supervisor or its agent. The second is whether Respondent violated the obligation to bargain in good faith by withdrawing from an earlier tentative agreement to include a union-shop clause in a successor collective-bargaining agreement. The withdrawal occurred after the Union had abandoned a 2-month strike and after the employees had filed a decertification petition.[1]

Based on the entire record of the case, as well as my observation of the witnesses and their demeanor, I make the following

I. RESPONDENT'S BUSINESS

The pleadings demonstrate that Respondent is a manufacturer of precision metal parts, which it sells to Government defense contractors from its plant in Compton, California. The pleadings further establish that Respondent annually sells and ships goods and products valued in excess of $50,000 directly to customers located outside California. Based on these facts, Respondent has admitted that it is an employer engaged in commerce and in a business affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

Respondent admits the Union is, and has been at material times, a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background

Prior to December 1986 the Union had been the exclusive representative of Respondent's production and maintenance employees at the Compton plant. On September 26, 1986, the collective-bargaining agreement expired. According to a stipulation of the parties, on September 27, 1986, the Union engaged in an economic strike against the Employer because no successor agreement had been reached. Prior to the commencement of the strike, Respondent and the Union had exchanged proposals for a new collective-bargaining contract. One of the items that the parties had tentatively agreed on was the inclusion of a relatively standard union-shop clause.[2]

On October 16, 1986, approximately 2 weeks after the strike began, Respondent's collective-bargaining negotiators advised the Union by letter[3] that the offer that had been pending before the strike began was being withdrawn.

On October 31, 1986, Respondent proposed "an amendment to its last, best, and final offer" of September 26 and again included the union-shop clause. In the next to last paragraph of that letter, Respondent set a deadline of November 7, 1986, for the Union to accept the amended offer. The letter went on to say that if the offer was not accepted by that date Respondent would consider it as having been rejected. November 7 came and went without any action by the Union, and the strike continued.

It appears from a stipulation that during the course of the strike the Employer was able to continue its operations by the use of permanent replacement employees. On November 26, 1986, the Union made an unconditional offer on behalf of its striking members to return them to work. In early December Respondent began to recall strikers as openings occurred. Eventually, 56 strikers were recalled, though the record does not show how many actually accepted recall.

Furthermore, during a negotiation session, which also occurred on November 26, Respondent, at the urging of a Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service commissioner, agreed to put its October 31 offer back on the table. It did so, telling the Union it had until the close of business of December 4, 1986, to accept or reject.

It appears from the evidence that the Union neither accepted nor rejected the renewed offer, and the parties have stipulated that by letter dated December 12, 1986,

[1] The complaint alleges that the withdrawal of the union-security provision amounted to both "surface" and "bad faith" bargaining. At the hearing, the General Counsel's representatives conceded that the surface bargaining allegation was too broad for they did not seek to prove that Respondent had engaged in a course of conduct demonstrating an unwillingness to reach an agreement. Accordingly, I made evidentiary rulings based on that concession. Despite that, the complaint was not actually amended to delete the phrase "surface bargaining." Nonetheless, the General Counsel's brief abandons such a theory as it specifically focuses on Respondent's single act of withdrawing from the tentative agreement to include a union shop.

[2] The principal difference between the union-shop clause as proposed and most union-shop clauses is that this one contained a 60-day grace period rather than a 31-day grace period before new employees were required to join the Union.

[3] The text of the letter is as follows:

> On September 26, 1986, you advised Aero Alloys that the union membership had rejected the company's proposal for a contract settlement. Further, you stated that the union committee would not accept any concessions and rejected the company's last, best, and final offer.
> In light of your rejection, the passage of time, and the intervening circumstances, including the strike and the changes in economic conditions, Aero Alloys' last, best, and final offer has expired and is no longer in effect. Any future offers will be based upon economic conditions as they exist at the time the offer is made.

Respondent formally withdrew it. In that letter Respondent's chief negotiator concluded by again saying, "Any future proposals will be based on the economic and other conditions which exist at that time."

B. The Decertification Petition

On December 12, 1986, bargaining unit employee Patrick Mount appeared in the office of Company Controller Gerald Parker and presented him with a list of signatures. The document is in evidence as Respondent's Exhibit 12. It states, "We, the employees at Aero Alloys, do not wish to have a union in our establishment." Beneath that statement were the signatures of some 55 employees.

Parker testified that he did not know what to do about the document, so he immediately called Respondent's labor attorney Charles H. Goldstein[4] as Mount sat in the office. While Parker described the events to Goldstein, Mount left the office, returning a few minutes later with a photocopy of the document. In the meantime, according to Parker, he had received some instructions from the attorney. On Mount's return, Parker told him that the petition was not something with which the Company could be concerned. He told Mount to see the officer of the day at the NLRB's Regional Office; he also said Mount was to handle the matter on his own time. Parker did, however, accept the copy of Respondent's Exhibit 12. Parker says the copy machine Mount used is available to anyone in the Company and that Mount did not specifically ask him for permission to use it nor was he required to do so.

On December 16, 1986, Mount filed a formal decertification petition with the Board's Regional Office. On the following day the Union filed an unfair labor practice charge that blocked the petition.[5] Between November 26, 1986, and January 28, 1987, no negotiation sessions were held. However, on December 26 the Union's chief negotiator, Luisa Gratz, wrote Company President Carl F. Nowak a letter in which she asserted that during some recent bargaining sessions, the Union had asked for, but had not received, information regarding the Employer's proposed health care changes. She made a specific demand for the details of the new program, including the cost to each employee and how often such payments would be deducted from paychecks.

Attorney Goldstein responded by letter dated January 7. Although he denied that the Company had failed to provide the information, he nonetheless transmitted to the Union material published by the administrator of the health plan, Kaiser Permanente, as well as material published by the dental plan, Confed Admin Services, Inc. In addition, Goldstein said he had asked the Company to delay implementation of the two plans in order to give the Union an opportunity to bargain with the Company regarding them.

C. The Decision to Withdraw the Union-Shop Proposal

Nowak testified that the reason Goldstein sent his letter explaining the health plan changes was because of a meeting that he had held with his superiors at Chromalloy-American Corporation[6] on January 5. At that meeting they had discussed the Union's letter of December 26, and had decided it deserved a response. During the meeting, however, the Company also decided that it would withdraw from the earlier tentative agreement regarding the union-shop clause. Nowak says they also discussed whether Respondent would maintain that position in the event that a contract was reached on all terms except that one. He says they determined they would be "flexible" if that occurred.

D. Further Negotiations

After union negotiator Gratz wrote a response to Goldstein's January 7 letter, the parties agreed to another negotiation session to be held on January 28, 1987. At that meeting, Goldstein issued a full proposal that was quite detailed, but that for the first time deleted any reference to the union-shop clause. According to Nowak, the Union's negotiators did not refer to the deletion in any way.

Two more meetings were held shortly thereafter. The first on February 2 and the second the following day, February 3. Both meetings were conducted under the auspices of the FMCS. At the beginning of the February 2 meeting, Goldstein gave another proposal to the Union. Like the January 28 proposal, it was detailed and consisted of eight pages plus an appendix. As before, it deleted the union-shop language.

Although the mediator attempted to assist the parties in resolving their differences, nothing of significance occurred on February 2. According to Nowak, on February 3 he told Mediator Phyllis Cayse that the deletion of the union-shop proposal was to reflect what the employees were doing on their own when they had filed their decertification petition in December. He says he told Cayse that the Company would nonetheless be flexible on the union-shop issue. He says Cayse then took his comment back to the Union. The parties have stipulated that eventually the Union came back with an 11-item counterproposal, one of which said that there would be "no change in union security." It is apparent, from reading the remainder of the Union's counterproposal, that the parties were still far apart on wages, maintenance of benefits, medical and dental plans, health care waiting period, holidays, vacations, leave of absence policy, no-strike and no-lockout, and sick leave.

Union negotiator Hector Cepeda denied that the mediator ever told the Union that the Company was flexible on union security. However, he testified that mediator Cayse had said she did not know if the Company's position on union security was final. She had suggested the Union make a counterproposal to find out. It was for this reason, says Cepeda, that the Union made its proposal of February 3.

[4] Goldstein also served as Respondent's chief negotiator.

[5] This was the second charge that the Union had filed. The first was filed on October 22, but had been withdrawn on December 10. The parties have stipulated that the Regional Director processed the second charge, which was amended twice, by deferring a portion of it to arbitration. On January 30, 1987, the remainder was withdrawn.

[6] Respondent is a subsidiary of that conglomerate.

I think it is fair to say, however, that the proposal in all other respects was so different from the Company's proposal that it did not put the union-security issue to any sort of meaningful test. For example, the Company's proposal prior to the strike had been a 15-percent wage cut. The strike had ensued, but during the strike the Employer had implemented the 15-percent wage reduction. The lower wage scale was still in effect on February 3 when the Union's counterproposal asked that wages be the same as during the previous contract. With such a wide difference in wages and with Respondent's salary proposal having survived the strike, the Union's February 3 proposal is a curiosity.

If Cepeda is correct, that the mediator had suggested the Union put Respondent to a test to see if its position on a union shop was final, the February 3 proposal did not accomplish it. All it did was to furrow already plowed ground both with respect to union-security and to nearly every other proposal.

Nowak testified that after he had reviewed the February 3 counterproposal, he concluded that the parties were as far apart as ever.

The Company's proposal of February 2 had advised the Union that unless the offer was accepted by February 12, the Company would consider it rejected and the Company would implement it.

E. The Company Responds to Rumors

According to Nowak, within a day or two of the February 3 meeting, company officials began to hear rumors that there might be either another strike or a slowdown. As a result of that rumor, whether accurate or not, Nowak asked attorney Goldstein to prepare a notice to the employees in response. On February 5 Nowak issued a letter to employees entitled "Where We Stand." The letter adverted to the previous strike and said if the Union called another, the Company would again replace the striking employees and continue to operate. In the second paragraph Nowak observed that the employees had recently filed a decertification petition and accused the Union of filing "a number of phony unfair labor practice charges to avoid going before Aero Alloys' employees for a government secret ballot election. . . ." He asserted that the Company had successfully defended each of the unfair labor practice charges and went on to say, "To blunt the Union's attempt to prevent you from exercising your right to vote, the Company has proposed, in its recent negotiations with the Union, that no employee be forced to join the Union and pay dues in order to work at Aero Alloys. The Union has rejected this proposal but it is part of Aero Alloys' last, best, and final offer."

The letter concluded by saying the Union had until February 12 to accept or reject the offer, noting that if the employees again exercised their right to strike, it would be naive to think another strike would cause the Company to change its position.

F. Lourdes "Lulu" Martinez

1. Duties

Lourdes "Lulu" Martinez was hired on November 20, 1986, 7 weeks after the strike began and a week before it ended. She testified that she was hired by Accounting Supervisor Debbie Ardizzone, but was also interviewed by the controller, Parker. Martinez had been referred to Respondent by an employment agency because of her experience in working with payroll. Both she and Nowak say her job had no actual title, but she made out the payroll and served as the personnel clerk. She replaced a part-time payroll clerk who had left and also assumed some personnel duties previously performed by Ardizzone. She received an hourly wage of $6.50 per hour. In addition to Martinez' payroll and personnel duties, because she was bilingual in English and Spanish, she served as a translator for Nowak, Parker, and General Manager Carl Rezmer.

Martinez said when she was first hired, her principal duty was to complete and maintain the personnel files of the individuals who had been hired as strike replacements. As the strike ended and Respondent began to recall strikers, she was asked to contact former strikers to tell them to return to work. She, Nowak, and Parker all testified that the decision to recall individual employees was made by General Manager Rezmer and Nowak. They compiled a list of strikers who wished to return and, when appropriate, would tell Martinez when to contact a specific individual. She then followed their instructions.

The parties have stipulated that between December 2, 1986, and February 18, 1987, at least 57 Western Union telegrams were sent to employees, which were signed by Martinez. Examplers of those telegrams are in evidence as General Counsel's Exhibits 2 and 3. The parties have further stipulated that of those 57 telegrams, 5 identified Martinez as the "Director of Personnel." The remainder contain only her signature without any title. Fifty-six of those telegrams were directed to strikers telling them to report to work while one informed a striker that he was no longer employed.

Nowak, Parker, and Martinez all testified that Martinez never held the title of personnel director, personnel supervisor, or personnel manager. It appears from their testimony that no one at Respondent ever held such a title. Martinez testified that she never told Western Union that she had such a title, and so far as she can determine, the title, which appears on those five telegrams, is a Western Union mistake. She surmises that Western Union may have made the mistake when she told their telephone operator to write "payroll/personnel office" or "personnel office" under her name.

She further explains that Parker had told her to sign the wires herself so that the employees who spoke only Spanish would ask for her. She could more easily converse with them than could the three managers who did not speak that language.

Martinez also remembers that when she noticed the five telegrams, which incorrectly described her position, she told her immediate supervisor Debbie Ardizzone, who told her it was a minor mistake that could be corrected later. The correction was never made.

It also appears that Martinez had some specific safety-related duties. She maintained a supply of safety gloves and glasses. When individual supervisors ran out of those items, she was the source of resupply. She also attended safety committee meetings, apparently as a clerical or as a translator. She said that she was not actually a member of the safety committee and there is no evidence that she participated in safety meetings in a substantive way. She did prepare a bulletin board notice as required by the Occupational Safety and Health Administration that listed workdays lost to accidents. She noted at the bottom of the notice that she had prepared those figures.

2. The trim department meeting

According to Martinez, shortly before Christmas 1986 Parker instructed her to get the employees to sign the new health plan authorization forms. It will be recalled that Respondent was then in the process of implementing its last offer, which included a change in health plans. Pursuant to Parker's directive, Martinez caused those forms to be circulated throughout the plant. Many of the employees did not understand or appreciate what was occurring and did not sign them. If an employee did not sign the form, it meant that the employee would not be covered when the change was implemented. Martinez compiled a list of employees who had not signed the form and began contacting them. One group of employees who had not signed was from the trim department.

On approximately December 19, she went to the trim department, spoke to the supervisor, and managed to arrange a short meeting of about six or eight employees in a nearby exit to the parking lot. Three of those employees, Pablo Larios, Angel Estrada, and Margarito de Santiago, testified about that meeting.

Larios testified that Martinez said she needed signatures to get the Union out; the Company could then give employees benefits more freely, such as a $2 raise for de Santiago. He says she also said something to the effect that if the employees got the Union out, they would "get their 15 percent back," meaning the 15-percent salary loss would be restored. He remembers she referred somehow to a man who had been taking signatures the day before.

Estrada testified that Martinez told the gathering that the Company would return the 15-percent pay cut if the employees would "take out the Union." He says she also said the Company could give the employees raises and asserts Martinez said nothing about any fringe benefits. On cross-examination, he suffered some memory lapses in other areas and then agreed he could not remember much about the meeting. In his pretrial affidavit he had said he could not recall Martinez saying anything regarding a petition being passed around. In the same affidavit, he quotes Martinez as saying that if the employees wanted a union it was their own personal business. Unlike Larios, he never testified that Martinez asked him to sign anything.

Margarito de Santiago first said that he did not pay that much attention to Martinez during this gathering, but remembers she said something like, "The Union was not allowing her to give me the $2" and "they had signatures already." De Santiago did not see a list of signatures, but remembers Martinez said she had them. He says Martinez did not ask him to sign anything.

Martinez specifically denies everything these three employees said. She denies saying the meeting was called to gather names to get the Union out. She said she never told anyone that the Company needed more signatures to get rid of the Union; neither did she refer to raises or say that the Union would not let her give an employee a raise. Contrary to Estrada, she said she never told him the Company would give back the 15 percent if there was no Union, never said there would be more benefits without the Union, and never said the Company could not give raises because the Union would not allow it.

She did testify that during the trim department meeting Larios said that the employees did not wish to fill out her paperwork, that they had been told not to fill it out, and that they were afraid to do so. She remembers him saying their decision had something to do with the Union. She testified, "And I kept explaining to them over and over again that I had nothing to do with the Union, that I was just doing my job to see to it that they filled out the health enrollment cards, so they could have insurance for the year 1987." Despite her explanations, Larios responded, "Well, I am for the Union." She says she replied, "It is your opinion. You decide whose side you're on. I am not going to be against nor with you." Later she testified she told them "personally" she was "not for the Union." Nonetheless, she concluded by telling them she was "out of it."

De Santiago also testified that about 3 days before Christmas, in a private meeting with Martinez at the foreman's desk, and in the presence of his brother, Manuel, Martinez offered to get him a raise after the new year. Almost immediately he backed away from that version claiming she said she would "try" to get him a raise. Curiously, de Santiago does not connect this wage discussion with the Union in any fashion. In any event, Martinez denies having such a conversation, adding that she would not have said it because she had no such power.

IV. ANALYSIS AND CONCLUSIONS

I think it is apparent from the evidence that both issues presented by the complaint seem to be connected. The General Counsel contends that the Respondent sponsored the decertification petition and subsequently used it as the justification for engaging in an act of bad-faith bargaining, i.e., withdrawing from the tentative agreement to include a union-security clause in the new collective-bargaining contract. I conclude, however, that the evidence does not show the connection to be real. The General Counsel has failed to prove that Lulu Martinez engaged in any activity relating to the decertification petition. Even if she had, the General Counsel has also failed to prove that she was either a supervisor, agent, or apparent agent of Respondent in that endeavor. The evidence shows her to be only an office clerical employee. Second, I conclude that the mere act of withdrawing a proposal from a tentative agreement, after a strike and when the circumstances have dramatically changed, does not constitute a breach of the good-faith bargaining obligation.

A. Martinez' Conduct

The evidence demonstrates that Martinez was an ordinary employee, albeit employed outside the bargaining unit, who functioned as a clerical and as a translator. She was an hourly employee who operated solely under the direction of the Company's managers and supervisors. The only reason she was even involved in the striker recall process was because she was bilingual and had personnel functions. She is an able, articulate person and an excellent choice for the duty of being a conduit of management. She did not have any authority to use independent judgment, but operated in a routine and clerical way. Clearly she was not a supervisor as defined by Section 2(11) of the Act.

Second, being a conduit for management does not necessarily make her an agent either. There is absolutely no evidence that she was given any general authority to speak of on behalf of management. However, because the evidence does not show that she engaged in the conduct complained of, the ultimate question of her agency need not be reached. Even so, I think it is clear that she is not, and could not reasonably be perceived as, an agent. I note that the only time she ever discussed the Union was during the meeting near the doorway in December. At that time she told the employees that although she was personally against the Union, the choice of belonging to the Union belonged to them and she was "out of it." During that meeting, Larios had pressed her for an answer about her personal view, and she gave it together with an appropriate disclaimer.

It is, I suppose, true that the five telegrams in which Western Union mistakenly gave her the title of personnel director could have been repudiated. Yet, even the employees who testified about her authority seemed to know what her job was. They knew she worked in a cubical alongside other clericals and knew she prepared paychecks and had the power only to make mathematical corrections. The other tasks she performed were only at the specific direction of higher management or when she acted as a translator for them. The OSHA notice is clearly evidence of a clerical duty, not evidence of either agency or supervisory authority.[7]

Aside from Martinez' authority or apparent authority, however, it is clear that the General Counsel has failed to prove by credible evidence that Martinez ever solicited employees to sign any paper relating to the decertification. The decertification petition was circulated by bargaining unit employee Patrick Mount. He had obtained 55 signatures by December 12 and the General Counsel has not demonstrated that the 55 were insufficient to constitute the required 30-percent showing of interest to warrant the processing of the petition. Certainly the General Counsel has not shown that the Regional Director had asked for more before December 19. If Mount had obtained the required 30 percent, or if the Director had not yet made a determination that more were needed, there would have been no impetus for Martinez or anyone else to be soliciting additional signatures on December 19.

Moreover, the witnesses that the General Counsel presented regarding what was said at the doorway meeting cannot be credited. Larios, for example, took inconsistent positions regarding Martinez' job. At first on cross-examination, he claimed he did not know what position Martinez held; later, he said he knew she was an office employee. He also knew she did some translation. Finally, he said he had never seen anything describing Martinez as the personnel director. Clearly Larios knew Martinez was a clerical employee and had no managerial authority, yet he did not wish to reveal his knowledge. Similarly, Estrada did not present himself well. On one occasion he had an unexplained memory loss and he often let his voice fall. He even undercut his already weak testimony by saying he was not paying attention during the meeting. His pretrial affidavit was somewhat inconsistent with his testimony and he was generally an unimpressive witness. Last, Margarito de Santiago admitted that he was not paying that much attention. Both he and Estrada say Martinez did not ask them to sign anything. If they are to be believed, she did not ask them to sign either a health plan authorization card or a decertification petition.

Frankly, these three witnesses suffer from several and varied shortcomings. These include demeanor matters, testimonial inconsistencies, and confusion. All appear disgruntled over the wage loss. In these circumstances I believe much of their testimony on critical issues is the product of either confusion or dissemblance. Before Respondent even began to present its case, the testimony of these three gave me pause.

On hearing Martinez, however, it became quite apparent that she had a good understanding of what she was saying and why she was saying it. Her testimony that Larios responded to her request that he sign the health authorization card by bringing up the Union and her characterization of him as confused and mistrustful seems quite credible. I have no difficulty in finding that she called the meeting for the purpose of obtaining the health authorizations and had no other purpose. The slip of paper that she had in her hand contained the names of those individuals who had not signed the health plan forms. They were not signatures on a decertification petition.[8]

Furthermore, that she was a new employee unlikely to have authority to grant wage increases or recommend them seems clear on the record. That being the case, and considering Respondent had successfully endured a 60-day strike to obtain a 15-percent wage reduction, it seems improbable that she or anyone in management would be offering wage increases in December, for insufficient time had passed to determine whether the wage reduction had put the plant in an acceptable financial position. Finally, if Respondent were to offer wage increases to dissuade employees from the Union, she would not have been the appropriate spokesperson for that purpose. Such promises would have been made by someone far more authoritative than she. Accordingly, I conclude that Martinez' testimony is the more credible of the two versions. Under those circumstances I find the General Counsel has not proven that Martinez committed the acts alleged in the complaint or that Respondent provided any assistance to those employees who were engaged in soliciting signatures to support the decertification petition.

[7] On February 13, 1987, Martinez did issue, in English and Spanish, a memo to employees announcing that new dental and health coverage were being implemented on that date. She did not sign it with any title and says she was directed to issue the memo by Nowak because Parker, who normally would have handled the matter had just left the Company. Even assuming that this memo would elevate her in the eyes of employees from clerical employee to a quasi-management job, the memo was not issued until well after the transactions complained of in the complaint. It does not prove anything regarding her authority or apparent authority the previous December.

[8] Presumably, Mount had already submitted his signature list to the Regional Office on December 16. The General Counsel has not shown that a supplemental list of signatures ever existed, much less was needed.

B. Withdrawing from the Tentative Agreement on Union Security

The General Counsel does not complain that Respondent has engaged in a course of conduct of bad-faith bargaining. Instead, her representatives maintain that, in late January, Respondent withdrew from one tentative agreement, which it had made with the Union before the strike, that the new contract would contain a union-shop clause. Two significant things had happened before Respondent made the decision to withdraw from that tentative agreement. The first was the 2-month strike that the Union abandoned without having obtained a new contract. The second was the filing of the decertification petition. According to Nowak, the Company's decision to withdraw from the tentative agreement was actually made in early January. It did not manifest itself, however, until the company proposal of January 28. At that point the Union had filed an unfair labor practice charge that had effectively blocked the processing of the decertification petition.

Despite the issues that the petition and the charge raised, Respondent nonetheless proceeded to engage in three collective-bargaining sessions thereafter. Not until two of those had passed did the Union even express a concern about the proposed loss of the union-security clause. When it finally did so, the credible evidence is that Nowak told the mediator that the Company would be flexible on that issue if agreement could be reached on other matters. It appears from inferences drawn from Cepeda's testimony that the mediator did in fact transmit Nowak's message to the union negotiators, but they were far more interested in testing the Company's resolve in other areas. It is true that the Union's counterproposal called for reinstatement of the union-shop clause but, ignoring the lost strike, proposed a general return to the prior contract. It is fair to say in that situation that neither the presence nor the absence of a union-security clause had anything to do with the status of negotiations at that stage. The topic was not considered to be a critical issue. If it had been, the Union would have compromised other areas of its proposal and an appropriate test would have been made to determine whether the union-security clause was truly a stumbling block. It chose instead to try to salvage the lost wages and other money matters, thereby demonstrating that those were the main issues, not union security.

In any event, it is quite clear that the withdrawal of a single provision of a tentative agreement is not an act of bad-faith bargaining. American Thread Co., 274 NLRB 1112 (1985); O'Malley Lumber Co., 234 NLRB 1171, 1179–1180 (1980); cf. Reliable Tool Co., 268 NLRB 101 (1983). Moreover, when circumstances have changed, as they did here, due to the lost strike, modification of bargaining positions is permissible. Valley Oil Co., 210 NLRB 370, 385 (1974).

The Supreme Court has held it is not for the Board to determine whether a contract should contain a specific clause. H. K. Porter Co. v. NLRB, 397 U.S. 99 (1970). If I were to conclude that the withdrawal of this provision in circumstances that would not frustrate bargaining elsewhere was an unfair labor practice, I would necessarily be deciding that this collective-bargaining contract must contain a union-security clause. Under the Porter doctrine, the Board may not issue such an order Because there is no evidence that Respondent was using this issue as a device to frustrate bargaining, it would be inappropriate under Porter to find that Respondent committed an unfair labor practice by withdrawing from the tentative agreement.[9]

I conclude, therefore, that the General Counsel has failed to prove any violations of the Act as alleged, and I will recommend that the complaint be dismissed in its entirety.

Based on these findings of fact and legal analysis, I make the following

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. The Respondent, Aero Alloys, is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union, Warehouse, Processing & Distribution Workers' Union, Local 26, International Longshoremen's & Warehousemen's Union, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. The General Counsel has failed to prove the allegations in the complaint alleging that Respondent had violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act.

[9] Although the parties wish to litigate the meaning of the "Where We Stand" letter recited in sec. III,E, a definitive analysis would serve no purpose. If I were to agree with the General Counsel that the letter, as well as Nowak's statement that Respondent was recognizing the decertification petition by withdrawing the union-shop proposal, evidenced a desire to beard the Union, it would not follow that such a desire would also be evidence of bad-faith bargaining. When that letter was issued and when Nowak made his statement, Respondent had already made its proposal based on its perception of changed circumstances and the proposal was perfectly lawful. If it used the letter as an opportunity to take advantage of the Union's now demonstrated weakness, it was simply doing what economic circumstances permitted. American Thread, supra.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[10]

The complaint is dismissed in its entirety.

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On February 11, 1983, Administrative Law Judge Michael O. Miller issued the attached supplemental decision. The General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and The Metallic Lathers' Union of New York and Vicinity Local 46 of The Wood, Wire and Metal Lathers' International Union (the Applicant) filed a brief in opposition to the General Counsel's exceptions. The General Counsel then filed a motion to strike certain portions of the Applicant's brief.[1] The Applicant filed a response in opposition to the motion to strike as well as a supplemental memorandum contesting the Board's jurisdiction to hear and decide exceptions to the judge's decision.[2] Finally, the General Counsel filed a supplemental brief in opposition to this memorandum.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions, motions, and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions only to the extent consistent with this Supplemental Decision and Order.

On March 4, 1982, the Board issued a Decision and Order in the underlying unfair labor practice case.[3] On April 5, 1982, the Applicant applied for an award of attorney's fees and expenses pursuant to the Equal Access to Justice Act (EAJA), 5 U.S.C. § 504 (1982).[4] In the attached supplemental decision, the judge found that the application was timely filed, the Applicant is an eligible party, and the position of the General Counsel in the underlying case was not "substantially justified" with respect to certain allegations within the meaning of EAJA. Accordingly, the judge recommended that the Applicant be reimbursed for certain specified fees and expenses incurred in the underlying unfair labor practice proceeding and in the instant EAJA proceeding.

Initially, we must rule on the judge's denial of the General Counsel's motion to strike the application as untimely filed. Analogizing applications filed under EAJA to those filed under the Federal Tort Claims Act, the judge concluded that the application was timely filed, even though it was filed 2 calendar days beyond the 30-day filing period provided in EAJA, Section 504(a)(2). The 30th day following issuance of the Board's Decision and Order, however, fell on Saturday, April 3, 1983. In B. J. Heating, 268 NLRB 643 (1984), the Board held that when the 30th day falls on a Saturday, Sunday, or legal holiday, an application filed on the first business day following the expiration day is timely. Accordingly, we agree with the judge that the application was timely filed because it was filed on the first business day following the 30th-day deadline, which fell on a Saturday.

The General Counsel contests the Applicant's eligibility for an award, contending that, pursuant to Section 102.143(g) of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the net worth of the Applicant must be aggregated with that of its alleged affiliates, The Wood, Wire and Metal Lathers' International Union, and the local unions affiliated with that International, to determine whether the Applicant is a qualifying "party"[5] under EAJA. We find it unnecessary to resolve this eligibility issue in light of our ultimate conclusion that the General Counsel's position in the unfair labor practice proceeding was substantially justified as discussed below.

[1] The General Counsel moved to strike as untimely all statements contained in the Applicant's opposition to the General Counsel's exceptions that deny or contest the Applicant's failure to cooperate in the investigation of the underlying unfair labor practice case. In support of the motion, the General Counsel points out that the judge, in his supplemental decision, specifically found that the Union cooperated only minimally in the investigation of the unfair labor practice charges. The Applicant did not except to this, or any other, part of the judge's supplemental decision. Accordingly, since the Applicant's assertions of cooperation are raised for the first time in its brief, we grant the General Counsel's motion to strike them. However, in view of our determination that the General Counsel presented evidence, which if credited and found sufficiently probative would have constituted a prima facie case, we find it unnecessary to rely on the Applicant's minimal cooperation in the investigation of the underlying charges.

[2] In its supplemental memorandum contesting the jurisdiction of the Board to hear and decide the General Counsel's exceptions, the Applicant contends that the Board has no jurisdiction to review the judge's decision based on the original language in the Equal Access to Justice Act (EAJA), 5 U.S.C. § 504 (1982).

Subsequent to the filing of this motion, the Board had occasion to consider this very issue in Lion Uniform, 285 NLRB 249 (1987). There, the Board found that recent amendments to EAJA make clear that the agency, rather than the administrative law judge, makes the final decision on the award of attorney's fees.

[4] Subsequently, EAJA was amended. See Pub. L. 99-80, 99 Stat. 183-187 (1985).

[5] In defining a "party" entitled to recover expenses incurred in an administrative proceeding, 5 U.S.C. § 605(b)(1)(B), which is the applicable subsection of EAJA, reads in relevant part:

> "Party" means a party as defined in 5 U.S.C. 551(3), who is . . . (ii) any owner of an unincorporated business, or any partnership, corpo-

Assuming the Applicant's eligibility, we turn to the standards to be applied in making an award. Section 504(a)(1) of EAJA provides that an award shall be made to a prevailing party unless "the position of the agency as a party to the proceeding was substantially justified or . . . special circumstances make an award unjust." The Board's Rules and Regulations provide that an applicant may receive an award for fees and expenses incurred in connection with an adversary adjudication if it prevailed in that proceeding or in a significant and discrete substantive portion of that proceeding, unless the General Counsel proves that her position in the unfair labor practice case, over which the applicant has prevailed, was substantially justified.[6] Further, in order to defeat a claim for fees and expenses under EAJA, the General Counsel must meet that burden with respect to each readily identifiable stage of the proceeding.[7] Congress has emphasized that no adverse inferences are to be drawn from the fact that the Government did not prevail in the adversary adjudication. Nor does the standard require the Government to establish that its decision to litigate was based on a substantial probability of prevailing.[8]

Concerning the merits of this application, a brief review of the underlying unfair labor practice case is in order. The Metallic Lathers' Union of New York and Vicinity Local 46 of The Wood, Wire and Metal Lathers' International Union (the Union) operates an exclusive hiring hall for the referral of workmen in the lathing and structural steel reinforcing trades. The General Counsel contended in the underlying complaint that the Union had violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) and (2) of the Act by discriminatorily giving preference in referrals to its members (journeymen or bookmen) and denying referrals to permitmen (nonmembers and those who are members of other locals). This discrimination, it was alleged, occurred through the following means: (a) the Union failed to use the court-mandated priority list in making job referrals; (b) the Union permitted members to circumvent the hiring hall rules by obtaining jobs with contractors without registering at the union hall (direct hires); (c) the Union allowed members to return to work for a contractor after a layoff in excess of 1 day (callbacks), all to the detriment of the permitmen; and (d) the Union gave preference in referrals to members and failed and refused to refer nonmembers who were entitled to such referrals.

The hearing opened on October 31, 1978, and was postponed indefinitely pending settlement discussions. Once the hearing resumed in September 1980, evidence was revealed, which was apparently unknown to the General Counsel and which established that use of the priority lists had been abandoned about September 1, 1976, and referrals after that date were made according to the order of daily sign-in.

After the General Counsel's case-in-chief, the Respondent moved for dismissal, contending that the evidence did not support the allegations. The judge denied the motion.

In ruling on the application for attorney's fees, the judge found that > the General Counsel had a reasonable basis in fact for issuing the complaint, amending it when the hearing reopened, and proceeding through the litigation, at least until that point where its misunderstandings with respect to the discontinuance of the priority lists became obvious. Accordingly, to the extent described above, I find that General Counsel's position was substantially justified.[9]

The judge further found, however, that > when it became clear that the evidence would not support complaint allegations based upon alleged breaches of the priority system, General Counsel changed its theory to allege more generally widespread discrimination against the permit men based upon its analysis of the activity reports showing that bookmen received far more referrals, with far fewer hiring hall registrations, than permit men.

> ration, association, unit of local government, or organization, the net worth of which did not exceed $7,000,000 at the time the adversary adjudication was initiated, and which had not more than 500 employees at the time the adversary adjudication was initiated.

[6] Board's Rules and Regulations, Secs. 102.143(b), 102.144(a). The judge's supplemental decision in this case issued February 11, 1983, prior to the 1985 amendments to EAJA. Subsequent to those amendments, effective May 15, 1986, the Board revised Sec. 102.144(a) of its Rules and Regulations regarding substantial justification. That section now states (51 Fed. Reg. 17732 (1986)):

> An eligible applicant may receive an award for fees and expenses incurred in connection with an adversary adjudication or in connection with a significant and discrete substantive portion of that proceeding, unless the position of the General Counsel over which the applicant has prevailed was substantially justified. The burden of proof that an award should not be made to an eligible applicant is on the General Counsel, who may avoid an award by showing that the General Counsel's position in the proceeding was substantially justified.

[9] The Applicant did not file exceptions to this finding.

The judge concluded that the General Counsel had failed to sustain the burden of proving that the position with respect to callbacks and direct hires was substantially justified. In the judge's estimation, the General Counsel's theory, based on a comparison of member versus nonmember referrals, had neither a factual nor a legal basis. The judge also found that the General Counsel's position with respect to the steward-referral issue was not substantially justified.[10]

In her exceptions to these findings, the General Counsel contends that the judge erred in treating the callback and direct-hire allegations as significant and discrete portions of the case, when in fact they were but subparts of the overall theory of violation, i.e., that the Applicant was operating its hiring hall in a discriminatory manner, providing preferential treatment for members over nonmembers. The General Counsel also contends that the judge erred in concluding that the General Counsel was not substantially justified in issuing a complaint on these issues. Finally, the General Counsel argues that the judge erred in finding that the General Counsel was not substantially justified in continuing to litigate all allegations after September 22, 1980.

We find merit in the General Counsel's exceptions because the direct-hire and callback allegations and the steward-referrals issue do not constitute a "significant and discrete portion of the proceeding."[11] In view of the fact that the Applicant's entire hiring hall operations were under scrutiny, it incurred no discernible additional effort in litigating the General Counsel's overall theory of discrimination. Moreover, we disagree with the judge's assessment that the General Counsel's theory was "changed" to allege that bookmen received far more referrals, with far fewer hiring hall registrations, than permitmen. As noted earlier in the discussion of the procedural history of this case, the General Counsel initially made this allegation of discrimination in the September 25, 1978 amended consolidated complaint and supported it with referral activity reports. This allegation was not added after the testimony was adduced regarding discontinuance of the priority list.

Additionally, even assuming arguendo that the direct-hire and callback allegations do represent a "significant and discrete" portion of the unfair labor practice proceeding, we disagree with the judge's finding that the General Counsel was not substantially justified in issuing a complaint on those allegations. In our view, the resolution of the callback and direct-hire allegations, as with the out-of-priority allegation, depended on inferences[12] to be drawn from a statistical and factual analysis of the activity reports as well as credibility resolutions[13] based on the witnesses' testimony. Even the judge concluded in the initial litigation that, "[e]xamined broadly, comparing only the member referrals against those received by nonmembers, the statistics would seem to support the General Counsel's contentions."[14] Moreover, "[i]t would appear from the record that journeymen benefited more frequently from direct hires and callbacks than did permitmen."[15] At the time the complaint issued, the General Counsel was not basing the case only on reasonable inferences to be drawn from the activity reports. Rather, the General Counsel relied also on the Charging Parties' affidavits outlining a proclivity on the part of business agents to favor members over nonmembers when making referrals.[16] After reviewing the testimony from the General Counsel's witnesses, the judge found that "[c]ertain statements by the business agents do tend to show some desire on their part to prefer members."[17]

In pursuing the decision to issue a complaint and take the case to hearing, the General Counsel was armed with sworn affidavits from the Charging Parties that indicated discriminatory motivation on the part of the business agents in their referral practices, together with the statistical analysis gleaned from referral data contained in the activity reports, which it is reasonable to view as substantial evidence supporting the Charging Parties' allegations. In addition, there was legal precedent establishing that in certain circumstances the Board would find a violation of Section 8(b)(1)(A) and (2) based primarily on statistical evidence.[18]

[10] In the underlying decision, the judge found that the Union had discriminatorily refused to appoint stewards from among journeymen members of other locals, in violation of Sec. 8(b)(1)(A) and (2) of the Act. The Board ultimately concluded that the issue had not been litigated at trial and reversed the judge's finding.

Thus, the General Counsel presented evidence that, if credited and found sufficiently probative[19] by the factfinder, would prima facie establish the merits of the contentions the General Counsel was making. The General Counsel's case did not prevail, in part, because the judge concluded that the statistical record was too open to the possibility of error and he did not find the discriminatory motive testimony sufficiently extensive or persuasive to support the finding of a violation. Such weighing of facts and drawing of inferences is not the General Counsel's province in the investigative stage of a proceeding. The weighing of various explanations for the apparent discriminatory treatment of nonmembers and the drawing of inferences from the testimony are, in the first instance, the exclusive province of the judge; they require submission of the case to the factfinding process of litigation.

The judge also accused the General Counsel of disregarding recognized exceptions to the referral system. In our view, the General Counsel prudently concluded that a reasonable evidentiary inference could be drawn from what was perceived to be a striking statistical contrast between member and nonmember referrals, notwithstanding the recognized exceptions to the referral procedures. The inference could also be drawn that a substantial number of special exception designations were false.

Accordingly, we find that the General Counsel had substantial justification for issuing the complaint and proceeding to hearing on all allegations of the complaint, including the callback and direct-hire allegations. Those allegations were but subparts of the overall allegation that the Applicant was operating its hiring hall in a discriminatory fashion. Further, given the evidence adduced and the type of violations alleged, the General Counsel was substantially justified in continuing to litigate the entire case up to final resolution of the issues by the Board.

The application will be denied in its entirety.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the application for attorney's fees and expenses filed by The Metallic Lathers' Union of New York and Vicinity Local 46 of The Wood, Wire and Metal Lathers' International Union pursuant to the Equal Access to Justice Act and the Board's Rules and Regulations is denied.

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION

Equal Access to Justice Act

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

MICHAEL O. MILLER, Administrative Law Judge. These consolidated cases were tried before me in New York, New York, on October 31, 1978; September 17, 18, and 22, 1980, December 15, 16, and 17, 1980; and January 22, 1981. In my decision, dated July 30, 1981, I recommended that the consolidated complaints be dismissed in all respects save one. The General Counsel and Respondent filed exceptions to my recommended Order and, on March 4, 1982, the Board issued its Decision and Order, 260 NLRB 624 (1982) dismissing the consolidated complaints in their entirety.[1]

By an application received by the Board on April 5, 1982, as subsequently revised, The Metallic Lathers' Union of New York and Vicinity Local 46 of The Wood, Wire and Metal Lathers' Union (the Applicant or the Union), seeks an award of attorney fees and expenses in the amount of $44,808 under the Equal Access to Justice Act (EAJA), Pub. L. 96-481, 94 Stat. 2325, 5 U.S.C. § 504 and Sec. 102.143 et seq. of the Board's Rules and Regulations.[2] By Order of the Board dated April 9, 1982, that application was referred to me for appropriate action.

Following denial of the General Counsel's motion to dismiss the EAJA application and the Applicant's submission of additional information as directed in my June 23, 1982 Order, the General Counsel, on October 6, 1982, filed its answer together with a supporting memorandum and other documents. On October 28, the Applicant submitted a reply memorandum.

The issue having thus been joined, this decision is made on the documents in the record pursuant to Section 102.153(a) and (b) of the Board's Rules and Regulations.

I. THE ISSUES

The following issues will be treated seriatim

A. Was the application timely filed?

B. Is the Applicant an eligible party under EAJA?

C. Was the position of the General Counsel in this litigation substantially justified?

D. May the Applicant recover fees and expenses incurred prior to October 1, 1981?

E. May the Applicant recover fees and expenses incurred in prosecuting its EAJA application?

F. To what reasonable fees and expenses is the Applicant entitled?

[19] There is no bright-line test to apply in making a determination on what set of circumstances in an out-of-order referral case is sufficient to establish a violation of the Act or how many out-of-order referrals are necessary to establish a pattern of unlawful conduct. See the court's discussion in Electrical Workers IBEW Local 211 v. NLRB, 821 F.2d 206 (3d Cir. 1987).

[1] I had found that the Respondent Union had discriminatorily refused to appoint stewards from among the Local 46 permitmen who were journeymen in other locals, in violation of Section 8(b)(1)(A) and (2). The Board held that the General Counsel had failed to put this question in issue at the hearing, thereby denying the Union an opportunity to litigate the matter fully and to present evidence justifying its conduct. Thus, the issue had not been sufficiently litigated.

[2] By its revision, the Applicant seeks those additional fees and expenses incurred in pressing its EAJA application.

II. DISCUSSION

A. Timeliness

EAJA, Section 504(a)(2), and the Board's Rules, Section 102.148 require that an application for fees and expenses be filed within "30 days after the entry of the Board's final order," the "final disposition in the adversary adjudication." In the instant case, the Board's Order issued on March 4, 1982, and Respondent's application, while "dated and apparently served by mail on April 1, 1982,"[3] was filed with the Board on April 5, 1982, numerically beyond the 30-day limitation period. The General Counsel has moved for dismissal of the application as untimely.

In my earlier Order denying the General Counsel's motion to dismiss, I concluded that the application had been timely filed, stating the following:

> The Board's Order referring Respondent's application to me establishes that it was filed with the Board on April 5, 1982, 2 calendar days beyond the 30 day filing period provided in EAJA Sec. 504(a)(2). The thirtieth day following issuance of the Board's Decision and Order herein, however, fell on Saturday, April 3, 1982. Pursuant to the Board's Rules and Regulations, Sec. 102.114(a), "a Saturday on which the Board's offices are not open for business shall be considered a holiday . . ." and the filing period then runs to the end of the next business day. The provisions of this rule are properly applied to EAJA applications in order to avoid the injustice of foreshortening that Act's already brief filing period. Therefore, the period for the filing of this application ran until the close of business on Monday, April 5, 1982.

That ruling is adhered to here.

The General Counsel contends that EAJA, as a relinquishment of sovereign immunity, must be strictly interpreted and narrowly construed. The Federal Tort Claims Act (FTCA) (28 U.S.C. § 1346, 2671 et seq.) is similiarly a limited waiver of sovereign immunity. The FTCA, Section 2401(b), provides, in mandatory language even more explicit than that of EAJA § 504(a)(2):

> A tort claim against the United States shall be forever barred . . . unless action is begun within six months after the date of mailing . . . of notice of final denial of the claim by the agency to which it was presented.

In both Kirby v. U.S., 479 F. Supp. 863 (D.S.C. 1979), and Rodriquez v. U.S., 382 F.Supp 1 (D.P.R. 1974), the question was presented whether, when the applicable limitations period would have expired on a Saturday, that period was extended until the next business day, pursuant to Rule 6(a) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. That rule provides, in language substantially identical to that of the Board's Rule 102.114(a), that

> The last day of the period so computed shall be included unless it is a Saturday, a Sunday, or legal holiday, in which event the period runs until the end of the next day which is not a Saturday, Sunday or legal holiday.

Both courts held Rule 6(a) applicable to the Federal Tort Claims Act and found the actions to have been timely filed. They noted that the absence of contrary legislative intent suggested implied congressional approval of a lenient and liberal approach. Those cases are, to all practical effect, "on all fours" with the instant situation and the analyses presented are compelling. Further guidance is provided by the rationale of Bledsoe v. Department of Housing and Urban Development, 398 F.Supp. 315 (E.D.Pa. 1975). The court specifically addressed the sovereign immunity question and stated:

> Strict construction of the statutory provisions applicable to the Act may be appropriate in certain instances to avoid unwarranted extensions of the waiver of sovereign immunity, provided by Congress. However, it is a perversion of this principle to construe the six month provision of section 2401(b) so that six months under section 2401(b) includes less time, in fact, than that provided under any other six-month statutory period. Absent explicit congressional direction, courts should not, under the rubric of sovereign immunity, create a separate and cramped mathematics of computation. [Id. at 320–321.]

As noted, the limitations provision of the FTCA more expressly bars actions filed outside the stated period than does EAJA, and it sets forth a longer period in which to file than EAJA provides. EAJA's abbrievated limitations period and its less explicit language thus provide even stronger justification for a liberal application of what the court in Bledsoe described as the general or common law rule with respect to the computation of limitations periods. See also Sherwood Bros. v. District of Columbia, 72 App. D.C. 155, 113 F.2d 162, (1940), quoted in Bledsoe, where it was pointed out that the rule (as embodied in FRCP Sec. 2401(b) and Sec. 102.114(a) of the Board's Rules) was "the common-law rule . . . embedded in the habits and customs of the community . . . by long-establised legal and commercial tradition." The court there found it reasonable to "assume that Congress had the common-law rule in mind when it legislated, and to construe the statute accordingly."[4]

[3] G. C. memorandum in support of answer, 8.

[4] Cf. Monark Boat Co., 262 NLRB 994 (1982). There, the Board, faced with the question of whether the 3-day period for the filing of an EAJA application was extended by 3 days pursuant to Sec. 102.114(a) of the Board's Rules, concluded that the 30-day time limit was a jurisdictional condition that the Board could not legally extend. The Board further noted that the 3-day extension portion of Rule 102.114(a) was not applicable to an EAJA application inasmuch as that portion of the rule deals with actions required to be taken "within a prescribed period after service" and EAJA § 504(a)(2) and the Board's Rule Sec. 102.148 both require that the application be filed within 30 days of entry of the final order, without reference to service. The Board left open the question presented here as to effect of Rule 102.114(a) on a 30-day limitation period that ends on a Saturday, Sunday, or legal holiday. The Board similarly left this question open in Lord Jim's, 264 NLRB 1098 (1982).

Accordingly, I conclude that the filing of this application on Monday, April 5, 1982, was timely. The General Counsel's motion to dismiss the application as untimely is denied.

B. The Applicant's Eligibility

The General Counsel concedes that the Applicant, standing alone, meets the EAJA eligibility requirements, inasmuch as it was an unincorporated association or organization with a net worth not exceeding $5 million or employing more than 500 employees at the time the adversary adjudication was initiated. However, the General Counsel contends that the Applicant has not established its eligibility inasmuch as it failed to provide the number, category, and work location of the employees, or the net worth, of its alleged affiliates, The Wood, Wire and Metal Lathers' International Union and the local unions affiliated with that International.[5]

In its response to my order on motion to dismiss its EAJA application, where I had raised questions concerning the Applicant's potential affiliates, the Applicant set forth, by affidavit, that its International union had but 15 employees working in various specified locations and positions as of January 23, 1978, when the original complaint issued. It further claimed by affidavit that the net worth of that International union, as of December 31, 1978, was less than $5 million. Other than naming the various locals affiliated with its International union, the Applicant did not provide any information as to either the net worth of such local unions or the numbers, positions, or locations of their employees.[6]

EAJA, which is expressly applicable to labor organizations,[7] makes no mention of the aggregation of either the net worth or the employee complement of an applicant with that of affiliates. The reference to affiliates, as found in the Board's Rules, apparently stems from the model rules of the Administrative Conference of the United States (ACUS), Section 0.104(f). That section suggested the following rule.

> (f) The net worth and number of employees of the Applicant and all of its affiliates shall be aggregated to determine eligibility. Any individual, corporation or other entity that directly or indirectly controls or owns a majority of the voting shares or other interests of the Applicant, or any corporation or other entity of which the Applicant directly or indirectly owns or controls a majority of the voting shares or other interest, will be considered an affiliate for purposes of this part, unless the adjudicative officer determines that such treatment would be unjust and contrary to the purposes of the Act in light of the actual relationship between the affiliated entities. In addition, the adjudicative officer may determine that financial reltationships of the Applicant other than those described in the paragraph constitute special circumstances that would make an award unjust.

The model rules would thus have required aggregation only when an applicant had a majority interest in another entity or was itself controlled by an entity possessing a majority interest in it. The Board, in adopting its rule, omitted the references to majority control of or by affiliates, apparently to leave open the questions, presented here, as to whether the net worth and employee complement of an International union and the other local unions affiliated with it must be aggregated with the employee complement and net worth of an applicant that is itself a local union.

Case law provides little relevant precedent. On the one hand, it is clear that a local union is a separate and distinct entity from the International union with which it may be affiliated so that one is not automatically liable for the misconduct of the other. Carbon Fuel Co. v. Mine Workers, 444 U.S. 212, 217 (1979); Mine Workers (Blue Diamond Coal), 143 NLRB 795 (1963). On the other hand, when considering whether to assert jurisdiction over a labor organization functioning as an employer, the Board has considered the relationship between a local union and its International. See Louisiana Council No. 17, AFSCME, AFL–CIO, 250 NLRB 880, 892 (1980); Chain Service Restaurant Employees Local 11, 132 NLRB 960 (1961).

Absent clear precedent, recourse must be had to the statute (EAJA) and its stated purposes. As noted, it was expressly intended that EAJA apply to labor organizations. Application of an affiliation principle as suggested by the General Counsel would, if considered realistically, render all but the smallest unions, the unaffiliated in-plant organizations, ineligible. Where Congress has expressly included a group within those intended to be eligible for the benefits of its legislation, I cannot conclude that it simultaneously intended to exclude the vast majority of such organizations from those benefits. Accordingly, I must conclude that the Applicant is not required to aggregate the net worth and employee complement of its International union with that of its own in order to establish eligibility. Perforce, it would not be required to aggregate the net worth and employee complements of its "sister" locals, with whom its relationships, particularly in regard to the matter of control, is even more tenuous.[8]

[5] The Board's Rule Sec. 102.143(g) provides:

> The net worth and number of employees of the Applicant and all of its affiliates shall be aggregated to determine eligibility.

[6] The Applicant submitted a list of approximately 246 local unions in the United States and Canada, which were affiliated with The Wood, Wire and Metal Lathers' International Union. None of these, it stated, were as large as the Applicant and few, it believed, had any full-time employees. The Applicant denied that it was affiliated with The Wood, Wire and Metal Lathers' International Union or any of the locals affiliated with that International within the contemplation of the Board's Rules.

[7] EAJA, Sec. 202(a) provides, inter alia:

> The Congress finds that certain individuals, partnerships, corporations, and labor and other organizations may be deterred from seeking review of, defending against, unreasonable governmental action because of the expense involved in securing the vindication of their rights in civil actions and in administrative proceedings.

[8] In the event that the Board, on review of this supplemental decision, concludes, contrary to my recommendation, that the net worth and employee complement of The Wood, Wire and Metal Lathers' International Union must be aggregated with that of the Applicant, I recommend that

The General Counsel's motion to dismiss the application on the basis of the Applicant's alleged ineligibility is therefore denied.

C. The Substantial Justification Question

Section 504(a)(1) of EAJA provides that an award shall be made to a prevailing party unless "the position of the agency as a party to the proceeding was substantially justified or . . . special circumstances make an award unjust." The burden of establishing substantial justification is on the Government and the test of whether governmental action is substantially justified is one of reasonableness. The government, to defeat an award, must establish that its position had a reasonable basis in fact and law. However, the fact that the Government lost its case does not give rise to any presumption that its position was unreasonable and the "substantially justified" standard does not "require the Government to establish that its decision to litigate was based on a substantial probability of prevailing."[9] Moreover, as the Board has recently pointed out, the Government's position might still be deemed reasonable in fact and law notwithstanding that the General Counsel failed to establish a prima facie case.[10] The "special circumstances" exception was included in the statute to permit the government to advance "in good faith the novel but credible extensions and interpretations of the law that often underlie vigorous enforcement efforts."[11] It permits the litigation of close questions of fact or law.[12]

The General Counsel, acknowledging its burden to establish substantial justification, contends that its positions were reasonable both at the time that complaint first issued, January 23, 1978, and when the hearing resumed after a 2-year hiatus in September 1980. Particularly, it points to the language of the hiring hall agreement, analysis of the hiring hall records showing a preponderance of referrals to union members, and the Applicant-Respondent's limited cooperation in the investigation of the underlying unfair labor practice charges. The General Counsel further contends that it acted reasonably in litigating the EAJA case inasmuch as it involves issues of first impression and thus argues that the Applicant's revised request for fees and expenses incurred in the EAJA proceeding should be denied. The Applicant, pointing specifically to the findings and conclusions set forth in my decision and order, as affirmed by the Board, disputes the General Counsel's contentions of substantial justification. It asserts that the General Counsel totally misunderstood the rules and procedures under which the hiring hall operated, causing it to misplead substantial portions of the complaint and further causing it to place unwarranted reliance on alleged numerical disparities in the referral of members and permitmen. This failure to comprehend how the hiring hall operated, the Applicant contends, resulted from a faulty and inadequate investigation. Contrary to the General Counsel, the Applicant contends that this case did not present either close or novel questions of fact or law. Resolution of these issues requires examination of the General Counsel's contentions, the evidence that it possessed and adduced in support of those contentions, and my findings thereon.

As described more fully in my initial decision, the Union's jurisdiction included inside skilled lathers' work and outside less-skilled work that was the laying out or preparation of reinforcing structural steel preliminary to the pouring of concrete for slabs, beams, and columns. The outside work included both general and specific work skills. The Union's geographical jurisdiction included the five boroughs of New York and considerable suburban territory outside those boroughs.

The Applicant operated a hiring hall under rules established pursuant to a consent decree and settlement agreement approved by Judge Marvin E. Frankel in settlement of an action under title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. The agreement provided for the opening of the Union's hiring hall to nonmembers, particularly members of minority groups, by permitting them to acquire work permits for outside work. It required nondiscriminatory referrals but permitted preference on the basis of experience where specific skills were required. Specifically established was a system of acquiring priority for referrals by those who had registered six or more times in a 2-week period. All employment was supposed to be secured through the hiring hall; employees were not supposed to secure their own employment and, if they were laid off for more than 1 day, they were supposed to return to the hiring hall and register for referral to subsequent employment. Employers were, however, permitted to transfer workmen between jobsites so long as there was no break in the continuity of employment. The Union was precluded from granting employer requests for the referral of specific individuals except as foreman; it was, however, permitted to fill requests for minority group workmen. The agreement required the Union to plan, establish, and publicize training programs to increase the specific experience of permitmen for outside work.

The employers with whom the Union had collective-bargaining agreements were not parties to the consent decree and agreement. However, the contracts between the Union and two associations of employers provided for the establishment of an exclusive hiring hall and adopted the rules set forth in the consent decree and agreement as the rules governing the operation of that hiring hall. The record does not reveal whether a similar incorporation of those rules and procedures existed in the collective-bargaining agreements between the Union and the other employers with whom it had collective-bargaining agreements.

the Applicant not be penalized for its failure to submit with its application a detailed exhibit showing the net worth of the Applicant and any affiliates (as defined in Sec. 102.143(g)) as required by Rule 102.147(f). My order on motion to dismiss application required the Applicant to provide information concerning the net worth of the International union did not specifically require the furnishing of a detailed net worth statement. If the affidavit that it submitted is considered insufficient, due process would require that the Applicant be permitted additional time to furnish appropriate documentation.

The terms governing the operation of the Union's hiring hall required that extensive records be prepared and maintained. Included in these records was documentation of the employees' signing in at the hiring hall, the contractors' requests for workmen, the referrals in response to such requests, and the reports from the jobsites indicating the work performed and by whom. These records were collated by computer into periodic activity reports.

The General Counsel's original complaint, dated January 23, 1978, alleged that the Union had discriminated against the permitmen by failing to follow the priority system established by the hiring hall rules and by permitting bookmen to obtain employment directly from the employers, thus circumventing the hiring hall. When that complaint issued, the General Counsel possessed the activity reports detailing the referral activity in the hiring hall. From those acitivity reports it appeared that the literal terms of the priority system were, indeed, being ignored to the detriment of the the permitmen. The General Counsel also possessed affidavits from a number of the permitmen indicating use of out-of-date priority lists and attributing statements to the Union's business agents that were susceptible to an interpretation establishing a preference and an intention on the part of those business agents to refer bookmen.[13]

Once the hearing was resumed in September 1980, evidence was introduced that established that the above-described system of according priorities had fallen into disarray by 1975 due to the fact that the number of job seekers was far out of proportion to the relatively few jobs available. About September 1, 1976, after nearly 2 years of referrals being made from backlogged priority lists that were months or years old, the priority system was abandoned by authority of the hiring hall's court-appointed administrator. Referrals after that date were made according to the order of daily sign-in. The General Counsel was apparently unaware of the backlog of priority lists used during the 1975 and 1976 and was similarly unaware that the use of those lists had been abandoned with the administrator's permission. As I found, this misunderstanding as to the operations of the priority sytems caused the General Counsel to misplead those aspects of the complaint that related to the priority system.

The General Counsel asserts, without contradiction, that the Union had cooperated only minimally in the investigation of the unfair labor practice charges and further asserts that it was justified in proceeding to complaint and litigation in reliance on evidence indicating that the priority rules had never been changed in writing, that the Union remained under the obligation to comply with those rules, and that it failed to do so. In light of activity reports tending to show that the priority system was being ignored and the affidavits of at least some permitmen tending to establish reliance on out-of-date priority lists and a willingness on the part of the Union's business agents to favor the bookmen, and in the absence of cooperation by the Union during the course of the investigation, which might have corrected the General Counsel's misunderstandings, I must conclude that the General Counsel had a reasonable basis in fact for issuing the complaint, amending it when the hearing reopened, and proceeding through the litigation, at least until that point where its misunderstandings became obvious.[14] Accordingly, to the extent described above, I find that the General Counsel's position was substantially justified.

However, when it became clear that the evidence would not support complaint allegations based on alleged breaches of the priority system, the General Counsel changed its theory to allege more generally widespread discrimination against the permitmen based on its analysis of the activity reports showing that bookmen received far more referrals, with far fewer hiring hall registrations, than permitmen. As I stated in my initial decision:

> . . . Examined broadly, comparing only the member referrals against those received by nonmembers, the statistics would seem to support the General Counsel's contentions. Clearly, the journeymen-members of Local 46 received the lion's share of the referrals. Such a broad examination, however, is misleading [260 NLRB at 638].

I found that in making its comparison of member and nonmember referrals, the General Counsel had disregarded the recognized exceptions to the referral system for inside workers and specifically skilled outside workers. Its failure to consider these exceptions led to "fallacious conclusions . . . of no probative value in determining whether or not the Union operated its hiring hall in a discriminatory manner." (260 NLRB at 638.) To the extent that the General Counsel recognized the existence of these exceptions, it argued that the Union falsely labeled contractors' requests as requiring specific experience so as to exclude permitmen from the referrals. The [13] Ultimately, the General Counsel introduced the testimony of several permitmen to this latter effect. I found those statements to be neither "sufficiently numerous or persuasive, when viewed against five years of referral activity, to overcome the valid explanations for the disparity in referrals . . . or the evidence establishing the unreliability of the activity reports as proof of discrimination." 260 NLRB at 630–631, 638–639. The General Counsel submitted, as attachments to its answer to the application here, affidavits of 15 permitmen, including 4 charging parties, whose testimony was never offered. The General Counsel contended that by the time this case resumed for hearing in September 1980, after the 2-year hiatus for settlement discussions, these individuals had become either unavailable or uncooperative. Contained in the affidavits of three of those employees are statements similar to those contained in the record, which tend to show a preference by the business agents for bookmen. Nine, I would conclude, merely confirmed data contained in the activity reports or expressed the witnesses' belief that they had been discriminated against for various reasons. Three of these affidavits, it appears, were received by the General Counsel subsequent to July 1979, including two taken in early August 1980. None of these latter affidavits contribute probative support to the General Counsel's position.

[14] This is not to stay that the General Counsel was blameless in regard to this misunderstanding. Evidence on this point and others could have been secured from the court-appointed administrator. Indeed, when, on November 16, 1978, the General Counsel brought to my attention the administrator's refusal to comply with a subpoena unless authorized to do so by the district court from which his appointment stemmed, I directed that the General Counsel and the administrartor go to that court for the necessary authorizations. The General Counsel did not further pursue that avenue.

General Counsel also argued that the Union had failed in its obligation to provide training for specific experience jobs to the permitmen. I found that neither allegation was encompassed within the complaint nor supported by record evidence. I further found that when the General Counsel's specific examples of alleged discrimination were examined in light of the recognized exceptions to the referral procedures, no conclusion of discrimination was possible.

Accordingly, as this principal theory underlying the General Counsel's continuation of the litigation had neither a factual nor a legal basis to support it, I must conclude that the General Counsel has failed to sustain its burden of proving that its portion in this regard was substantially justified or otherwise reasonably based in fact or law.[15]

In the initial litigation, as previously stated, the General Counsel had contended that Respondent had breached the duty of fair representation owed to all those who sought employment through the referral system by failing to enforce the hiring hall rules on workers who secured employment without union referral and on contractors who called back employees or hired them directly. I found that even if such a contention had a basis in law, the record evidence did not support the allegation. Both members and nonmembers, including some of the Charging Parties, had benefited from direct hires and callbacks. There was no evidence that employers were encouraged by the Union to hire members directly or to call them back. Moreover, the preponderance of callbacks and direct hires of members over nonmembers, I found, could be as rationally explained on the basis of the members' specific inside and outside work skills (factors ignored or disregarded by the General Counsel) and the likelihood that they were better known to the employers because of their longer service in the industry as by any supposed preference for union members. I further found that the statistical record relied on by the General Counsel was too open to the possibility of error, particularly error resulting from missing stewards' reports, to support the General Counsel's allegations. This was especially pertinent, I found, to the callback allegations inasmuch as a missing steward's report would make it appear as if all of the employees on the jobsite had benefited from callbacks. Finally, I found, in the absence of any evidence that any of the hundreds of employers who secured employees through the Union's hall, other than those who were members of two named associations, were bound to comply with the hiring hall rules, I could not conclude that the Union could have effectively enforced the rules had it chosen to do so. In light of these conclusions, all of which were upheld by the Board, I must conclude that the General Counsel has failed to sustain its burden of proving that its position in regard to the callback and direct-hire allegations were substantially justified.

Finally, notwithstanding that I found evidence of discrimination in the Union's refusal to appoint stewards from among the permitmen who were journeymen in other locals, I must conclude that the General Counsel's position in regard thereto, as asserted in its brief, was without substantial justification. As found by the Board, the General Counsel had failed to put this question in issue at the hearing. In light of that failure, its position in regard to this contention can hardly be deemed substantially justified or reasonable in fact or law.

D. Applicability of EAJA to Fees and Expenses Incurred Prior to October 1, 1981

The General Counsel reasserts the position taken initially in its motion to dismiss the application, that fees and expenses incurred prior to October 1, 1981, the effective date of the EAJA, are not recoverable. The General Counsel argues that "traditional rules of statutory construction, sovereign immunity, and the Congressional purpose underlying an enactment of the EAJA" warrant such a construction.

In my order denying the motion to dismiss, it was stated:

> . . . I am satisfied that the "plain, clear and common meaning" of both the statutory and regulatory language supports the conclusion that EAJA was intended to apply to expenses and fees incurred before October 1, 1981 and that there exists no clear direction from Congress to the contrary [footnote omitted]. This was the conclusion reached by the Courts in Heydt v. Citizens State Bank, 668 F.2d 444 (C.A. 8, 1982), Wolverton v. Schweiker, 533 F. Supp. 420 (D.Ct. Id., 1982), and Photo Data, Inc. v. Sawyer, 533 F. Supp. 344 (D.D.C., 1982).

Subsequent authority buttresses my earlier conclusion. Thus, in Tyler Business Services v. NLRB, supra, the United States Court of Appeals for the fourth Circuit found pre-October 1, 1981 fees and expenses recoverable, stating that "The Act's test for recovery for attorney fees is whether the case was pending on or after October 1, 1981, and not when the fees were incurred."[16] Most persuasive, I believe, is the decision by Judge Bryant for the United States District Court for the District of Columbia in Nunes-Correia v. Haig, 543 F.Supp 812 (1982). Recognizing that prior to the passage of EAJA, "the doctrine of sovereign immunity barred fee awards against the United States absent clear or express statutory authority to the contrary"[17] and responding to the [15] See Tyler Business Services v. NLRB, 695 F.2d 73, 75-76 (4th Cir. 1982), where the court concluded that the fact that "the government's preliminary decision to institute an administrative proceeding may not justify an award of attorney's fees . . . . would not precluded an award, if at subsequent stages of the administrative process . . . it appears that the government's position at these levels of litigation was not substantially justified.

[16] The court cited Hutto v. Finney, 437 U.S. 678, 694 fn. 23 (1978), and Bradley v. School Board, 416 U.S. 696, 711-721 (1974), noting that " the statutes involved in those cases and the Equal Access to Justice Act address similar concerns," making the rationale of those cases applicable to EAJA cases. The Board has filed a petition for rehearing and a suggestion rehearing en banc in the Tyler case.

Government's argument that no language in EAJA expressly or unequivocally waived sovereign immunity retoractively, Judge Bryant stated that he was inclined "to hold that the plain language of the statute explicitly authorizes fees for pre-October 1, 1981 work" and to find any alternative construction of the Act "strained." However he found it unnecessary to reach that holding, concluding from the Congressional Budget Office (CBO) cost estimates that Congress intended EAJA to apply to pre-October 1, 1981 fees and expenses. He stated, in an analysis worth repeating here, the following:

> According to the government, had Congress expected parties to be able to recover pre-October 1, 1981 fees in pending cases, Congress would have forcasted substantially greater expenditures during the Act's first year, when old cases such as the one here with large accumulated legal fees were being decided or settled, than in the Act's second or subsequent years. The statistical reasoning underlying this argument is flawed. Since, ceteris paribus, the distribution of long-lived and short lived cases terminated in 1982 and each subsequent year will remain constant, awarding fees for the entire litigation in cases pending on or after October 1, 1981 can be expected to result in constant expenditures over the years.
> If, however, the Act does not cover pre-October 1981 work in pending cases, the estimated total payout will increase with the amount of post-October 1981 work performed in the cases. Since cases filed a long time before October 1, 1981 and terminated shortly after October 1981 will present less post-October 1981 work than cases terminated many years after 1981, under this assumption annual expenditures will rise sharply during the Act's first years, and then level off.
> In fact, the Congressional Budget Office predicted that the annual expenditures under the Equal Access to Justice Act will vary directly with the number of cases terminated each year. In addition, the CBO assumed that the cost will increase as a result of increases in the federal caseload generally and as a result of inflation. Finally, the CBO predicted that the Act's incentive structure will over time increase the size of the awards and the number of cases in which awards are made. H.R.Rep. No. 1418, 96th Cong. 2d Sess. 21 reprinted in [1980] U.S. Cong. & Ad. News 4943, 4984, 5000 ("House Report").
> When Congress passed the Equal Access to Justice Act, it had available the CBO estimate. Congress' acceptance of that estimate's assumption that the cost of the Act would vary only with cases' temination rate, inflation, and the Act's incentive effect, demonstrates that Congress clearly intended the Act to authorize fees for work performed before October 1, 1981.[18]

Judge Bryant further stated, in Nunes-Correia, that he would have reached the same conclusion even absent the CBO estimate, citing Bradley v. School Board, 416 U.S. 696 (1973); Hutto v. Finney, 436 U.S. 678 (1977); and related cases. Judge Bryant noted that the Supreme Court had applied the fee recovery statutes involved on these cases retroactively even in the absence of statutory language and legislative history. As he pointed out, the case for retroactive fees and expense is stronger under EAJA than it was under the statute involved in Bradley (providing for attorney fees in desegregation cases), which did not contain the "pending on or after" language of EAJA.

Accordingly, I must conclude that recovery of the fees and expenses incurred by the Applicant prior to October 1, 1981, is not barred by the statute.

E. Recovery of Fees and Expenses Incurred in Prosecuting the EAJA Application

Included in the fees and expenses sought by the Applicant are those that it incurred in prosecuting this EAJA application. The General Counsel argues that such fees and expenses are not recoverable because they were not incurred "in connection with an adversary adjudication" within the meaning of the Board's Rules, Sections 102.114 and 102.143. The General Counsel further argues that these fees and expenses should not be recoverable because the EAJA proceeding was a significant and discrete portion of the underlying proceeding where its positions, involving important issues of first impression, were clearly reasonable.

EAJA, itself, is silent on the question of whether the fees and expenses incurred in a proceeding under its terms are themselves recoverable. I believe that if the rights granted by EAJA are to have any meaning, such fees and expenses must be considered recoverable whenever the Government's position in the underlying proceeding lacks substantial justification. To hold otherwise would, in many cases, severely impinge on the value of the right granted by Congress and discourage otherwise prevailing litigants from contesting unreasonable governmental actions, contrary to the stated purposes of the Act. The only court to consider this question, the Fourth Circuit in Tyler Business Services, supra, reached this same conclusion, analogizing this case to cases under the Civil Rights Act of 1964, Pub. L. 88-352, 78 Stat. 241, 42 U.S.C.A. § 2000 et seq., where such recovery is permitted.[19]

[18] As the Government had in Nunes-Correia, the General Counsel here argued in both its motion to dismiss and in its answer that the CBO estimates support its arguments against retroactivity. In denying its motion to dismiss, I had included:

> The estimates [$154 million in the first fiscal year, $187 million in the second, and $228 million in the third] were based upon projections of the number of proceedings which would terminate in each year and the increases therein were expressly projected on the basis of anitcipated growth in the ammount of litigation and in the cost of living. They do not appear to have been projected upon different lengths of time during which the fees and expenses may have been incurred. As argued by Respondent, had the CBO intended to encompass only those fees and expenses incurred in the first year of Act's effectiveness, rather than all of the expenses and fees incurred in all of the cases closed in that year, its estimates for [the first fiscal year] would have been much lower than its estimates of cost for the following years.

[19] See Young v. Kenley, 641 F.2d 192, 195 (4th Cir. 1981); Manhart v. City of Los Angeles, 652 F.2d 904, 909 (9th Cir. 1981); Love v. Mayor, City

Continued

Accordingly I must reject the General Counsel's objection to the granting of the fees and expenses incurred in connection with the EAJA application.

F. The Applicant's Fees and Expenses

Applicant sought reimbursement, at the rate of $75 per hour, less than his normal billing rate, for 258 hours expended by Applicant's principle counsel, Richard H. Markowitz, in the litigation of the underlying case. It also sought compensation for 10.75 hours expended by Markowitz in regard to the EAJA application. Included within the 258 hours involved in the underlying case were 163.5 hours expended between the issuance of complaint and September 1980. I have previously found that the General Counsel's position in the litigation, insofar as it concerned alleged violations of the literal terms of the hiring hall rules with respect to the acquistion of priorities and referrals pursuant to such priorities, was substantially justified notwithstanding that this position was ultimately determined to be erroneous. While no precise calculation is possible, it would appear that that theory amounted to approximately 50 percent of the General Counsel's case. The remaining 50 percent, to that point in time, consisting of its allegations concerning callbacks amd direct hires, which allegations I found to be without substantial justification. Accordingly, because it was September 22, 1980, when the General Counsel abandoned its priority based theory and commenced to argue a broader theory based on the statistical analysis of the hiring hall records, which theory I have found to be without substantial justification, I shall reduce the fees to which Applicant is entitled by 50 percent of those sought for time spent between January 25, 1978, and September 22, 1980, thus, reducing the allowable compensable hours by 81.75 hours. Additionally, on my own motion I will disallow the 2 hours claimed for Markowitz' time spent at the resumption of the hearing on its final day, January 22, 1980. While that resumption had been scheduled to hear the General Counsel's rebuttal testimony, the General Counsel had earlier indicated that there would be no such testimony. Respondent then used the time to argue on the record for fees and expenses, a position that was unsupported by then-exisiting law. The Union's motion was also presented in its brief to me. Oral presentation of the motion was unnecessary and resulted in unnecessary expenditures of time and money for all concerned. It would therefore be unjust to permit the Applicant to recover attorney fees for time thus expended.

I therefore conclude that the Applicant is entitled to the attorney's fees for Richard H. Markowitz for 185 hours at the rate of $75 per hour, a total of $13,875.

Applicant seeks attorney's fees, at $65 per hour, for services performed by William T. Josem, an associate of Markowitz, for a total 292 hours expended between September 8, 1980, and September 22, 1981 in regard to the underlying case and a total of 24.75 hours expended by Josem in regard to the EAJA application. In view of complexity of the issues and the volume of the extensive record here, I must conclude that an expenditure of 316.75 hours at a rate of $65 per hour is reasonable and that the Applicant is entitled to be reimbursed for these expenses, for a total of $20,588.75.

I find that the expenses incurred by the Applicant in regard to the litigation of both the underlying case and the EAJA application, which includes the photocopying of exhibits, the purchase of transcripts, postage, long-distance telephone calls, and witness fees, totaling $4063, is reasonable.

CONCLUSIONS

Accordingly, I find that the Applicant is entitled to the following

Attorney's fees:

Richard Markowitz—$13,875.
William T. Josem—$20,588.75

Expenses: $4,063
Total $38,526.75

International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local 77 and Bruce-Cadet, Inc. Case 19-CB-6077

June 30, 1988

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On September 14, 1987, Administrative Law Judge Richard J. Boyce issued the attached decision. The General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Respondent filed cross-exceptions and a reply brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order.

The charge filed in this case by the Employer, Bruce-Cadet, Inc., on March 16, 1987,[1] alleges that the Respondent, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local 77, violated Section 8(b)(1)(B) of the Act by commencing disciplinary proceedings against supervisors Dennis Dallas and James Reinkens "because said individuals directed the work of employees dispatched by Local 112 at the request of the [Employer] on work which had been claimed by both Local 112 and Local 77, as those individuals were instructed to do by the [Employer's president], who had made the decision to have the work done by Local 112 personnel."

The judge, applying the Supreme Court's recent decision in NLRB v. Electrical Workers Local 340, 107 S.Ct. 2002 (1987), found that there could be no 8(b)(1)(B) violation, because he concluded that the Respondent neither had a collective-bargaining relationship with the Employer nor aspired to one. We disagree with the judge and for the following reasons find that the Respondent violated Section 8(b)(1)(B) of the Act.

Bruce-Cadet is an electrical contractor working as a subcontractor on the Hanford Nuclear Reservation in the State of Washington. Bruce-Cadet is party to the Site Stabilization Agreement, an agreement between the International Unions of Building Trades and construction contractors at the Hanford site, which governs the terms and conditions of employment for all construction work at the site.

Bruce-Cadet employs members of Electrical Workers Local 112, a sister local of the Respondent, to do electrical work at the Hanford site. Local 112 is party to the Site Stabilization Agreement, pursuant to its membership in the National Trades Council. Local 112's jurisdiction is confined to inside or wireman's work. The Respondent, whose jurisdiction encompasses outside or lineman's work, is not party to the Site Stabilization Agreement.

George Elgin, Local 112's business manager, testified that the Site Stabilization Agreement caused problems between the Respondent and Local 112 regarding jurisdiction. Elgin testified that the problem was primarily a result of the fact that the Respondent was not party to the Agreement and therefore there was no method for settling a jurisdictional dispute with the Employer.[2] Rather, the matter had to be resolved internally within the IBEW between the Respondent and Local 112. As a result, an informal agreement was reached that if Bruce-Cadet needed outside linemen, members of the Respondent would be cleared to work through Local 112.[3] This informal agreement was in place at the time the events transpired that led to the disciplinary charges being filed against Dallas and Reinkens.

Dennis Dallas and James Reinkens have been foremen for Bruce-Cadet for several years and are indisputably supervisors under Section 2(11) of the Act. As foremen, their duties include purchasing material, ordering men from the union hall, handling field disputes such as straightening out wage questions, dealing with jurisdictional problems, and, in general, handling everything in the field. [2] The Site Stabilization Agreement provides:

> JURISDICTIONAL DISPUTES
> Section 1. The parties hereto agree that all jurisdictional disputes over division of work with crafts affiliated with the Building and Construction Trades Department, AFL-CIO, will be assigned and settled in accordance with the procedural rules and regulations of the Impartial Jurisdictional Disputes Board under the Plan for Settlement of Jurisdictional Disputes in the Construction Industry, effective June 1, 1977 or any successor plan. All signatory contractors agree to be stipulated to the procedures of the Impartial Jurisdictional Disputes Board for work performed under this AGREEMENT.
> Section 2. In the event of any dispute as to Jurisdiction of work covered by the terms of this AGREEMENT being claimed by UNIONS other than those affiliated with the Building and Construction Trades Department, AFL-CIO, then such disputes shall be referred to the International Unions involved, for determination by whatever procedure they may adopt and work shall proceed as assigned by the individual EMPLOYER until such determination by the International Unions. Any given jurisdictional determination shall be implemented immediately by the individual EMPLOYER involved.

[3] The parties stipulated that Bruce-Cadet obtains linemen under the understanding "sporadically." Elgin testified that he knew of at least two and possibly more times that it may have happened. Elgin further testified that the agreement is still in place and that within the 2-month period prior to the hearing the Respondent's members have been dispatched through Local 112's hiring hall to Bruce-Cadet for the purpose of performing electrical work.

and Reinkens both testified that they had the responsibility of determining whether work should be done by members of the Respondent or members of Local 112. Although a grievance has never arisen under Bruce-Cadet's labor agreement, first-level responsibility for resolution of the grievance would lie with the foremen. Bruce Mackebon, owner of Bruce-Cadet, testified, however, that he would have final authority to resolve any issues involving money. Along with their foremen responsibilities, Dallas and Reinkens both work with tools on the job as well.[4] Both men are members of Local 112.

On February 2 the Respondent filed disciplinary charges against Dallas and Reinkens, alleging that they violated certain provisions of the parent International's constitution.[5] The charges alleged that Dallas and Reinkens violated the Respondent's jurisdiction and "did knowingly and repeatedly do work that belonged to Local #77," thus causing economic harm to the Respondent's members. After trial on May 12, which neither Dallas nor Reinkens attended, the Respondent informed them that they had been found guilty and were being fined $2000 each, with $1800 suspended, and placed on 2 years' probation.

The charges against Dallas and Reinkens stemmed from a dispute concerning linework in the 100-D, 200-E, and 300 areas of the Hanford site. According to the Respondent's business agent, Frank LaFaire, after hearing that outdoor work was being done on the Hanford site he visited the site and "noticed they had two ladders up a pole . . . and observed that there was a wire on the ground that they had just pulled out." LaFaire testified that such work is lineman's work, stating that "All wood-pole construction is ours, whether it's low voltage or high voltage." LaFaire stated that the charges against Dallas and Reinkens were also based on reports by other members of the Respondent that the two men were performing work that belonged to members of the Respondent.

Dallas and Reinkens both testified about the scope of their duties and the nature of the work; however, neither man was specifically asked if he engaged in the work that LaFaire allegedly witnessed. Dallas described the work at the 300 area as an electrical upgrade of the emergency system and the 200-E job as a rerouting of a high-voltage line, the routing of a low-voltage line, and the rehooking of a low-voltage line. Dallas testified that he determined that Local 112 members could do the low-voltage work, but that he obtained linemen to do the high-voltage work. Dallas stated that while he was not certain whether the Respondent traditionally claimed the low-voltage work, Local 112 had done that type of work in the past.

Local 112's business representative, Elgin, testified that after LaFaire observed the pole work being done at the worksite, LaFaire spoke to him about Bruce-Cadet's failure to use linemen to set poles. On learning of the problem, Elgin contacted Bruce Mackebon, and resolved the problem by persuading Mackebon that linemen should do the work.

It is the General Counsel's contention that the Respondent violated Section 8(b)(1)(B) by disciplining Dallas and Reinkens for their role in interpreting the informal agreement between the parties and assigning the work to employees represented by Local 112 rather than the Respondent.[6] The Respondent contends, on the other hand, that there can be no 8(b)(1)(B) violation here as it does not have a collective-bargaining agreement with Bruce-Cadet. Furthermore, the Respondent asserts that it did not bring disciplinary action against Dallas and Reinkens because of their 8(b)(1)(B) activities, but because they violated the International's constitution by performing work that belonged to the Respondent.

Before addressing the parties' contentions, a brief overview of the development of the law under Section 8(b)(1)(B) is in order. Section 8(b)(1)(B) of the NLRA provides:

> It shall be an unfair labor practice for a labor organization or its agents—
> (1) to restrain or coerce . . . (B) an employer in the selection of his representatives for the purpose of collective bargaining or the adjustment of grievances . . . .

Originally, the Board construed Section 8(b)(1)(B) as prohibiting only union pressure applied directly to an employer forcing the employer to select a certain representative. The Board, however, expanded its interpretation of Section 8(b)(1)(B) in San Francisco-Oakland Mailers' Local 18 (Northwest Publications), 172 NLRB 2173 (1968), by finding that a union violates Section 8(b)(1)(B) when it disciplines an employer-representative for the manner in which the representative performs

---

[4] Pursuant to the Site Stabilization Agreement, it is within the Employer's discretion to allow foremen to work with tools on the job.

[5] The International's constitution was not offered into evidence.

[6] The General Counsel also asserts that the Respondent selectively enforced its constitution by disciplining only Dallas and Reinkens for performing work that allegedly belonged to members of the Respondent when it was aware that other employees of Bruce-Cadet were performing the same work. We find no merit in the General Counsel's assertion as we agree with the judge that the General Counsel failed to show that the Respondent had knowledge of other employees doing the work in question. Absent knowledge of other individuals performing the work, there can be no selective enforcement.

8(b)(1)(B) duties. The Board reasoned that when a union attempts to compel an employer's foremen to take prounion positions in interpreting the collective-bargaining agreement it interferes with the employer's control over its representatives. As a result, the employer is faced with having to replace its foremen "or face de facto nonrepresentation by them." Id. at 2173. The Board's decision in Oakland Mailers significantly expanded the scope of Section 8(b)(1)(B) by recognizing indirect coercion of the employer's selection of a representative and by recognizing that contract interpretation duties are so closely related to collective-bargaining duties as to make them also 8(b)(1)(B) activities.

In Florida Power & Light v. Electrical Workers Local 641, 417 U.S. 790 (1974), the Supreme Court assumed, "without deciding," that Oakland Mailers fell within the "outer limits" of an appropriate test for 8(b)(1)(B) coercion where union discipline of a supervisor-member is concerned—namely, whether "that discipline may adversely affect the supervisor's conduct in performing the duties of, and acting in his capacity as, grievance adjuster or collective bargainer on behalf of the employer." 417 U.S. at 804–805.[7] Subsequently, in American Broadcasting Co. v. Writers Guild, 437 U.S. 411 (1978), the Court embraced the Oakland Mailers indirect coercion test that it had accepted only arguendo in Florida Power. 437 U.S. at 429–430.

More recently, in NLRB v. Electrical Workers Local 340, supra, the Supreme Court declined to uphold the Board's finding that a union violates Section 8(b)(1)(B) by discipling supervisor-members merely for working for an employer who has no collective-bargaining agreement with the union; but it did not retreat from its acceptance of Oakland Mailers. Thus, while rejecting the view that a union violates Section 8(b)(1)(B) through discipline of members that merely restricts the pool of supervisors from which an employer might choose a representative for the purposes of grievance adjustment or collective bargaining, the Court agreed that union discipline of a member is prohibited under Section 8(b)(1)(B) "when that member is engaged in § 8(b)(1)(B) activities—that is collective bargaining, grievance adjustment, or some other closely related activity (e.g., contract interpretation, as in Oakland Mailers)." 107 S.Ct. at 2010. The Court thereby rejected the Board's "reservoir doctrine,"[8] which did not require that a disciplined supervisor actually have the authority to engage in 8(b)(1)(B) functions on behalf of the allegedly coerced employer. The Court also held that a critical element of an 8(b)(1)(B) violation is the existence of a collective-bargaining relationship—either actual or prospective—between the union-respondent and the employer that is allegedly coerced in its choice of 8(b)(1)(B) representatives. In the absence of such a bargaining relationship, the Court concluded, the possibility that union discipline of supervisor-members would coerce the employer is "too attenuated to form the basis of an unfair labor practice charge." 107 S.Ct. at 2012.

Applying Electrical Workers Local 340 to the facts of this case, the judge below dismissed the complaint, reasoning that > [a] bargaining relationship is lacking, the record contains no substantial evidence that Respondent aspired to one at relevant times, the reservoir doctrine is no more, and the status of Dallas and Reinkens otherwise as 8(b)(1)(B) grievance adjusters is shaky in light of the Court's observations . . . .

We disagree with the judge's application of Electrical Workers Local 340 to the facts before us.

As the Supreme Court concluded, a benchmark requirement for finding an 8(b)(1)(B) violation is that the union either have a collective-bargaining relationship with the employer or be seeking to establish one. Admittedly, there is no signed collective-bargaining agreement between Bruce-Cadet and the Respondent; however, a closer look at the facts reveals that there is a relationship between the two parties sufficient to satisfy the Electrical Workers Local 340 requirement. Here, both the Respondent's sister local, Local 112, and the parent International union are signatories to a collective-bargaining agreement with Bruce-Cadet. That agreement specifically provides that when jurisdictional disputes arise involving unions not party to the Site Stabilization Agreement, the dispute shall be submitted to the appropriate International union for resolution and, once the dispute is resolved, the employer shall abide by that resolution. That is exactly what happened here. A jurisdictional dispute arose concerning the electrical linework for Bruce-Cadet. Local 112's members, who were employed by Bruce-Cadet, had an interest in performing the work, as did the Respondent's members, who, pursuant to their jurisdiction granted by the International, had jurisdiction of all outside linework in that geographic area. Because the Respondent was not party to the collective-bargaining agreement, the dispute was submitted to the International for resolution. The International, along with the Respondent and Local 112, resolved the situation, in an informal agreement, by deciding Local 112 would refer members of the Respondent to Bruce-Cadet to do linework. Bruce-Cadet willingly accepted this resolution as directed to do so by the Site Stabilization Agreement. Thus, by creating this arrangement, the parties established a relationship between the Respondent and Bruce-Cadet for the purposes of enabling the Respondent's members to do linework for Bruce-Cadet.

[7] The Court declined to uphold the Board's order in that case because it concluded that disciplining supervisors solely for crossing picket lines to perform rank-and-file work during a strike did not interfere with an employer's control over his supervisors' performance of 8(b)(1)(B) functions, i.e., collective bargaining or grievance adjustment or related activities.

[8] This doctrine was first developed in Toledo Lithographers Locals 15-P and 272 (Toledo Blade Co.), 175 NLRB 1072 (1969), enfd. 437 F.2d 55 (6th Cir. 1971). Although the Court in Florida Power, supra, 417 U.S. at 811 fn. 21, commented on the difference between those who are merely supervisors within the meaning of Sec. 2(11) of the Act and those who possess authority to engage in 8(b)(1)(B) functions, it did not directly pass on the "reservoir doctrine"; but the Court in Electrical Workers Local 340 squarely rejected it. 107 S.Ct. at 2010. Our decision in this case in no way rests on the "reservoir doctrine" because, as we explain below, Supervisors Dallas and Reinkens not only possessed authority to engage in a form of collective bargaining—i.e., contract interpretation and administration on behalf of the Employer—they were actually disciplined by the Respondent for their performance of this function.

The Respondent argues that the informal agreement does not rise to the level of a collective-bargaining agreement and that therefore there can be no 8(b)(1)(B) violation. We find it unnecessary to determine whether the informal agreement, by itself, would rise to the level of a collective-bargaining agreement enforceable in law, as it is apparent that the parties abided by the informal agreement, as directed to under the Site Stabilization Agreement, and, by doing so, established a collective-bargaining relationship whereby the Respondent's members were able to perform linework for Bruce-Cadet.

Having determined that a collective-bargaining relationship existed between the parties, we now turn to the question of whether Dallas and Reinkens were disciplined for their activities in carrying out 8(b)(1)(B) contract interpretation duties or, as claimed by the Respondent, for performing work belonging to the Respondent. For the reasons set forth below, we find that they were fined for carrying out 8(b)(1)(B) duties.

The Respondent claims that it fined Dallas and Reinkens for performing work that belonged to the Respondent. At the time that Dallas and Reinkens were fined, however, the Respondent had no claim to Bruce-Cadet work except as granted through the informal agreement and the Site Stabilization Agreement. These agreements, however, did not specifically state who was entitled to do the work. Consequently, it was necessary to interpret the agreements to determine whether the work performed by Dallas and Reinkens belonged to the Respondent or to Local 112. Dallas and Reinkens, in carrying out their responsibilities, interpreted the agreements and determined that the work in question could be done by members of Local 112. Having so determined, they proceeded to do the work.

Under the circumstances, we find that Dallas and Reinkens were fined because they determined that the work in question belonged to Local 112 and, pursuant to that determination, assigned the work to members of Local 112. The Respondent was actively pursuing the work; Dallas and Reinkens had the authority to determine, on their employer's behalf, who should perform the work; Dallas and Reinkens made that decision, adverse to the interests of the Respondent; and they were subsequently fined by the Respondent. The Respondent's assertion that Dallas and Reinkens were fined only for doing work belonging to the Respondent ignores the context in which the discipline was imposed.[9] Consequently, we find that Dallas and Reinkens were fined for their role in interpreting the informal agreement and the Site Stabilization Agreement in determing that the work in question belonged to members of Local 112.[10] Because, as in Oakland Mailers, that discipline constituted a direct punishment for the manner in which Dallas and Reinkens carried out 8(b)(1)(B) duties for Bruce-Cadet, we find that the Respondent violated Section 8(b)(1)(B) by imposing that discipline, and we order the Respondent to take action set forth in our Order, below.[11]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local 77, Seattle, Washington, its officers, agents, and representatives, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Fining, placing on probation, or otherwise disciplining Dennis Dallas and James Reinkens, or any other representative of Bruce-Cadet, Inc., for their performance of 8(b)(1)(B) duties.

[9] We do not question the Respondent's belief that the work Dallas and Reinkens were performing belonged to its members; however, as the agreements had to be interpreted to determine who was entitled to the work, the Respondent was not free to impose its position on the Employer by fining the Employer's representatives. The fact that subsequent to the incidents that gave rise to Dallas and Reinkens being fined, the Respondent, Local 112, and Bruce-Cadet reached an understanding that members of the Respondent were entitled to do the pole work, does not support the Respondent's claim that Dallas and Reikens were fined for doing work belonging to the Respondent's members. Indeed, the subsequent understanding supports the conclusion that the agreements had to be interpreted to determine which Local was entitled to the work.

[10] In light of our finding that Dallas and Reinkens were fined for performing contract interpretation duties, we find it unnecessary to pass on their status as 8(b)(1)(B) grievance adjusters.

[11] The General Counsel's request for a visitatorial clause is denied as the circumstances of this case do not "demonstrate a likelihood that [the] [R]espondent will fail to cooperate or otherwise evade compliance." See Cherokee Marine Terminal, 287 NLRB 1080 (1988).

(b) In any like or related manner restraining or coercing Bruce-Cadet, Inc. in the selection and retention of its representatives for the purposes of collective bargaining or the adjustment of grievances.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Rescind the fines levied against Dennis Dallas and James Reinkens.

(b) Refund to Dennis Dallas and James Reinkens any moneys held on account of the fines assessed against them with interest to be computed in the manner prescribed in New Horizons for the Retarded.[12]

(c) Restore Dennis Dallas and James Reinkens to membership in good standing and remove all records of the fines against Dallas and Reinkens and their probation from its files.

(d) Post at its offices and meeting halls and other places where notices to its members are customarily posted copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[13] Copies of the notice, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to members are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(e) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

RICHARD J. BOYCE, Administrative Law Judge. This matter was tried in Kennewick, Washington, on 25 June 1987.[1] The charge was filed by Bruce-Cadet, Inc., on 16 March 1987. The complaint, issued on 22 April, alleges that International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local 77 (Respondent) violated Section 8(b)(1)(B) of the National Labor Relations Act (Act) about 19 February 1987 by:

> Fil[ing] charges against [Dennis] Dallas and [James] Reinkens because said individuals performed supervisory functions for Bruce-Cadet, which does not have a collective-bargaining relationship with [Respondent] and does not employ members of [Respondent].[2]

I. JURISDICTION AND LABOR ORGANIZATION

Bruce-Cadet is an electrical contractor in Kennewick. The parties agree and I find that it is an employer engaged in and affecting commerce within Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

The parties also agree and I find that Respondent is a labor organization within Section 2(5) of the Act.

[1] This manner of setting forth dates conforms with the wishes of the Board.

[2] Sec. 8(b)(1)(B) provides: "It shall be an unfair labor practice for a labor organization . . . to restrain or coerce . . . an employer in the selection of his representatives for the purposes of collective bargaining or the adjustment of grievances."

II. THE ALLEGED MISCONDUCT

A. Facts

Dallas and Reinkens have been foremen for Bruce-Cadet for several years. They indisputably are supervisors for purposes of the Act.

Bruce-Cadet is party to a labor agreement with a sister local of Respondent, Electrical Workers Local 112. Local 112's jurisdiction is confined to inside or wiremen's work. As the complaint acknowledges, Bruce-Cadet does not have a bargaining relationship with Respondent, whose jurisdiction encompasses outside or linemen's work. Dallas and Reinkens accordingly belong to Local 112, but not Respondent.

Much of Bruce-Cadet's work is as a subcontractor on the Hanford Nuclear Reservation in the Tri-Cities area of Washington.[3] It and Local 112, but not Respondent, are among several contractors and labor organizations subject to a Site Stabilization Agreement, so called, which dictates terms and conditions of employment for construction work at Hanford.[4] Local 112's business manager, George Elgin, testified that this agreement "created considerable problems in jurisdiction" between Respondent and his local; and that the two locals and Bruce-Cadet consequently fashioned an informal understanding whereby Respondent provides linemen through Local 112's hiring hall when Bruce-Cadet needs outside electricians at Hanford.[5]

On 2 February 1987, Respondent's business agent, Frank LaFaire, preferred two disciplinary charges against Dallas and one against Reinkens, alleging that they had violated article XXVII, section I, subsections 1 and 7, of the parent International's constitution since October 1986. The constitution is not in evidence.

One of the charges against Dallas elaborated:

> Brother Dallas repeatedly violated Local 77's jurisdiction, setting poles, cable splicing, terminations, etc. He was told on several occasions that he was doing our work but did not cooperate with us. I talked to Local #112 business manager and to the owner of the company both with negative results.

The other charge against Dallas and that against Reinkens was identical, alleging that each, "along with" the other, "did knowingly and repeatedly do work that belonged to Local #77," thus causing "economic harm to our members."

By letters dated 19 February, Respondent's recording secretary informed Dallas and Reinkens of the charges and that they were to appear before Respondent's trial board in Seattle on 17 March to answer them. The letters depicted the allegedly violated constitutional provisions as follows:

> Article XXVII, Sec. 1, subsection (1): Violation of any provision of this Constitution and the rules herein, or the bylaws, working agreements, or rules of a L.U. local union.
> Subsection (7): Wronging a member of the IBEW by any act or acts (other than the expression of views or opinions) causing him physical or economic harm.

Respondent later acceded to the requests of Dallas and Reinkens that the proceeding be moved to the Tri-Cities, and the trial board convened in Kennewick on 12 May. Neither Dallas nor Reinkens attended. Respondent subsequently informed them that they had been found guilty as charged and were being fined $2000 each, with $1800 suspended, and placed on 2 years' probation.

The conduct for which Dallas and Reinkens ostensibly were charged took place in the 100-D, 200-E, and 300 areas at Hanford. The three projects ran from about October 1986 to February 1987, and Dallas and Reinkens worked with the tools on all.[6] One involved pulling new conductors up poles and hooking up disconnects, another dealt with setting several poles and rerouting a high line, and the other consisted of upgrading an emergency electrical system.

LaFaire testified that, having heard that Dallas and another wireman (not Reinkens) were doing linemen's work, he visited one of the sites on 2 February and "noticed they had two ladders up a pole." He continued:

> I drove up there and observed the wire [on the] ground that they had just pulled out. They had two ladders up a pole that they had just pulled this wire out. It was disconnected by the line crew at Rockwell, and they pulled the wire from the pole to the switch house.

LaFaire added that this is linemen's work, explaining, "All wood-pole construction is ours, whether it's low voltage or high voltage."

LaFaire did not cite an instance in which he saw Reinkens encroach on Respondent's jurisdiction, and conceded that some of the conduct underlying his charges "was reported by other people." He denied that the charges were prompted in any way by Dallas' or Reinkens' performance of supervisory duties. Asked, then, why he preferred charges against only them, he replied (in seeming contradiction of his testimony elsewhere that he saw and heard about Dallas and another wireman in flagrante delicto) that he "didn't witness any other employees doing it" and that "they were the only two that were involved with [seen by] the witnesses."

The record does not conclusively establish whether Dallas and Reinkens in fact violated Respondent's jurisdiction. Neither denied doing so, however, and the evidence overall raises a respectable likelihood that they did. Local 112's Elgin testified that LaFaire spoke to him in December 1986 or January 1987 about Bruce-Cadet's failure to use linemen to set poles in the 100-D area; and that he consequently prevailed upon Dallas, Reinkens, and Bruce-Cadet's owner/general manager, Bruce Mackebon, to have linemen complete the work.

[3] The Tri-Cities consist of Richland, Kennewick, and Pasco.

[4] The agreement, entered into on 10 September 1984, runs from year to year, renewing automatically absent timely notice to the contrary. Signatory parties are J. A. Jones Construction Services Company, Morrison-Knudsen Company, and Building & Construction Trades, AFL-CIO.

[5] Previous to this understanding, apparently reached in 1985, Bruce-Cadet had denied Respondent's request that they enter into a labor agreement covering outside work. The parties stipulated that Bruce-Cadet obtains linemen under the understanding "sporadically"; and Elgin testified, "I know of at least twice, and I believe three times, and it may have been more."

[6] The agreement between Bruce-Cadet and Local 112 permits a supervisor to work with the tools as long as the crew under him does not exceed five employees. Apparently all the projects in question qualified.

Regarding Dallas' and Reinkens' duties as foremen, Mackebon testified: "They purchase material; they order men from the union; they handle any . . . field disputes." Asked what he meant by field disputes, Mackebon replied:

> I remember one recent situation where a man said he was not being paid the proper amount, so they [Dallas or Reinkens] called the office and got it straightened out so that everybody is happy.

Mackebon added that Dallas and Reinkens deal with jurisdictional problems "right on the spot," and in general "handle everything in the field except what [he] would call top-level management functions."[7] Mackebon testified that, while a grievance has never arisen under Bruce-Cadet's labor agreement, first-level responsibility for resolution would lie with Dallas and Reinkens should it happen. Mackebon would take over should they not settle the matter, he went on, and "final authority would rest with" him in any case "if it involved money."

B. Conclusion

After the present complaint issued, but before trial, the Supreme Court markedly narrowed the scope of Section 8(b)(1)(B) with its decision in NLRB v. Electrical Workers IBEW Local 340.[8]

Previous to that decision, the Board had taken the view that "persons who are supervisors within the meaning of the Act are employer representatives within the meaning of Section 8(b)(1)(B)" even if not "actually vested with authority to act for [their] employer in collective bargaining or the adjustment of grievances."[9] It reasoned that "such individuals form the logical 'reservoir' from which the employer is likely to select his representatives for collective bargaining or grievance adjustment."[10]

A union consequently violated 8(b)(1)(B), under prior Board law, when it visited disciplinary sanctions on a supervisor-member "unless the offense occasioning the discipline involved a matter purely of internal union administration, unrelated, either directly or indirectly, to any dispute between the union and the employer," or unless the "supervisor-member [was] disciplined after he [had] engaged in more than a minimal amount of rank-and-file work during a strike."[11] By matters of internal union administration, the Board contemplated such as "failing to pay . . . union dues or . . . disturbing a union meeting."[12]

Further, the Board read the word "grievances" in 8(b)(1)(B), and in the Section 2(11) definition of supervisors, to embrace employee grievances unrelated to collective bargaining.[13] This meant, the so-called reservoir doctrine aside, that a supervisor who dealt with employee complaints or problems relating to wage rates, job assignments, time off, etc., was an 8(b)(1)(B) grievance adjuster.[14]

These several principles applied regardless of the existence of a collective-bargaining relationship.[15] Were they still intact, I would have little difficulty concluding that Respondent violated Section 8(b)(1)(B) as alleged. Dallas and Reinkens, as supervisors, would be deemed grievance adjusters by virtue of the reservoir doctrine; and Respondent's actions against them did not involve matters "purely of internal union administration," nor did they have anything to do with the performance of rank-and-file work during a strike. Even without the reservoir doctrine, this same result would have obtained, for Dallas and Reinkens in fact were authorized to adjust certain grievances—having to do with wage rates, for instance—thus satisfying the Board's definition of grievance adjusters, regardless.

In NLRB v. Electrical Workers IBEW Local 340, however, the Supreme Court declared:[16]

> We conclude that discipline of a supervisor-member is prohibited under § 8(b)(1)(B) only when that member is engaged in § 8(b)(1)(B) activities—that is, collective bargaining, grievance adjustment, or some other closely related activity . . . . [A] supervisor cannot be disciplined for acts or omissions that occur during performance of Sec. 8(b)(1)(B) duties if he or she has none. We therefore reject the NLRB's "reservoir doctrine." [Emphasis added.][17]

The Court continued, overriding the Board in another critical respect:[18]

[7] Regarding jurisdictional problems, Reinkens described an instance in which he and representatives of Local 112 and a general contractor "hammered out a deal" to stop the general contractor's use of carpenters on electrical work.

[17] Moreover, although not passing on the Board's definition of 8(b)(1)(B) grievances, the Court suggested (at 107 S.Ct. 2012 fn. 12) that it is overbroad:

> The NLRB held in the alternative that because [the supervisor-member] did adjust personal grievances—as opposed to contract grievances—he qualified as a § 8(b)(1)(B) supervisor, even without application of the reservoir doctrine. . . . [W]e need not decide whether the Board's broad definition of grievance—and hence of "grievance adjustment"—is consistent with the narrow purpose and scope of § 8(b)(1)(B). We observe, however, that in Florida Power the Court said that grievance adjustment is a "particular and explicitly stated activity." 417 U.S. at 803. . . . Other sections of the . . . Act . . . similarly suggest a narrow meaning . . . . See also Comment, Union Discipline of Supervisor-Members, 1976 Wis. L. Rev. at 879 ("[I]n Florida Power the Supreme Court appears to have defined both [collective bargaining and grievance adjustment] very narrowly.").

> We find that the absence of a collective-bargaining relationship between the union and the employer, like the absence of § 8(b)(1)(B) responsibilities in a disciplined supervisor-member, makes the possibility that the Union's discipline of [supervisor-members] will coerce [their employers] too attenuated to form the basis of an unfair labor practice charge.

The Court concluded:[19]

> [U]nion discipline directed at supervisor-members without § 8(b)(1)(B) duties, working for employers with whom the union neither has nor seeks a collective-bargaining relationship, cannot and does not adversely affect the performance of § 8(b)(1)(B) duties. Consequently, such union action does not coerce the employer in its selection of § 8(b)(1)(B) representatives.

The unqualified tenor of these passages seemingly dictates open-and-shut dismissal of the present complaint. A bargaining relationship is lacking,[20] the record contains no substantial evidence that Respondent aspired to one at relevant times,[21] the reservoir doctrine is no more, and the status of Dallas and Reinkens otherwise as 8(b)(1)(B) grievance adjusters is shaky in light of the Court's observations reported above in footnote 17.

But, to dismiss at this point would be premature, for the Court articulated one exception to the requirement of an extant or sought-after bargaining relationship, and hinted at another:[22]

> Direct coercion of an employer's selection of a § 8(b)(1)(B) representative would always be a § 8(b)(1)(B) violation, whether or not the union has or seeks a bargaining relationship with an employer. This case does not present the question whether indirect coercion of an employer in its selection of a representative through a union's selective enforcement of a facially uniform rule would constitute a violation of § 8(b)(1)(B) without regard to whether the union has a bargaining relationship with the employer. The Court of Appeals has suggested that it might. See NLRB v. International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, 714 F.2d at 872 ("The case may be different if there is evidence that the union's actual purpose in enforcing its bylaw was to interfere with the employer's selection.").

By "direct coercion," the Court presumably had in mind activities against an employer qua employer, such as picketing. The conduct in issue plainly is not of that character.

The question becomes, then, whether Respondent's actions against Dallas and Reinkens betray selective enforcement of the International constitution against supervisor-members for the purpose of interfering indirectly with Bruce-Cadet's choice of 8(b)(1)(B) representatives.[23] I conclude, on the record before me, that they do not. LaFaire's professed belief that Dallas and Reinkens had violated Respondent's jurisdiction probably was accurate; and, even if not, was not so flimsily based as to bespeak pretext. Further, although LaFaire initiated no action against the nonsupervisory wireman he apparently saw teaming with Dallas on certain of the disputed work, and weakened his credibility by testifying first that he did, then that he did not, see or hear about anyone but Dallas and Reinkens doing such work, those arguable instances of disparate treatment and dissimulation are too isolated and otherwise inconclusive to satisfy the General Counsel's burden of proving selective enforcement calculated to interfere with Bruce-Cadet's choice of representatives.

Summarizing, Respondent's actions against Dallas and Reinkens did not adversely affect their performance of 8(b)(1)(B) duties, if any, and so could not have coerced Bruce-Cadet in its selection of representatives to perform those duties, because (a) Respondent neither had nor sought a bargaining relationship with Bruce-Cadet at relevant times, and (b) given that deficiency and indulging, arguendo, the assumption stated above in footnote 23, the General Counsel has not met her burden of proving that Respondent selectively enforced its constitution against Dallas and Reinkens to interfere with Bruce-Cadet's freedom of choice.

The complaint therefore lacks merit.

CONCLUSION OF LAW

Respondent did not violate the Act as alleged.[24]

[Recommended Order for dismissal omitted from publication.]

[19] At 107 S.Ct. 2015.

[20] I am unpersuaded that the informal and sporadically applicable jurisdictional understanding among Respondent, Bruce-Cadet, and Local 112 satisfies this requirement. More specifically, I fail to see that it enlarges the potential for abuse of the type Sec. 8(b)(1)(B) was enacted to prevent. See the Court's discussion at 107 S.Ct. 2013-2015.

[21] The most that can be said, on the present record, is that Respondent was seeking to enforce the jurisdictional understanding. Inasmuch as the understanding itself does not give rise to the requisite relationship between Respondent and Bruce-Cadet (see preceding footnote), Respondent's strivings to enforce it can hardly be construed as for the larger purpose of seeking such a relationship.

[23] Assuming for argument that selective enforcement against supervisor-members would be improper, bargaining relationship or not.

[24] In light of this result and the underlying rationale, I need not address whether Dallas' and Reinkens' duties made them 8(b)(1)(B) grievance adjusters.

Maid In New York, Inc. and Local 32B-32J, Service Employees International Union, AFL-CIO. Case 2-CA-21817

June 30, 1988

DECISION AND ORDER

By Chairman Stephens and Members Johansen and Babson

On October 27, 1987, Administrative Law Judge D. Barry Morris issued the attached decision. The General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions[2] and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The recommended Order of the administrative law judge is adopted and the complaint is dismissed.

[1] The General Counsel has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

In adopting the judge's dismissal, we note that the judge implicitly credited Considine rather than the employees concerning what they were told about the Respondent's hiring procedure. We also note that both employees' testimony indicates they were applying for work only at the Whitney Museum.

[2] The judge inaccurately characterized the complaint as alleging a refusal by the Respondent to hire the employees rather than a refusal to consider them for employment at the Whitney Museum. Based on the credited facts as found by the judge, however, we conclude that the complaint was properly dismissed because the alleged discriminatees, for lawful reasons, would not have been considered for hiring at the Whitney without having first demonstrated their ability at another location.

DECISION

Statement of the Case

D. Barry Morris, Administrative Law Judge. This case was heard before me in New York City on 6, 7, and 8 April 1987. On a charge filed on 5 August 1986,[1] a complaint was issued on 19 September, alleging that Maid In New York, Inc. (Respondent) violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act, (the Act). The complaint alleged that Respondent refused to hire three individuals because they were members of Local 32B-32J, Service Employees International Union, AFL-CIO (the Union). Respondent filed an answer denying the commission of the alleged unfair labor practices.

The parties were given full opportunity to participate, produce evidence, examine and cross-examine witnesses, argue orally, and file briefs. Briefs were filed by the General Counsel and by the Respondent.

On the entire record of the case, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, I make the following

Findings of Fact

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent, a New York corporation with an office and place of business in New York City, is engaged in the business of providing cleaning services to commercial customers. Respondent admits and I find that it is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act. In addition, Respondent admits and I find that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Facts

1. Background

Prior to July 1986 the maintenance contract for cleaning services for the Whitney Museum, located in New York City, was held by Allied Maintenance Corporation. John Murray, operations officer of the Whitney Museum, testified that the museum decided to change contractors because Respondent was prepared to perform the services for a lower price. Murray also testified that the Allied crew was too small for the amount of work necessary and that certain jobs were not being done. Accordingly, the decision was made by the museum to award the contract to Respondent. Robert Dellacona, president of Respondent, testified that prior to the award of the contract he inspected the museum's premises and noticed that certain areas of the museum were not cleaned properly. Respondent began working at the museum on 4 August.

2. Hyland's employment with Respondent

E. David Hyland, who appeared to me to be a credible witness, testified that in mid to late July he was advised by Vernon Sampson, chairman of the Union's District 5, that Allied was about to lose the contract with the Whitney Museum. Hyland decided to embark on a course of trying to obtain employment with Respondent. Accordingly, on Friday, 25 July, he telephoned Respondent to inquire about the possibility of applying for a job. Hyland testified that he was told he would "have to come down on . . . a Monday at 2:30. That was the time apparently when typically interviews were held." As instructed, Hyland appeared at Respondent's offices the following Monday, 28 July at 2:30 p.m. Hyland met with Dellacona and with Robert Considine, Dellacona's assistant, and was told to return the next day. On 29 July, as instructed, Hyland came back to Respondent's offices. He and three or four other employees were addressed by Dellacona who "began to talk about the new job that had been acquired and how he was going to schedule work at the museum." Dellacona, however, did not mention the name of the museum. Hyland was assigned a job, not at the museum, and was told by Dellacona "he was going to put me on a job to see if I could clean."

On 30 July Hyland telephoned Dellacona and told him that he was unable to work that day. Hyland was then assigned to a different job, where he worked the following day. On 4 August Hyland appeared at Respondent's offices to pick up cleaning supplies. At that time Hyland told Dellacona that he had signed a pledge card for the Union. Dellacona replied, "We have nothing to do with that and that we are trying to resist the Union." Hyland then reported to the job he was assigned and at 8 p.m. that day he walked off the job. The following morning Hyland telephoned Dellacona to tell him that he was resigning his position with Respondent. Dellacona asked, "What's all this I hear about you talking about the Union with employees." Hyland replied that he was a representative of the Union in its contract department and that he "wanted to find out how Maid in New York operates."

Hyland testified that after his initial telephone conversation with Respondent on 5 July he advised Sampson of the conversation and that he planned to go to Respondent's offices the following Monday for an interview and to fill out an application. After Hyland returned from his interview on 28 July, he had another conversation with Sampson. Hyland testified that Sampson told him that two employees had been taken to Respondent's offices by two of the Union's business agents. Subsequently, Kevin McCulloch, assistant to the president of the Union, instructed Hyland to prepare a mailgram to be sent to Respondent. On 31 July the Union sent a mailgram to Respondent that stated, in part, "the Union wishes to file unconditional application for employment" on behalf of Diaz, Choute, and Penago.

3. Visits to Respondent's offices by Choute and Penago

Dellacona testified that he considered the Whitney Museum as a good account to have obtained and that he wanted to impress the museum with the type of services his company was performing. Consequently, he decided that he would not assign any new employees to work at the museum. He testified that he would not place "new hires" at the Whitney because "it was too important to take the chance." He further testified that sometime during July several of the former employees of Allied came to Respondent's offices seeking employment. Edwin Feliciano, a union business agent, accompanied them and it was made clear that they wanted to work exclusively at the Whitney Museum. Dellacona testified that Considine told the individuals that Respondent was not hiring any new employees to work at the Whitney. Dellacona explained:

> Particularly in this case because at that particular time for my company to get an account like the Whitney Museum was a big deal. There were not many accounts with that monthly billing at that time on my roster. It was supremely important to me to impress them favorably. So under no condition would I let someone I had absolutely no knowledge of come in and go to a place like that.

Dellacona testified that after he received the mailgram dated 31 July from the Union he instructed Considine to advise the Union that the individuals were welcome to make an appointment for an interview at the standard time of Monday, 2:30 p.m. Considine testified that he telephoned Sampson that same day. Sampson told Considine that he was representing the men who were employed at the Whitney and that he wanted Considine "to also employ those people at the Whitney Museum." Considine replied that Sampson "could have the men call to make an appointment, to come in and fill out applications."

Considine testified that a day or two after receipt of the mailgram, Feliciano came to Respondent's offices together with one of the former employees of Allied, Sergio Penago. Feliciano requested to fill out an application for Penago's employment at the Whitney Museum. Considine replied that Respondent was not hiring anyone for the Whitney, and that "he could have the workers involved call to make an appointment to come in the following Monday afternoon . . . to fill out an application, which was our standard procedure." Considine also testified that Feliciano returned to Respondent's offices in September, together with another former Allied employee, Adolph Choute. Feliciano told Considine, "We're here to apply for employment at the Whitney Museum." Considine replied, "I'm still not accepting applications for employment at the Whitney Museum . . . if you'd like you may have Mr. Choute call back and make an appointment for an interview on Monday afternoon."

Choute and Penago also testified. They both appeared to be credible witnesses. Choute testified that sometime after 1 September he went with Feliciano to Respondent's offices. He testified that Feliciano did all the talking and told Respondent's representative that "Mr. Choute used to work at the Whitney Museum. You . . . took over that location, therefore you have to hire Mr. Choute at that location." Respondent's representative replied, "We don't have any opening right now." When Feliciano asked for an application to fill out for Choute, the representative replied, "We don't give any application without an appointment." Penago testified that he went with Feliciano to Respondent's offices during the last week of July. He stated that Feliciano told Respondent's representative that Penago worked at the Whitney Museum and that he was going to fill out an application "to work there again," to which the representative replied "there was no work." Penago further testified that never filled out an employment application for Respondent. In addition, Penago stated that Feliciano told him that Respondent was supposed to hire him with the same salary and the same benefits that he enjoyed while working for Allied and at the same location.

Feliciano did not appear to have a good recollection of the events. Although he testified that he went to Respondent's offices with Choute on 31 July, his affidavit stated the date of the visit to be 17 July. I credit Choute's testimony that he was on vacation during August, and when he returned he went with Feliciano to Respondent's offices after 1 September. Feliciano also testified that he went to Respondent's offices with Penago on 1 August. He spoke to Considine each time and Considine said that no positions were available. Feliciano testified that Considine did not tell him about the Monday procedure for job interviews. When asked what Considine told him about new hires for the Whitney Museum, Feliciano conceded, "He told me that there [were not] any new hires, only that they were trying to place their own personnel at the present time." Feliciano further stated that after 1 August he never called Respondent to find out if there were any openings nor did he follow up the matter in any way.

B. Discussion and Conclusions

Based on the above, I find that around the last week of July Penago went to Respondent's offices accompanied by Feliciano. Feliciano spoke to Considine and requested that Penago be employed to work at the Whitney Museum. Considine told Feliciano that Respondent was not hiring employees to work at the Whitney. This was consistent with Dellacona's credited testimony that because the Whitney account was so important he wanted to assign only those employees whose work he "had an opportunity to review," and that, accordingly, no "new hires" were being assigned to work at the museum. Considine informed Feliciano that Penago could call to make an appointment for a Monday afternoon interview. This was Respondent's standard procedure for interviewing applicants, which the record shows was followed in most instances. Indeed, when Hyland, the Union's own employee, appeared at Respondent's offices on Friday, 25 July, he was told to return the following Monday afternoon for an interview. Penago never called to arrange a subsequent interview.

On 31 July the Union sent Respondent a mailgram that stated, in part, "the Union wishes to file unconditional application for employment" on behalf of Diaz, Choute, and Penago. On receipt of the mailgram Considine called the Union's office and spoke to Sampson. I credit Considine's testimony that Sampson stated during the conversation that he wanted Respondent to employ the individuals at the Whitney Museum. Considine replied that he was not hiring people to work at the Whitney and that Sampson could have the men call to make appointments and come in to Respondent's offices for interviews and to fill out applications. About a month later, sometime after 1 September, Feliciano returned to Respondent's offices with Choute. Feliciano again stated that he was there to apply for employment for Choute at the Whitney Museum. Considine replied that he was still not accepting applications for employment at the Whitney and again suggested that the individual could call and make an appointment for an interview on Monday afternoon.

With respect to Diaz, the complaint alleges that on or about 22 July he applied or employment with Respondent and was not hired. The record does not support a finding that Diaz applied for employment on 22 July or at any other time. The record shows that Diaz has been working for the Whitney Museum as a mechanic since sometime in July. The complaint also alleges that Choute unsuccessfully applied for employment on 22 and 31 July and that Penago similarly unsuccessfully applied for employment on 22 July and on 1 August. The record does not support findings that either Choute or Penago applied for employment on 22 July. The record does show, however, that Penago came to Respondent's offices during the last week of July and that Choute came to Respondent's offices sometime after 1 September.

I find that Respondent did not refuse to hire Choute and Penago because they were union members. When they came to Respondent's offices, Feliciano asked on their behalf that they be employed at the Whitney Museum. Feliciano was told that no new hires were being assigned to the Whitney. However, if the two individuals wished to apply for other cleaning jobs with Respondent, they were to call and make an appointment for a Monday afternoon interview. This was in accordance with Respondent's general procedure for conducting interviews. Choute and Penago did not comply with that procedure.

On 31 July the Union sent a mailgram to Respondent stating that it wishes to file "unconditional application for employment" on behalf of the individuals. As of 31 July the record shows only Penago to have come to Respondent's offices and at that time Feliciano requested that Penago be employed to work at the Whitney. Although Hyland, who prepared the mailgram, testified that he was not aware of any prior conditions having been placed, it is possible to construe the mailgram as an attempt to eliminate the condition that Penago be considered for employment only at the Whitney. However, during the conversation between Considine and Sampson, which took place after Respondent had received the mailgram, Sampson reiterated the request that the individuals be employed at the Whitney Museum. That the Union continued to adhere to its position that the individuals be employed only at the Whitney is buttressed by the fact that a month later, when Choute appeared at Respondent's offices, Feliciano again requested that Choute be hired to work at the Whitney Museum.

I find that Respondent refused to hire the individuals in question because they requested to work specifically at the Whitney Museum and Respondent was not hiring new employees for work at that location. In addition, the individuals never arranged for Monday interviews, which the record shows is Respondent's standard time for interviewing new applicants for employment. Accordingly, the allegations are dismissed.

Carpenters Local 33, a/w United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, AFL-CIO and CB Construction Co., Inc. Case 1-CC-2153

June 30, 1988

DECISION AND ORDER

By Members Johansen, Babson, and Cracraft

On September 1, 1987, Administrative Law Judge George F. McInerny issued the attached decision. The General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Respondent filed an answering brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order.

The judge found that the primary gate set aside for the Union under a reserve gate system was effectively hidden from the view of the general public and was so remotely and inconveniently located as to substantially impair the effectiveness of the Union's picketing, calculated to reach the primary employer's suppliers, visitors, and the general public. The judge concluded that the Respondent Union's picketing at the neutral gate, therefore, was privileged and did not violate Section 8(b)(4)(i) and (ii)(B) of the Act. We disagree.

CB Construction Co., Inc., the Charging Party and the primary employer in the Respondent Union's area standards labor dispute, is a nonunion subcontractor performing renovation work at 262-266 Summer Street, Boston, Massachusetts. The building at 262-266 Summer Street is owned by the 262 Summer Street Realty Trust (Trust). William and Gary Vanderweil, general partners in the Trust, are also the principals of R. G. Vanderweil Engineers, Inc. (RGVE). RGVE moved into the premises at 262-266 Summer Street about March 3, 1987. RGVE and the Trust are secondary or neutral employers in this dispute.

The Respondent Union picketed the 262-266 Summer Street building from about October 20, 1986, until enjoined by the Federal district court on January 28, 1987, with signs stating:

R. G. VANDERWEIL
The owner of 266 Summer Street
IS USING A
SCAB
Construction Company
Carpenters Local No. 33, AFL-CIO

On March 12, 1987, Administrative Law Judge Marion C. Ladwig issued his decision and recommended Order in Case 1-CC-2144 finding that this picketing, which unlawfully named Vanderweil, the neutral employer, as the object of the Respondent's picketing, violated Section 8(b)(4)(i) and (ii)(B) of the Act.[2]

On February 3, 1987, the Respondent Union resumed picketing at 262-266 Summer Street with signs stating:

CB CONSTRUCTION

SCAB
Contractor
Who Does Not Conform to Area Standards Established
by Carpenters Local No. 33, AFL-CIO

This sign is not for organizational or recognitional purposes.

On February 12, 1987, the Federal district court clarified its order to permit such lawful picketing at 262-266 Summer Street.

On March 4, 1987, RGVE and the Trust established a reserved gate system at the site. The main entrance to the building at 266 Summer Street was established and reserved for the use of employees and suppliers of all persons except the employees, suppliers, and visitors of the primary employer.[3] This entrance was designated "Gate B." A gate was established in the rear of the building for the use of employees, suppliers, and visitors of the primary employer. The rear entrance was designated "Gate A."

On March 4, 1987, the Trust notified the Respondent of the reserved gate system. On March 5,

[1] In fn. 3 of his decision, the judge stated that the Federal district court injunction in Case 1-CC-2144 was issued on February 28, 1987. The correct date is January 28, 1987.

The General Counsel's request for a visitatorial remedy is denied. See Cherokee Marine Terminal, 287 NLRB 1080 (1988).

[2] The Respondent Union's picketing of RGVE officers at 38 Chauncy Street in Boston and the residence of Gary Vanderweil with signs bearing similar legends was also the subject of the Federal district court injunction and Judge Ladwig's decision in Case 1-CC-2144. No exceptions were filed to Judge Ladwig's decision, and on April 21, 1987, the Board adopted his decision and recommended Order.

[3] This entrance is the only entrance on Summer Street that may be used by tenants to gain entry into the office space in the building. The other two Summer Street entrances enter into the retail premises of a delicatessen and a graphic arts equipment store, tenants of the building.

1987, the Respondent advised the Trust, by telegram, that it would not honor the reserved gate system. Specifically, the Respondent stated:

> The gate established for CB Construction is in a back alley entirely out of view of the public. Since we are attempting to inform the public of this area's [sic] standard[s] dispute, it is not a valid dual gate system.

After the establishment of the primary gate at the rear of the building, the Respondent continued to picket at the Summer Street entrance. The instant charge was filed and an injunction issued.[4]

As described in the judge's decision, the building at 262–266 Summer Street, the locus of the dispute, is an eight-story brick loft building, which is one of a row of similar structures extending along Summer Street about 660 feet from Fort Point Channel to an overpass over a street called A Street. This row of buildings is unbroken by any opening or passageway between the structures. At the channel end there is a wooden walkway extending along the channel to a 25-foot-wide passageway at the rear of the row of buildings. The structure adjacent to 262–266 Summer Street, 268–272 Summer Street, juts out 40 feet beyond the rear entrance of the locus forming a jog in the passageway. This jog in the passageway extends from the locus to a 30-foot-wide road designated as "Sleeper Street" on one of the plans submitted into evidence. Sleeper Street extends from the rear passageway to a public thoroughfare called Congress Street. Congress Street and the rear passageway run parallel to one another and Sleeper Street connects them. A building backs up to the passageway in the rear of the 262–266 Summer Street structure on one side of Sleeper Street. Across from this building, on the opposite side of Sleeper Street, is a short-term public parking lot used by people who work in the Summer Street buildings, their customers, and other members of the public.

The judge credited William Vanderweil's testimony that the elevator serving the Summer Street entrance to the building is small and unsuitable for the conveyance of construction materials needed for renovation of the upper floors of the building. The judge further credited Vanderweil's testimony that there is only one rear entrance to the premises at the level of the passageway, which is used by Vanderweil's employees, other building tenants, the Charging Party's employees, and others making deliveries or performing work inside the premises. The rear entrance provides access to a freight elevator that is substantially larger than the elevator at the Summer Street entrance. The record indicates that the entrance designated as the primary reserved gate has always been used by CB Construction, its employees, and suppliers since the inception of its work at 262–266 Summer Street because the entrance provides easier access for trucks and workmen carrying supplies. Tradesmen are notified by a sign posted at the Summer Street entrance that all deliveries are to be made at the rear of the building.

The judge concluded that the primary reserved gate is so well hidden from the view of the general public and is so remotely located that restriction of the Respondent Union's picket patrol to the primary gate would substantially impair any lawful picketing's effectiveness. Based on photographs of the situs submitted by both parties, the judge determined that the primary gate sign is scarcely visible to the general public because of its location behind iron window bars and parked cars in a shadowed alley. The judge further determined that members of the public would not be likely to see any pickets patrolling the primary gate entrance or be able to read or comprehend the message on the picket signs.

It is well established that although picketing at locations other than a properly marked primary gate in common situs disputes may indicate noncompliance with Moore Dry Dock standards,[5] this is not so where observance of the separate entrances established would substantially impair the effectiveness of the picketing in reaching the primary employees and suppliers. The General Counsel excepts, inter alia, to the judge's factual determination that the primary gate location substantially impairs the Union's ability effectively to convey its message to all within the legitimate direct appeal of its picket signs and asserts that by picketing the neutral reserved gate the Union engaged in unlawful secondary activity. We find merit to the General Counsel's exceptions.

In recommending dismissal of the complaint, the judge relied on the Board's decisions in Electrical Workers IBEW Local 453 (Southern Sun), 237 NLRB 829 (1978); Carpenters Local 354 (Sharp & Tatro), 268 NLRB 382 (1983); and Electrical Workers IBEW Local 501 (C. W. Pond Electric), 269 NLRB 274 (1984).

Southern Sun is factually distinguishable from the present case. In Southern Sun the Board found that the union's picketing of the neutral gate did not violate Section 8(b)(4)(i) and (ii)(B) of the Act because the reserved gates were improperly established and restriction of picketing to the entrance reserved for the primary employer would unjustly impair the effectiveness of the union's lawful picketing to convey its message to Southern Sun personnel, suppliers, visitors, and the general public. The Board's conclusion was based on the following circumstances: the gate sign for neutrals was placed approximately halfway between two entrances to the construction site; the reserve gate sign for the primary was located near a third entrance on a private alley that, although owned by the general contractor, could not be distinguished visually from the private parking lot of the adjacent store building; the reserved gate sign was barely visible from a public right-of-way; and the primary employer had ignored the reserved gate. On these facts the Board determined that neither the primary nor neutral area was delineated in a manner to provide reasonable assurances to the union that its message would be carried to all within the legitimate, direct appeal of its picket sign.

[4] The record indicates that an injunction was issued by the Honorable William G. Young, United States district judge for the district of Massachusetts on March 25, 1987, barring picketing by the Union other than at the gate reserved for the exclusive use of CB Construction Co., Inc., its employees, suppliers, and visitors.

In the present case, contrary to the discussion in footnotes 5 and 6 of the judge's decision, the evidence does not support a finding that the reserved gate system was breached by the primary employer's employees. Frank Donovan, the project manager for CB, testified on cross-examination in relevant part:

> Q. Isn't it true that your employees take their coffee break in the New York Deli?
> A. Occasionally in the beginning, yes.
> JUDGE MCINERNY: How about during the winter?
> THE WITNESS: During the winter—at a certain point there were coffee machines made available to my employees inside the building.
> By Respondent's Attorney:
> Q. But even after the machines were made available, did they have occasion to go to the New York Deli for their coffee?
> A. I would say so. I'm not there all the time.
> Q. When they went to the New York Deli they would exit through the front door, isn't that correct?
> A. I have no immediate knowledge of that but I would say that's probably correct.
> Q. And they would go in the front of the door of the New York Deli on Summer Street?
> A. Yes.
> Q. They did this in the last month of March and April as well, isn't that true?
>
> A. No, I would say probably not.
> Q. Is your testimony none of your employees went to New York Deli?
> A. No it isn't.
> Q. After March 1st.
> A. I don't know for a fact but I do know they for the most part were having coffee inside the building.
> Q. But on the occasions since March 4, when they went to the New York Deli for coffee, they went out the front door and in the front door of New York Deli?
> . . . .
> THE WITNESS: My employees were instructed not to use the front door after the gate system was set up.
> JUDGE MCINERNY: But you don't know all the time—
> THE WITNESS: I can't say because I'm not there all the time.
> JUDGE MCINERNY: You don't know whether they would have preferred to go to the New York Deli for a cup of coffee instead of buying it out of some machine.
> THE WITNESS: Some of the guys would more than likely rather get it free than pay for it.[6]

This testimony, which was the only testimony on the issue, does not establish that the reserved gate system was tainted. Also, in contrast to Southern Sun, the gates in the present case were clearly delineated. There is no evidence that the reserved gate signs were ambiguously phrased or lacked clarity such that the primary employer's workmen, suppliers, and visitors or those doing business with neutrals were confused or left without guidance.[7] The record discloses, rather, that the gates were clearly marked and there was strict compliance with the reserved gate system.[8]

In Pond, supra, the Board rejected the union's contention that the primary reserved gate was established improperly because it was located at the end of a dead end public road that was rarely used by the general public.[9] The Board determined that the primary gate was clearly marked and maintained, and thus the union was able to convey its message directly to the primary employer and its employees, visitors, suppliers, and the general public. On review before the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia, the case was remanded to the Board to determine whether the union could practically have placed its pickets at a location near the jobsite both reasonably exposed to public view and reasonably separated from the neutral gate.[10] The court ruled that, when a general contractor has established a reserved primary gate virtually hidden from public view, the Board cannot presume unlawful secondary intent from neutral gate picketing without considering whether the union had access to a reasonable alternative public location. Significant to the court's ruling was the fact that the parties had stipulated that the reserved primary gate was virtually hidden from all public view.[11] In the present case, by contrast, the extent of public access to the primary reserved gate is the issue being disputed by the parties.

[6] The reference to free coffee is to the coffee machines set up inside the building for CB employees.

[7] See Sharp & Tatro, 268 NLRB at 388.

[8] The Respondent Union contends that the primary gate sign was not "clearly marked" because it was not visible to members of the general public. The visibility of the gate sign to the general public, however, is not relevant for purposes of determining whether the gate system was clearly delineated and maintained with respect to those utilizing the gate system.

[9] The Board in Pond specifically rejected the contention that Southern Sun holds that a primary reserved gate on a public road is established improperly simply because there is little traffic by the general public at the primary reserved gate.

In Sharp & Tatro, supra, the neutral reserved gate was located on open frontage of the construction jobsite facing onto a city street. The primary reserved gate was located on a more remote corner of the jobsite and could be reached by traversing approximately 455 feet of a cul-de-sac driveway or public access road that merged into a public thoroughfare designated "Welburn Avenue." The union had stationed picket patrols at both gates and near the junction of the public access road and Welburn Avenue. The union contended that its picketing of the neutral gate was privileged because restriction of its patrols to either of the other locations would substantially impair the effectiveness of its lawful picketing. The union conceded that patrols stationed at either the primary gate or close to the intersection of the public access road and Welburn Avenue could effectively reach the primary employer's employees, direct suppliers, and visitors.

The judge held there, with Board approval, that the record did not support the union's assertion that restriction of the picket patrols to either location would preclude meaningful communication of the picket line message to members of the general public. The judge determined that the primary gate was not so well hidden or so remotely located that restriction of the picket patrol to the gate's immediate vicinity would substantially impair any lawful picketing's effectiveness. In so finding, he stated that the fact that the pickets could reach only a limited public composed of tenants of nearby apartments, their visitors, and prospective customers or business callers who might park their cars on the public access road was not grounds for invalidating the gate system. Further, the fact that members of the general public might fail to notice or be unable to read the primary gate sign was found by the judge to be without significance. The judge stated that the union's argument > that a labor organization cannot "effectively" picket a reserved primary gate at some construction jobsite unless members of the public can, without difficulty, discern a connection between that organization's picket sign messages and some nearby, readily visible, project designated as the proclaimed dispute's particular situs—lacks persuasive precedential support.[12]

Consistent with Board precedent we find that the restriction of picketing in the instant case to the primary reserved gate's immediate vicinity would not substantially impair the effectiveness of the Respondent Union's lawful picketing. The intent of the law of common situs picketing is to balance the right of a labor organization to reach its intended audience with the right of neutral employers to be free of labor disputes that are not their own. The determination of where to locate the primary gate was limited in the subject case to two choices—the Summer Street entrance and the rear passageway entrance. Space limitations regarding the Summer Street entrance and front lobby elevator made use of that entrance by CB employees performing renovation work infeasible. In addition, the rear entrance had been utilized by the primary employer's employees prior to the establishment of the reserved gate system. Thus, the designation of the rear entrance reflects a choice that cannot be characterized as reflecting a calculated "bad faith" ploy specifically designed to render ineffective the Union's picketing.[13]

The evidence clearly demonstrates sufficient public use of the rear of the 250–268 Summer Street building to justify the designation of the primary gate as an appropriate reserved gate. The record indicates the following public uses: pedestrian traffic through the rear passageway from Congress Street to the boardwalk abutting the channel on through to Summer Street; pedestrian traffic from the public parking lot to the rear entrance of a restaurant located approximately 60 feet from the primary reserved gate; use of the rear entrance and public parking lot by employees[14] and visitors of tenants of the building and by the primary employer, its employees, suppliers, and visitors; and use of the public parking lot by members of the general public. Tradesmen were instructed by a sign posted at the Summer Street entrance that all deliveries to building tenants were to be made at the rear entrance. One of the building's tenants, CCSI, chose to locate its main customer entrance on the rear passageway. CCSI's door is located approximately 25 feet to the left of the primary gate. The gate sign is located between the primary gate entrance and CCSI's entrance. Thus, the primary reserved gate provided the Union with some access to the public and full access to the primary employer, its employees, suppliers, and visitors.

We find without significance any contention that members of the general public might fail to notice or be unable to read the primary gate sign because of its location.[15] We disagree with the judge's finding that members of the public would not be likely to see pickets moving around the rear entrance or be able to read the picket sign message because of shadows or obstructions in the alley. Photographs of the rear passageway illustrate that vehicular congestion and light conditions varied. Based on the evidence of public use of the passageway, in particular, the "limited public" composed of tenants, visitors, prospective customers, or business callers utilizing the rear passageway or adjacent public parking lot, we conclude that pickets stationed in the immediate vicinity of the primary reserved gate could have effectively communicated their message. Although the primary gate location may not have been ideal, we note that Board precedent does not require primary reserved gate placements calculated to maximize a picket's chances to reach members of the public.[16]

Accordingly, under the circumstances of this case, we conclude that the Respondent Union's legitimate picket line objectives were effectively served without substantial impairment by the established primary reserved gate and we infer unlawful secondary intent from the Union's neutral gate picketing in violation of the secondary boycott provisions of the Act.

CARPENTERS LOCAL NO. 33, A/W UNITED BROTHERHOOD OF CARPENTERS AND JOINERS OF AMERICA, AFL-CIO

Carol Sax, Esq., for the General Counsel.
Aaron Krakow, Esq. (Fienberg and Feld), of Boston, Massachusetts, for the Respondent.

DECISION

GEORGE F. MCINERNY, Administrative Law Judge. Based on a charge filed on 9 March 1987 by CB Construction Co., Inc. (Charging Party), the Acting Regional Director for Region 1 of the National Labor Relations Board (Regional Director and the Board) issued a complaint on 27 March 1987 alleging that Carpenters Local 33, affiliated with the United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, AFL-CIO (Respondent) had violated Section 8(b)(4)(i) and (ii)(B) of the National Relations Act (the Act). The Respondent Union filed a timely answer to the complaint, in which it denied the commission of any unfair labor practices.

Pursuant to notice issued by the Regional Director, together with the complaint, a hearing was held before me at Boston, Massachusetts, on 7 and 19 May 1987, at which hearing the General Counsel and Respondent were represented by counsel, and all parties had the opportunity to present testimony and documentary evidence, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, and to argue orally. After the close of the hearing the General Counsel and Respondent filed briefs, which have been carefully reviewed.

Based on the entire record in this case, including my observation of the witnesses and their demeanor, I make the following

[17] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

The parties stipulated that: (1) the charges were filed by the Charging Party on 9 March 1987, and that a copy was served on the Respondent; (2) at all times material, the Charging Party was a corporation with an office and place of business in West Roxbury, Massachusetts, where it is engaged in the construction business as a general contractor; (3) that during the calendar year ending 31 December 1986, the Charging Party purchased and received at its Massachusetts locations goods and materials valued at over $50,000 directly from points outside the Commonwealth of Massachusetts; and (4) that at all times material the Charging Party has been an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

The parties stipulated, and I find, that the Respondent, Carpenters Local 33, a/w United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, AFL-CIO is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act, that Robert M. Marshall is an organizer for the Union, and that Robert D. Marshall, the father of Robert M. Marshall, is a business agent for the Union.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Stipulated Facts

The parties stipulated:

(1) That 262 Summer Street Realty Trust has owned and operated an office building located at 262-266 Summer Street, Boston, Massachusetts, at all times material.

(2) That the Charging Party has had a contract with 262 Summer Street Realty Trust to perform renovation work at 262-266 Summer Street at all times material.

(3) That at all times material, the Respondent Union has been engaged in a labor dispute with the Charging Party, pursuant to which the Union commenced picketing about 3 February 1987 at 262-266 Summer Street, bearing signs stating

is SCAB
CONTRACTOR
Who does not conform to area standards established by Carpenters
This sign is not for recognition or organizational purposes

(4) That on or about 4 March 1987 a dual-gate system was established at the building. The entrance at 262-266 Summer Street was established and reserved for the use of employees and suppliers of all other persons except the employees, suppliers, and visitors of the Charging Party. A gate was established in the back of the building for the use of employees and suppliers of the Charging Party.

(5) After the establishment of the dual-gate system on 4 March 1987, the Respondent continued to picket at the front of the building at the Summer Street entrance.

B. The Locus of the Dispute

The matters at issue here arise out of remodeling work being performed at an eight-story brick loft building located at 262-266 Summer Street in the city of Boston. The building is one of a row of similar structures located on a main street located just across a disused waterway called Fort Point Channel[1] from the downtown business district. This row is a solid line of buildings, extending along Summer Street about 660 feet from the channel to an overpass over a street called A Street unbroken by any opening or passageway between the structures. At the channel end there is a covered wooden walkway 5-1/2 feet wide extending along the channel to an alley or passageway at the rear of the row of buildings. This latter passageway is 25 or 26 feet wide and extends the length of the block, terminating at the aforementioned A Street.

Directly in back of 262-266 Summer Street there is a jog in the passageway, and there is another way, described on one of the plans submitted in evidence as being 30 feet wide, and on another as having the name Sleeper Street, extending from this locus to a thoroughfare called Congress Street. On one side of Sleeper Street there is a building that backs up to the passageway in the rear of our Locus. The other side is occupied by a parking lot used, according to the testimony of William Vanderwill, the managing partner of the 262-266 Summer Street building, as parking for people who work in the Summer Street buildings, their customers, and other members of the public.

No one was able to state whether Sleeper Street or the rear passageway just described were public or private ways. However, a portion of Sleeper Street on the side adjacent to a building, and opposite the parking lot, apparently is reserved for parking for tenants of that building, and photographs of the rear passageway show "no parking" signs at the rear of buildings abutting on that way. There are also dumpsters sitting in the passageway, apparently for the use of owners or tenants of the abutting buildings. The question of public or private ownership is not really an issue here, but I would assume that these passageways are privately owned, with permitted access by the public through from the walkway along the channel through to A Street, and along Sleeper Street to Congress Street.

The plans submitted in evidence here indicate, and the photographs taken under the direction of the General Counsel and the Respondent show, that the portion of the rear passageway immediately adjacent to the rear entrance of the locus is a dark, unpaved, area cluttered by dumpsters, delivery trucks, and service vehicles. One building stands directly opposite the rear entrance, of the locus, and another, the adjacent structure at 268-272 Summer Street, jots out 40 feet beyond our locus and forms a jog in the rear passageway. The location of these neighboring buildings with the fact that the rear of the locus faces almost directly north, means that the rear entrance would be almost always in shadow. Indeed the photographs[2] indicate a dark, canyon-like aspect to the passageway directly in the rear of 262-266 Summer Street.

[1] Described in the record as "four point" channel, or "4 point" channel.

C. The Building at 262-266 Summer Street

As I have noted, this building, the locus of the dispute here, is an eight-story, brick loft building, similar to the seven or eight others in the row between Fort Point Channel and the A Street overpass. Its dimensions are about 97 feet on Summer Street, narrowing to 87 feet at the rear passageway, and 93 feet on the sidelines. It almost entirely covers the 6198 square foot lot on which it is situated.

On the Summer Street side, the street level of the locus has three entrances, a delicatessen at the northerly end, a graphic arts equipment store in the middle, and the entrace to the building lobby, and elevator, upper floors and offices at the south end. There was testimony, which I credit, that the elevator serving this entrance is small, about 2 by 4 feet, and unsuitable for the conveyance of construction materials to the upper floors, which were undergoing rehabilitation during times material.

At the rear, Vanderweil's testimony stated that there is only one entrance to the premises, at the level of the above-described passageway, which is used by Vanderweil's employees, other building tenants, the Charging Party's employees, and others making deliveries or performing work inside the premises. At this level there is a freight elevator, substantially larger than the elevator at the Summer Street entrance, which serves to carry equipment and supplies as well as people to the upper floors. There is a passage, by means of corridors and stairs, from this rear entrance to the first entrance, but there is no indication in the record that any of the people involved in this case were or are in the habit of using this passage.

D. Background and Current Factual Situation

A previous matter concerning these same parties was the subject matter of a charge filed on 29 December 1986 in Case 1-CC-2144. A complaint was issued in that case on 4 February 1987 by the Regional Director, and a hearing was held on 9 March 1987, before my colleague Administrative Law Judge Marion C. Ladwig.[3] Judge Ladwig's decision isued on 12 March 1987 and found that the Union had violated Section 8(b)(4)(i) and (ii)(B) of the Act. No exceptions were filed to this decision, and on 21 April 1987 the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order of Judge Ladwig's decision were adopted by the Board.

So far as can be determined by the record in this case, the Union has complied with the Board's decision in Case 1-CC-2144. The picketing at the offices of Vanderweil Engineering, and at the home of one of the general trustees of the 262 Summer Street Realty Trust ceased, and the language on the picket signs was changed.

From 3 February to 4 March, when the reserved gate was established, picketing went on at the Summer Street entrance to the building. After the establishment of the reserved gate at the rear of the building, the Union continued to picket at the front. The instant charge was then filed and a second injunction was issued by Judge Young. The picketing ceased and, so far as can be determined from the record, has not resumed either at the front or back of the building. There has been no communication between the Realty Trust, Vanderweil Engineering, and the Union, and the only communications between the Charging Party, CB Construction, and the Union was an exchange of mailgrams; one from CB to the Union dated 4 March informing the Union of the reserved gate, and a reply dated 5 March from the Union stating that the reserved gate "is in a back alley entirely out of view of the public. Since we are attempting to inform the public of this area's [sic] standard dispute, it is not a valid-dual gate system."

The evidence here, based on the generally credible testimony of William Vanderweil and Frank Donovan, the project manager for CB, shows that the sign for the reserved gate, gate "A," was at least until the time of the hearing in this case partially obscured because it was located in a window, adjacent to the entrance it described, behind iron bars that cover the window. After the first day of this hearing, the sign was moved above the bars.

There is some pedestrian traffic at the rear of the building. Vanderweil testified that his employees use the rear door to come in and out of the building, that his tenants and those servicing his offices and those of the tenants found it more convenient to use the parking lot and the rear entrance, rather than Summer Street with its parking meters and heavy traffic. Vanderweil also testified about other people using the rear passageway and Sleeper Street to patronize a restaurant[4] in the next building.[5]

The testimony of Robert M. Marshall, which I also found generally credible, indicated that at times when he observed the rear entrance, not only was the reserved gate sign partially obscured by the barred window, but the signs and the passageways themselves were blocked by vehicles as well as wooden pallets, old concrete posts, other debris, and dumpsters, and was marred by puddles and potholes.

[2] Both those submitted by the Union and by the General Counsel.

[3] The General Counsel in the instant case stated on the record that in Case 1-CC-2144 an injunction was issued by the Honorable William G. Young, U.S. district judge for the district of Massachusetts, on 28 February 1987, barring unlawful picketing by the Union. Counsel also stated that 4 or 5 days later picketing resumed at 262-266 Summer Street by the Union, with signs bearing the legend set out in item 3 of the stipulation, supra.

[4] Not the same as the delicatessen in 262-266 Summer Street.

[5] Donovan also testified that he was aware that CB employee, who ordinarily came and went through the reserved entrance also used the front door, gate "B" reserved for all others except employees of CB, to leave the building proper to patronize the delicatessen at 262 Summer Street. All of this may raise some question about the integrity of the reserved gate system, but in view of my disposition of the issues, I do not feel it is necessary for me to face that question. See Electrical Workers IBEW Local 441 (Suburban Development), 158 NLRB 549 (1966).

E. Conclusion

The photographs submitted by both parties here show, as I have indicated, that the passageway to the rear of the locus here was shadowed, cluttered, in poor repair, and unlikely to be used by anyone except people with business in the buildings abutting. Pedestrians wanting to travel between Summer and Congress Street use an attractive, covered walkway along Fort Point Channel. Otherwise, they would have to walk through the row of buildings that includes 262-266 Summer Street. If there are people who do use Sleeper Street, the passageway to patronize a restaurant is about 60 feet east of the locus. The reserved gate sign was scarcely visible even from that part of the parking lot or Sleeper Street closest to the locus.[6] Members of the public, even if they were passing up Sleeper Street toward the locus in order to go to the next-door restaurant would, in my opinion, have to search for the sign in order to see it. Nor would members of the public be likely to see any pickets moving around that rear entrance between and among puddles, pallets, and pickups, let alone be able to read or comprehend the message on picket signs moving about in the shadows.

The evidence thus seems clear that the gate here set aside for the Union to picket is effectively hidden from the view of the general public, and is so remotely and inconveniently located as to substantially impair the effectiveness of the Union's picketing, calculated to reach the primary employer's employees, suppliers, visitors, and the general public. Electrical Workers IBEW Local 453 (Southern Sun), 237 NLRB 829 (1978); Carpenters Local 354 (Sharp & Tatro), 268 NLRB 382 (1983); Electrical Workers IBEW Local 501 (C. W. Pond), 269 NLRB 274 (1984).

There are no issues in this case on the other standards in Moore Dry Dock.[7]

I find, therefore, that the Respondent Union has not violated Section 8(b)(4)(i) and (ii)(B) of the Act.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. The Charging Party, CB Construction, is an employer within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. The Respondent Union, Carpenters Local 33, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. The Respondent Union has not violated the National Labor Relations Act.

[Recommended Order for dismissal omitted from publication.]

[6] As the Union points out in its brief, the fact that the reserved gate sign was obscured by iron bars, trucks, and cars afforded no assurance that the appropriate persons would use the gate. Donovan's testimony shows that CB employees, in fact, used the other gate, in the front, from time to time. He did not know how often, or how many people used the wrong gate.

Newspaper and Mail Deliverers' Union of New York and Vicinity and Macromedia Publishing Incorporated. Case 22-CP-356

June 30, 1988

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On the basis of a charge filed on January 27, 1986, by Macromedia Publishing Incorporated (the Employer), the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board, by the Acting Regional Director for Region 22, issued a complaint against Newspaper and Mail Deliverers' Union of New York and Vicinity (the Respondent) on February 7, 1986. The complaint alleges that since about December 28, 1985, the Respondent has violated Section 8(b)(7)(C) of the Act by picketing the Employer in order to force or require the Employer to recognize and bargain with the Respondent as the representative of certain of its employees, without a valid petition under Section 9(c) of the Act having been filed within a reasonable period of time from the commencement of the picketing. The Respondent filed an answer to the complaint on February 20, 1986, in which it denied the commission of any unfair labor practice and asserted several affirmative defenses.

On May 6, 1986, the parties filed a motion to transfer proceeding to the Board and they agreed that certain documents would constitute the entire record in this case,[1] waived a hearing before an administrative law judge, and submitted this case directly to the Board for it to make findings of fact and conclusions of law and the issuance of a Decision and Order. On July 25, 1986, the Board granted the motion and set a date for the parties to file briefs. None of the parties filed a brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the entire record[2] and makes the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. THE BUSINESS OF THE EMPLOYER

The Employer, a New Jersey corporation, is engaged in the publication, circulation, and distribution of the News Tribune newspaper at its facility in Woodbridge, New Jersey. During the past year, the Employer derived gross revenues in excess of $200,000 and held membership in, and subscribed to, interstate news services, published nationally syndicated features, and advertised nationally sold products. From the foregoing, the Employer admitted, and we find, that the Employer is engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

The Respondent is, and at all material times has been, a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Facts[3]

Prior to the Employer's purchase of its assets, Middlesex County Publishing Company (Middlesex) was the publisher of a daily newspaper, the News Tribune. In October 1971, the Board certified the Respondent as the exclusive bargaining representative of all circulation employees, including truckdrivers, mailroom workers, promotion employees, branch office operators, and other shipping and receiving employees employed by Middlesex at its Woodbridge, New Jersey facility. In March 1972, with the Respondent's consent, Middlesex subcontracted its delivery operation to 3-C Corporation (3-C), which then entered into a collective-bargaining agreement with the Respondent. About the same time, Middlesex signed a letter of understanding with the Respondent, stating that if Middlesex terminated its contract with 3-C it would either directly deliver the newspaper using its own employees and negotiate an agreement with the Respondent or subcontract to another company that already had an agreement with the Respondent.

On November 5, 1985, in a bona fide purchase, the Employer acquired the assets of Middlesex.

[1] The parties did not file a stipulation of facts. They agreed that the record in this proceeding should consist of the following: the charge, the complaint, the order granting extension of time to file an answer, and the answer; the transcript of proceedings on January 14, 1986, in NMDU v. Macromedia Publishing Incorporated, Civil No. 85-5940 (D.N.J. 1986), a Sec. 301 suit in the U.S. District Court for the District of New Jersey, and two attendant exhibits (assets purchase agreement and assignment and assumption agreement), the transcript of the proceedings on January 15, 1986, and the orders issued in that case on January 29, 1986, and March 25, 1986; and the record in Kendellen v. NMDU, Civil No. 86-582 (D.N.J. 1986), a Sec. 10(l) proceeding in the U.S. District Court for the District of New Jersey, including the petition for injunction, the Respondent's answer to the petition, Petitioner's memorandum of points and authorities in support of petition for injunction, transcript of the proceedings on February 28, 1986, and attendant exhibits, posthearing memorandum of NMDU, the Petitioner's posthearing memorandum, transcript of the proceedings on March 13, 1986, and order granting preliminary injunction.

[2] A Determination of Dispute involving the parties to this proceeding issued on September 29, 1986, in Newspaper & Mail Deliverers (Macromedia Publishing), 281 NLRB 588 (1986).

[3] The facts, which are not in material dispute, are taken from the evidence adduced in the proceedings in the U.S. District Court for the District of New Jersey, supra, fn. 1.

289 NLRB No. 68

The Employer agreed to assume certain agreements, leases, and contracts as stipulated in the purchase sale agreement.

On November 7, 1985, Middlesex advised 3-C that its contract was canceled. About December 20, 1985, 3-C advised the Respondent that truckdrivers represented by the Respondent would be terminated effective January 1, 1986, once the newspaper operations were transferred to the Employer. On December 23, 1985, the Employer advised the Respondent that it intended not to hire 3-C employees represented by the Respondent, but instead would subcontract the Employer's delivery services to another independent contractor. In December 1985, the Employer engaged T C Enterprises, Ltd. d/b/a Associated Security Specialists (Associated), whose employee drivers are unrepresented, to provide security and delivery services for the publication of the News Tribune.

On December 27, 1985, the Employer commenced publication of the News Tribune. From that date, the Respondent commenced picketing of the Employer's premises carrying picket signs bearing, inter alia, the legends, "NMDU Locked Out, the News Tribune Unfair to Organized Labor," "'It Ain't Over Till It's Over' This Site Founded on December 27, 1985, by Pr. Jerry Cronin, N.M.D.U.," and "Scabs Go Home." At some point between January 14, 1986, and about February 5, 1986, some of the picket signs also read, "Notice To The Public Including Consumers. The News Tribune Does Not Employ Members of Newspaper and Mail Deliverers' Union." After February 5, 1986, the pickets continued to carry signs stating "Scabs Go Home" and other pickets carried no signs at all. There was no hiatus in picketing prior to the appearance of the "Notice to the Public" legends, and the picketing continued unabated. The Respondent did not file a valid petition for an election under Section 9(c). According to the testimony of the Employer's attorney, John Langel, the Respondent's attorney indicated to him that the only way the picketing would cease would be if the Employer hired the employees directly or entered into an agreement with "an NMDU organized wholesaler" to provide delivery.

The picketing disrupted the Employer's operations to the following extent. The picketing caused 25-30 delivery trucks to stop at the picket line and turn away. These trucks carried advertising inserts, newsprint, and other materials used in the Employer's operation. Further, the pickets stopped several trucks by running or standing directly in front of the trucks. As a result of the picketing, the Employer has made special arrangements to receive deliveries, including sending security personnel to pick up supplies and advertising supplements. The Employer's vice president and business manager, John Burk, testified in the Section 10(l) proceeding[4] that 90 percent of his time was consumed making special arrangements attributable to the picketing. The Employer has had to change its presstime from 7 a.m. to 1 a.m., at least in part as a result of the disruptions caused by the picketing.

B. Contentions of the Parties

As noted, the parties did not file briefs or make any contentions before the Board independent of the pleadings in this case and the proceedings of the U.S. District Court for the District of New Jersey in the Section 301 and Section 10(l) matters. The General Counsel contends that the Respondent picketed the Employer with an object of forcing it to recognize or bargain with the Respondent in violation of Section 8(b)(7)(C) of the Act. The General Counsel further contends that the picketing was not privileged by the second proviso to Section 8(b)(7)(C) of the Act. The Respondent contends in its answer that it is the certified representative of certain employees at the News Tribune, that the Employer is a successor to Middlesex for purposes of bargaining with the Union, that the Employer terminated employees represented by the Respondent in furtherance of a plan to deprive employees of their collectively bargained rights, and that the picketing was not for a recognitional objective, but rather was for the purpose of truthfully advising the public that the Employer does not employ members of the Respondent or have a contract with the Respondent.

D. Discussion and Conclusions

Section 8(b)(7)(C) of the Act, in pertinent part, makes it an unfair labor practice for a labor organization, not certified as the representative of an employer's employees, to picket an employer

> . . . (7) where an object thereof is forcing or requiring an employer to recognize or bargain with a labor organization as the representative of his employees . . . .
> (C) where such picketing has been conducted without a petition under section 9(c) . . . being filed within a reasonable period of time not to exceed thirty days from the commencement of such picketing . . . . Provided further, That nothing in this subparagraph (C) shall be construed to prohibit any picketing or other publicity for the purpose of truthfully advising

---

> the public (including consumers) that an employer does not employ members of, or have a contract with, a labor organization, unless an effect of such picketing is to induce any individual employed by any other person in the course of his employment, not to pick up, deliver or transport any goods or not to perform any services.

The record here shows that, prior to the Employer's acquisition of the News Tribune, the Respondent represented circulation employees employed by subcontractor 3-C, pursuant to a Board certification and letter of understanding with Middlesex, the former owner of the News Tribune. Picketing began on December 27, 1985, virtually immediately on the Employer's commencement of publication and its use of a nonunion independent contractor, Associated, to perform security and delivery services. The picketing was directed at the News Tribune, now published by the Employer, protested the use of "scabs," and accused the News Tribune of locking out employees and being unfair. Further, the Respondent's attorney indicated to the Employer that the picketing would cease if the Employer hired employees directly or entered into an agreement with a delivery service whose employees were represented by the Respondent.

In these circumstances, it is evident that an object of the Respondent's picketing of the Employer was to achieve a continuation of the Respondent's former representative status of circulation employees employed in the operation of the News Tribune, either by establishing a bargaining relationship directly with the Employer or by forcing the Employer to subcontract work to an entity having a bargaining relationship with the Respondent. Indeed, consistent with the objective sought by the picketing, the Respondent has consistently maintained that the Employer is legally obligated to recognize and bargain with the Respondent. Thus, in its answer to the complaint, the Respondent asserts that it is the representative of the circulation employees of the News Tribune and, pursuant to that assertion, the Respondent filed both an unfair labor charge contending, in pertinent part, that the Employer violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by refusing to bargain,[5] and a Section 301 suit also asserting a bargaining obligation on the part of the Employer.[6] Accordingly, we find that an object of the picketing was to force or require the Employer to recognize the Respondent as the representative of the circulation employees.

The Respondent contends in the answer to the complaint, as it did in the prior proceedings before the District Court of New Jersey, that it is the certified representative of the circulation employees and that the Employer is a successor to Middlesex, from whom the Employer acquired the News Tribune. The Employer, however, employs no employees to handle deliveries in the circulation unit that the Respondent asserts it represents. Those duties are performed by Associated, whose employees are not represented by the Respondent. Thus, the Employer is not an employer of the employees for whom the Respondent contends a successor relationship exists.[7] Further, there is no evidence establishing that the Employer agreed to recognize the Respondent or to assume the obligations of the collective-bargaining agreement between 3-C and the Respondent.[8] Because there is no probative evidence of the requisite work force continuity necessary to establish successorship status on the Employer,[9] or to establish that the Employer agreed to be bound by the obligations of the seller, Middlesex, we find that the Employer is not a successor to Middlesex or 3-C with respect to the circulation employees formerly employed by 3-C, and that the Respondent, therefore, is not a labor organization "currently certified as the representative of such employees" within the meaning of Section 8(b)(7)(C).[10]

Subsequent to the finding by the U.S. District Court for the District of New Jersey that the Employer was not a successor employer, the Respondent displayed additional picket signs at the Employer's premises reading, "Notice to the Public Including Consumers. The News Tribune Does not Employ Members of Newspapers and Mail Deliverers' Union." The Respondent contends that these signs privilege the picketing under the second proviso to Section 8(b)(7)(C). We find this contention lacking in merit. Despite the appearance of the "Notice to the Public" signs, we find an object of the picketing continued to be immediate recognition. The signs were not accompanied by a disclaimer of recognition, the "Scabs Go Home" signs continued to be used, and some pickets carried no signs, which under the circumstances, indicated that they were picketing in furtherance of the messages conveyed by the legends of both signs. There also was no hiatus in the picketing; and the Respondent not only did not inform the Employer that it was not interested in immediate recognition, it never repudiated the statements of its attorney—nor did he retract them—that the picketing would cease when the Employer either hired the former 3-C employees or signed a contract to provide delivery services with a subcontractor whose employees were represented by the Respondent. See McClintock Market, 244 NLRB 555, 556 (1979) (despite disclaimer, union's course of conduct was tantamount to present demand for recognition where there was no hiatus in picketing and the union did not unequivocally inform the employer it was not interested in immediate recognition).

[5] The Respondent filed an unfair labor practice charge on December 27, 1985, against Middlesex, 3-C, and the Employer, alleging violations of Sec. 8(a)(1), (3), and (5). On January 24, 1986, the Regional Director dismissed the charge. On April 14, 1986, the General Counsel denied the Respondent's appeal of the dismissal.

[7] There is no evidence that the Employer is a joint employer with Associated of the circulation employees.

[8] The record before us in this proceeding, as it pertains to the Respondent's successorship contentions, consists virtually entirely of the Sec. 301 proceeding in the U.S. District Court for the District of New Jersey. The primary evidence presented in that proceeding by the Respondent to establish successorship is the Assets Purchase Agreement between Middlesex and the Employer. That agreement provides that the latter "will purchase from sellers all the tangible and intangible assets of [Middlesex] including, without limitation the following: [specification of assets omitted here]." The only labor agreement mentioned thereafter is an agreement with Newark Newspaper and Graphic Communication Union No. 8. The Assets Purchase Agreement makes no mention of the bargaining agreement between 3-C and the Respondent. Accordingly, we find no merit to the Respondent's contention that the Employer contractually assumed Middlesex' relationship with the Union. Newspaper & Mail Deliverer (Macromedia Publishing), 281 NLRB 588 fn. 15 (1986).

[9] NLRB v. Burns Security Services, 406 U.S. 272 (1972); Fall River Dyeing Corp. v. NLRB, 482 U.S. 27 (1987).

[10] In its answer the Respondent asserts that Macromedia and Middlesex terminated union-represented employees in furtherance of a plan to deprive individuals represented by the Respondent of their collectively bargained rights. As no evidence was presented in support of this assertion, we reject it as lacking merit.

In any event, assuming, arguendo, that these signs express the Respondent's true intention to inform the public that its members are not employed at the Employer's premises, the picketing at the Respondent's premises had the effect of inducing individuals in the course of their employment not to pick up, deliver, or transport goods or not to perform services. As noted, numerous delivery trucks refused to cross the picket line and the pickets stopped several delivery trucks from the site by running or standing in front of the trucks. These substantial disruptions required the Employer to make special arrangements to receive deliveries and contributed to the alteration of its designated presstime from 7 a.m. to 1 a.m.[11] Thus, the picketing at no time was privileged by the second proviso of Section 8(b)(7)(C).

Accordingly, we find that the Respondent's picketing at the Employer's premises since December 27, 1985, violated Section 8(b)(7)(C) of the Act, as alleged.

THE REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has violated Section 8(b)(7)(C) of the Act, we shall order it to cease and desist and take certain affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.[12]

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Macromedia Publishing Incorporated, Woodbridge, New Jersey, is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. The Respondent is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By picketing the Employer commencing December 27, 1985, with an object of forcing or requiring the Employer to recognize and bargain with the Respondent as the representative of circulation employees, where such picketing has been conducted without a petition being filed under Section 9(c) of the Act within a reasonable period of time not to exceed 30 days from the commencement of such picketing, the Respondent has violated Section 8(b)(7)(C) of the Act.

4. The foregoing is an unfair labor practice within the meaning of the Act.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, Newspaper and Mail Deliverers' Union of New York and Vicinity, Woodbridge, New Jersey, its officers, agents, and representatives, shall

1. Cease and desist from picketing, or causing to be picketed, Macromedia Publishing Incorporated where an object thereof is forcing or requiring the Employer to recognize or bargain with the Respondent as the collective-bargaining representative of circulation employees, at a time when the Respondent is not certified as such representative and where such picketing has been conducted without a petition under Section 9(c) of the Act being filed within a reasonable period of time not to exceed 30 days from the commencement of such picketing.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Post at its offices and meeting halls copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[13] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 22, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to members are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

[11] We find no merit to the Respondent's contentions that these disruptions were de minimis in character.

[12] The General Counsel's request for a visitatorial clause is denied, as such clause is not necessary in the circumstances of this case. Cherokee Marine Terminal, 287 NLRB 1080 (1988).

[13] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

(b) Furnish the Regional Director for Region 22 signed copies of the notice in sufficient numbers for posting by Macromedia Publishing Incorporated, if willing, in places where notices to employees are customarily posted.

(c) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

June 30, 1988

DECISION AND DETERMINATION OF DISPUTE

By Chairman Stephens and Members Johansen and Babson

The charge in this Section 10(k) proceeding was filed on August 14, 1985, amended August 15, by the Employer, alleging that the Respondent, General Longshore Workers Local Union No. 3000 of International Longshoremen's Association, AFL–CIO, violated Section 8(b)(4)(D) of the National Labor Relations Act by engaging in proscribed activity with an object of forcing the Employer to assign certain work to employees it represents rather than to employees represented by Teamsters Local Union No. 270, affiliated with the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, AFL–CIO. The hearing was held on September 16 and 17 before Hearing Officer Lyn J. Beck.[2]

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board affirms the hearing officer's rulings, finding them free from prejudicial error.

On the entire record, the Board makes the following findings.

I. JURISDICTION

The Employer, Coastal Cargo Company, Inc. (CCCI), a Louisiana corporation, operates a cargo company. Based on a projection of the Employer's New Orleans operations (since they commenced on July 16, 1985), the Employer will derive annual gross revenues in excess of $50,000 for services performed as a link in interstate commerce and will annually purchase and receive goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from points outside the State of Louisiana.

The parties stipulate to facts that satisfy the Board's jurisdictional requirements. We find that CCCI is engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

The parties stipulate, and we find, that Local 3000 and Local 270 are labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE DISPUTE

A. Background and Facts of Dispute

CCCI was incorporated on July 16, 1985. It is a cargo company that loads and unloads ships docked at the Port of New Orleans. CCCI loads grain, breakbulk, and containerized cargo onto vessels and discharges cargo from vessels or barges onto the dock. In the related case, Coastal Cargo Co., supra, the Board determined that CCCI is the alter ego of a now-defunct company called Coastal Cargo Company, which operated from May 4 to October 1, 1984; this company had a collective-bargaining agreement with Local 270, which ran from May 1, 1984, to April 30, 1987. On July 1, 1985, CCCI signed a collective-bargaining agreement with Local 270, effective until June 30, 1988. The Board determined that this was a valid agreement because CCCI was a continuation of Coastal Cargo Company and was subject to the latter's bargaining obligations.[3]

On July 16, 1985,[4] CCCI engaged in its first operation. CCCI loaded and unloaded the M/V Marina Heeren, which was docked at the Galvez Street Wharf in New Orleans. At the wharf a man who said he was a vice president of Local 3000 approached CCCI's president, Durel Landry, and asked him who was loading the Marina Heeren. When Landry said Local 270 was doing the work, the man stated that he was going to Local 270's president, Mitch Ledet, and ask why members of the Teamsters were doing stevedoring work.

Ledet testified that on July 24, at a meeting attended by Ledet and Local 3000's president, Cliven Cormier, Cormier said he would do whatever was necessary to get the stevedoring work back from Local 270. Cormier denied making the statement.

On July 29, the Marina Heeren returned to the Galvez Street Wharf and was unloaded by CCCI's employees. During the unloading, the Galvez Street Wharf and surrounding areas were picketed by approximately 50 men carrying signs.[5] The

The signs said: "Mitch Ledet is taking food out of our babies' mouths"; "big-time union boss Ledet is stealing workers' bread"; "what has the boss given you, Ledet, for you"; "Ledet has forgotten where he came from. Don't you be a scab"; and "what has the boss given Ledet for you to make scabs out of brother Teamsters."

group contained retired and active members of Local 3000.[6] The police eventually dispersed the pickets and they moved from the wharf to the Galvez Street—Japonica Street area. This was the entranceway used by the trucking firm hired by CCCI to transport the containers unloaded from the Marina Heeren. The truckdrivers were also members of Local 270. Landry testified that 10 pounds of roofing nails and drywall nails were spread on the access roads to the Galvez Street Wharf. The nails became imbedded in the tires of the hired trucks.

On August 13 the Marina Heeren again docked at the Galvez Street Wharf. About 50 men picketed at the Galvez Street floodgate carrying the same signs as on June 29. Harris and Sarentine were among the pickets.

B. Work in Dispute

The disputed work involves the loading and unloading of containerized cargo from the oceangoing vessel M/V Marina Heeren at the Galvez Street Wharf.

C. Contentions of the Parties

The Employer, CCCI, contends that reasonable cause exists to believe that Local 3000 violated Section 8(b)(4)(D) of the Act; and that the work in dispute should be awarded to CCCI's employees represented by Local 270 based on the factors of employer preference, past practice, the collective-bargaining agreement, skill, and economy and efficiency.

Local 3000 contends that the picketing was informational picketing, and the signs were aimed at Local 270's president, Mitch Ledet, and not at the Employer. Local 3000 also contends that Harris organized the picketing without authority from Local 3000 and that Harris is not an agent of Local 3000.

D. Applicability of the Statute

Section 10(k) of the Act empowers the Board to determine a dispute out of which an 8(b)(4)(D) charge has arisen. However, before the Board proceeds with a determination of dispute it must be satisfied that there is reasonable cause to believe that Section 8(b)(4)(D) has been violated, and that there is no agreed-upon method for voluntary settlement of the dispute.

At the beginning of the dispute, CCCI's employees represented by Local 270 had been assigned to perform the work in dispute. The longshoremen contended that the work belonged to them. Members of Local 3000 twice picketed the Marina Heeren, the situs of the work, with signs, two of which referred to the teamsters as "scabs." Scab is a "term of art" commonly used by a union member who has lost work in reference to the person who has taken the work. Further, the picketing done by members of Local 3000 was clearly aimed at the employees of CCCI, the Marina Heeren, and the truck company.[7]

There is reasonable cause to believe that an object of the picketing was to force or require CCCI to assign the work in dispute to employees represented by Local 3000 rather than to its own employees represented by Local 270 and that the picketing was not solely for the purpose of informing the public that Mitch Ledet and Local 270 were doing stevedoring work. Also, on July 24, according to Ledet,[8] Cormier told Ledet that he would do whatever was necessary to get the work back from Teamsters Local 270.

There is also evidence that Harris, a retired Local 3000 member, tried to induce or encourage employees of CCCI to cease unloading the ship. Further, Sarentine, a current member, was identified as one of the individuals picketing the Marina Heeren. There is reasonable cause to find that Harris and Sarentine were acting on behalf of Local 3000. Their actions were in furtherance of Local 3000's objectives, and Local 3000 never repudiated their activities.

No evidence was produced at the hearing of an agreed-upon method for the voluntary adjustment of the instant dispute.

We find reasonable cause to believe that a violation of Section 8(b)(4)(D) has occurred and that there exists no agreed method for voluntary adjustment of the dispute within the meaning of Section 10(k) of the Act. Accordingly, we find that the dispute is properly before the Board for determination.

---

[6] CCCI's superintendent, Scott, overheard one of the pickets ask two of CCCI's employees not to unload the ship. The picket was later identified as Thomas Harris, a retired Local 3000 member.

Landry testified that he saw one picket "jumping up and down screaming, 'blood, blood, real blood's going to flow over this.'" The man was later identified as Paul Sarentine, a former business agent of Local 3000 and a current member.

[7] Chairman Stephens finds it unnecessary to infer a noninformational object from the use of the word "scab" in the picket signs carried by the ILA members. He agrees that it may commonly refer to a person who has taken work from a union member. However, according to one authority, "[t]he terms may be applied to an individual who will accept lower wages or poorer working conditions than those which the union has established or seeks." Roberts' Dictionary of Industrial Relations at 644 (3d ed. 1986 BNA). In the instant case, the ILA contends that the Teamsters were undermining local wage and benefit standards established by the Respondent and further that the purpose of the picketing was to publicize that fact to the public. Be that as it may, Chairman Stephens finds from the remaining evidence in the record that there was also an unlawful object of forcing the employer to assign the stevedoring work to the ILA.

[8] Although Cormier denied making the threat, a conflict in testimony does not prevent the Board from proceeding under Sec. 10(k). The Board is not charged with finding that a violation actually occurred but only with determining whether reasonable cause exists for finding a violation. Longshoremen ILA Local 1588 (Atlantic Cement), 273 NLRB 1723, 1725 (1985).

E. Merits of the Dispute

Section 10(k) requires the Board to make an affirmative award of disputed work after considering various factors. NLRB v. Electrical Workers IBEW Local 1212 (Columbia Broadcasting), 364 U.S. 573 (1961). The Board has held that its determination in a jurisdictional dispute is an act of judgment based on common sense and experience, reached by balancing the factors involved in a particular case. Machinists Lodge 1743 (J. A. Jones Construction), 135 NLRB 1402 (1962).

The following factors are relevant in making the determination of this dispute.

1. Certification and collective-bargaining agreement

CCCI has a collective-bargaining agreement with Local 270;[9] it has no collective-bargaining agreement with Local 3000. No Board certification has been issued regarding CCCI's employees engaged in stevedoring operations or regarding any other unit of employees.

This factor favors an award of the disputed work to employees represented by Local 270.

2. Company preference and past practices

CCCI prefers that the work in dispute be done by its employees who are represented by Local 270. CCCI's alter ego Coastal Cargo Company used employees represented by Local 270 to load and unload ships. This factor favors awarding the disputed work to employees represented by Local 270.

3. Area practice

The record shows that the loading and unloading of ships in the Port of New Orleans has in the past been done by employees represented by Local 3000. More recently employees represented by Local 270 have engaged in stevedoring work. Therefore, this factor does not favor awarding the disputed work to either group of employees.

4. Relative skills

Both employees represented by Local 270 and Local 3000 possess the skills needed to load and unload ships. Both groups of employees have experience in stevedoring work. Therefore, this factor does not favor awarding the disputed work to either group of employees.

5. Economy and efficiency

CCCI's president, Landry, testified that it is more economical and efficient for the Employer to use its own employees represented by Local 270. Landry testified that usually he would have to hire 18 longshoremen as opposed to 7 teamsters for each job. Landry also testified that he only hired as many teamsters as he needed and did not have to hire waterboys and timekeepers as required by the longshoremen. Therefore, this factor favors awarding the disputed work to employees represented by Local 270.

Conclusion

After considering all the relevant factors, we conclude that employees represented by Local 270 are entitled to perform the work in dispute. We reach this conclusion relying on the collective-bargaining agreement between CCCI and Local 270, employer preference and past practice, and economy and efficiency.

In making this determination, we are awarding the work to employees represented by Teamsters Local Union 270, affiliated with the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, AFL-CIO, not to that Union or its members.

Scope of the award

The Employer contends that the determination should encompass all stevedoring work within the geographical jurisdiction of Local 3000. Generally, for the Board to issue a broad, areawide award, there must be evidence that the disputed work has been a continuing source of controversy in the relevant geographic area and that similar disputes are likely to recur. There must also be evidence that demonstrates the charged party has a proclivity to engage in unlawful conduct to obtain work similar to the disputed work.

In this case, the notice of hearing limited the scope of the disputed work to the loading and unloading of the M/V Marina Heeren at the Galvez Street Wharf in the Port of New Orleans. However, in the companion case, Longshoremen ILA Local 3000 (Coastal Cargo Co.), supra, the notice of hearing defined the work in dispute as the loading and unloading of ships within the geographical jurisdiction of Local 3000. Further, in the companion case, the Board makes an award regarding the broad definition of the work in dispute. Thus, in this case we do not grant the Employer's request for a broad award. Although we here limit the scope of our award to the loading and unloading of the M/V Marina Heeren at the Galvez Street Wharf, our award in the companion case, in effect, gives the Employer the relief that it is requesting.

[9] The agreement covers the classifications of: checker, crane operator, lift driver, loader, flag man, loading crew, labor, and palletizer. The agreement does not describe the work these classifications perform.

Accordingly, our determination is limited to the controversy that gave rise to this proceeding.

DETERMINATION OF DISPUTE

The National Labor Relations Board makes the following Determination of Dispute.

1. Employees of Coastal Cargo Company, Inc., represented by Teamsters Local Union 270 affiliated with International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, AFL-CIO, are entitled to perform the loading and unloading of the M/V Marina Heeren at the Galvez Street Wharf in New Orleans, Louisiana.

2. General Longshore Workers Union No. 3000 of International Longshoremen's Association, AFL-CIO is not entitled by means proscribed by Section 8(b)(4)(D) of the Act to force Coastal Cargo Company, Inc. to assign the disputed work to employees represented by it.

3. Within 10 days from this date, General Longshore Workers Union No. 3000 of International Longshoremen's Association, AFL-CIO shall notify the Regional Director for Region 15 in writing whether it will refrain from forcing the Employer, by means proscribed by Section 8(b)(4)(D), to assign the disputed work in a manner inconsistent with this determination.

DECISION AND DETERMINATION OF DISPUTE

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

The charge in this Section 10(k) proceeding was filed on November 12, 1985, by the Employer, alleging that the Respondent, General Longshore Workers Local Union No. 3000 of International Longshoremen's Association, AFL-CIO, violated Section 8(b)(4)(D) of the National Labor Relations Act by engaging in proscribed activity with an object of forcing the Employer to assign certain work to employees it represents rather than to employees represented by Teamsters Local Union No. 270, a/w International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, AFL-CIO. The hearing was held on December 3 before Hearing Officer Lyn J. Beck.[2]

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board affirms the hearing officer's rulings, finding them free from prejudicial error. On the entire record, the Board makes the following findings.

I. JURISDICTION

The Employer, Coastal Cargo Company, Inc. (CCCI) a Louisiana corporation, operates a cargo company. Based on a projection of the Employer's New Orleans operations (since they commenced on July 16, 1985), the Employer will derive annual gross revenues in excess of $50,000 for services performed as a link in interstate commerce and will annually purchase and receive goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from points outside the State of Louisiana.

The parties stipulated to facts that satisfy the Board's jurisdictional requirements. We find that CCCI is engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

Mississippi River Grain Elevator, Inc. (MRGE) is a party to the dispute. MRGE is engaged in the storage, sale, and transfer of grain. The parties stipulated that MRGE in the preceding 12-month period in the course and conduct of its business operations within the State of Louisiana derived gross revenues in excess of $50,000 for the transportation and handling of commodities and cargo in interstate commerce pursuant to arrangements with and as agents for various common carriers. The parties further stipulated that during this 12-month period MRGE purchased and received at its Myrtle Grove, Louisiana facility goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from points outside the State of Louisiana.

We find that MRGE is engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

The parties stipulate, and we find, that Local 3000 and Local 270 are labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE DISPUTE

A. Background and Facts of Dispute

CCCI was incorporated on July 16, 1985. It is a cargo company, which loads and unloads ships docked at the Port of New Orleans. CCCI loads grain, breakbulk, and containerized cargo onto vessels and discharges cargo from vessels or barges onto the dock. In a related case, Coastal Cargo Co., 286 NLRB 200 (1987), the Board found that CCCI is the alter ego of a now-defunct company called Coastal Cargo Company, which operated from May 4 to October 1, 1984; this company had a collective-bargaining agreement with Local 270, which ran from May 1, 1984, to April 30, 1987. The Board determined that this was a valid agreement because CCCI was a continuation of Coastal Cargo Company and was subject to the latter's bargaining obligations.[3]

MRGE first subcontracted work to CCCI in September 1985. On September 5 MRGE contracted with CCCI for the unloading of the M/V Anastasia II. Over a 16-hour period, employees of CCCI represented by Local 270 loaded the ship

All parties present in the proceeding stipulated to include the record transcript from the companion case. The parties requested the Board to take official notice of the proceedings in that case and stipulated that the facts set out in that record would constitute the record here.

with approximately 4700 tons of grain. No members of Local 3000 picketed the ship. CCCI performed other loading services at MRGE in late October and early November with no pickets in attendance.

On November 7, CCCI was under contract with MRGE to load the M/V Massmiliano F. with grain. Employees of CCCI commenced loading operations on November 7 at 6 p.m. During the afternoon of November 8, Durel Landry, CCCI's president, received word that Local 3000 was going to put up a picket line at the MRGE facility where the Massmiliano F. was still being loaded.

Landry testified that at 5:45 a.m. on November 9 he observed three men with picket signs at the entrance to the main road leading to MRGE's facility.[4] Landry recognized one of the pickets as Paul Sarentine,[5] a current member and previous vice president and business agent of Local 3000. The pickets remained all day and left at 5:30 p.m. The grain loading continued through the night and finished at 9:30 a.m. on November 10.

B. Work in Dispute

The work in dispute[6] involves the loading and unloading of oceangoing vessels within the jurisdictional boundaries of General Longshore Workers Local Union No. 3000 of International Longshoremen's Association, AFL–CIO in the Port of New Orleans, New Orleans, Louisiana.

C. Contentions of the Parties

The Employer, CCCI, contends that reasonable cause exists to believe that Local 3000 violated Section 8(b)(4)(D) of the Act; and that the work in dispute should be awarded to CCCI's employees represented by Local 270 based on the factors of employer preference, past practice, the collective-bargaining agreement, skill, and economy and efficiency.

MRGE argues that the picketing is an extension of the picketing in the companion case. It maintains that the work in dispute should be awarded to employees represented by Local 270 on the basis of company preference and economy and efficiency of operations. MRGE also states that neither it nor CCCI are parties to any procedure for the joint resolution of jurisdictional disputes.

Local 3000 does not acknowledge the existence of a jurisdictional dispute. It disputes the applicability of the statute in this matter and denies that "reasonable cause" exists to believe that it violated Section 8(b)(4)(D) of the Act. It contends that the picketing was isolated. Local 3000 also contends that the ILA and the Teamsters have formed a joint board to resolve jurisdictional disputes.

D. Applicability of the Statute

Section 10(k) of the Act empowers the Board to determine a dispute out of which an 8(b)(4)(D) charge has arisen. However, before the Board proceeds with a determination of dispute, it must be satisfied that there is reasonable cause to believe that Section 8(b)(4)(D) has been violated, and that there is no agreed-upon method for voluntary settlement of the dispute.

At the beginning of the dispute, CCCI's employees represented by Local 270 had been assigned to perform the work in dispute. The longshoremen contended the work belonged to them. Members of Local 3000 picketed the MRGE facility at which the M/V Massmiliano F. was docked. The picket signs indicated that the Teamsters, Local 270 was "unfair" to Local 3000 members. There is reasonable cause to believe that an object of the picketing was to force or require CCCI to assign the work in dispute to employees represented by Local 3000 rather than to its own employees represented by Local 270.[7] Although MRGE did not control the work in dispute, Local 3000 accused it of being unfair to Local 3000.

There is no evidence that CCCI or MRGE are bound to any resolution reached by the joint board. Therefore there is no agreed-upon method for the voluntary adjustment of the instant dispute.

We find reasonable cause to believe that a violation of Section 8(b)(4)(D) has occurred and that there exists no agreed-upon method for voluntary adjustment of the dispute within the meaning of Section 10(k) of the Act. Accordingly, we find that the dispute is properly before the Board for determination.

E. Merits of the Dispute

Section 10(k) requires the Board to make an affirmative award of disputed work after considering various factors. NLRB v. Electrical Workers IBEW Local 1212 (Columbia Broadcasting), 364 U.S. 573 (1961). The Board has held that its determination in a jurisdictional dispute is an act of judgment based on common sense and experience, reached by balancing the factors involved in a particular case. Machinists Lodge 1743 (J. A. Jones Construction), 135 NLRB 1402 (1962).

---

[4] The picket signs read: "Teamsters Local 270 Unfair ILA Longshoremen"; "M.R.G.E. Unfair to ILA 3000"; and "Feruzzi Sillo Non Gusto a ILA-Operaio."

[5] Variously spelled Seruntine and Serantine in the record.

[6] The specific work involved in this case was the loading of grain aboard an oceangoing vessel at the Myrtle Grove, Louisiana facility of MRGE. The Regional Director's notice of hearing broadened the dispute to include any similar operation within the geographical jurisdiction of Longshoremen Local 3000. No party contested the scope of the dispute.

[7] We note, as set forth in the companion case, that, according to Local 270's president, Mitchell Ledet, Local 3000's president, Cliven Cormier, threatened to do whatever was necessary to get the stevedoring work back from Local 270.

The following factors are relevant in making the determination of this dispute.

1. Certification and collective-bargaining agreement(s)

CCCI has a collective-bargaining agreement with Local 270;[8] it has no collective-bargaining agreement with Local 3000. No Board certification has been issued regarding any CCCI employees engaged in stevedoring operations or regarding any other unit of employees. This factor favors an award of the disputed work to employees represented by Local 270.

2. Company preference and past practice

CCCI prefers that the work in dispute be done by its employees who are represented by Local 270. CCCI's alter ego Coastal Cargo Company used employees represented by Local 270 to load and unload ships. This factor favors awarding the disputed work to employees represented by Local 270.

3. Area practice

The record shows that the loading and unloading of ships in the Port of New Orleans has in the past been done by employees represented by Local 3000. On occasion MRGE has contracted stevedoring work to companies whose employees were represented by Local 3000. Employees represented by Local 270 have also engaged in stevedoring work in the Port of New Orleans. Therefore, this factor does not favor awarding the disputed work to either group of employees.

4. Relative skills

Both employees represented by Local 270 and Local 3000 possess the skills needed to load and unload ships. Both groups of employees have experience in stevedoring work. Therefore, this factor does not favor awarding the disputed work to either group of employees.

5. Economy and efficiency

CCCI's president, Landry, testified that it is more economical and efficient for the Employer to use its own employees represented by Local 270. Landry testified that usually he would have to hire 18 longshoremen as opposed to 7 teamsters for each job. Landry also testified that he only hired as many teamsters as he needed and did not have to hire waterboys and timekeepers as required by the longshoremen. Therefore, this factor favors awarding the disputed work to employees represented by Local 270.

Conclusion

After considering all the relevant factors, we conclude that employees represented by Local 270 are entitled to perform the work in dispute. We reach this conclusion relying on the collective-bargaining agreement between CCCI and Local 270, employer preference, past practice, and economy and efficiency.

DETERMINATION OF DISPUTE

The National Labor Relations Board makes the following Determination of Dispute.

1. Employees of Coastal Cargo Company, Inc., represented by Teamsters Local Union No. 270 a/w International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, AFL-CIO, are entitled to perform the loading and unloading of oceangoing vessels for Coastal Cargo Company, Inc., within the jurisdictional boundaries of General Longshore Workers Local Union No. 3000 of International Longshoremen's Association, AFL-CIO in the Port of New Orleans, New Orleans, Louisiana.

2. General Longshore Workers Union No. 3000 of International Longshoremen's Association, AFL-CIO is not entitled by means proscribed by Section 8(b)(4)(D) of the Act to force Coastal Cargo Company, Inc. to assign the disputed work to employees represented by it.

3. Within 10 days from this date, General Longshore Workers Union No. 3000 of International Longshoremen's Association, AFL-CIO shall notify the Regional Director for Region 15 in writing whether it will refrain from forcing the Employer, by means proscribed by Section 8(b)(4)(D), to assign the disputed work in a manner inconsistent with this determination.

[8] The agreement covers the classifications of: checker, crane operator, lift driver, loader, flag man, loading crew, labor, and palletizer. The agreement does not describe the work that these classifications perform.

DECISION AND ORDER

By Chairman Stephens and Members Johansen and Cracraft

On February 26, 1988, Administrative Law Judge Richard H. Beddow Jr. issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed a brief in support of the judge's decision.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, Leasco, Inc., Dubois, Pennsylvania, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

Charles H. Saul, Esq., for the General Counsel.
Edward R. Noonan, Esq., of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, for the Respondent.

[1] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

In his analysis, the judge erroneously attributed to Terminal Manager Ramey the statement made to a group of drivers that he would be glad to take his coat off and "go to the backroom" to finish a discussion with the drivers. The judge's findings of fact and the record indicate, however, that Company Official Gerry Meyers made this offer. In our view, it is of little import whether the offer was voiced by Ramey or by Meyers. Both are agents of the Respondent. The significance of the offer, especially when considered along with driver Bowman's oral acceptance of the challenge, is that it indicated that a certain degree of bravado was not unusual in this particular employment setting. Accordingly, although we do not condone the Charging Party Bender's use of profanity, we do agree with the judge that Bender's statement to official Bruce Anderson that "if you're taking my truck, I'm kicking your ass right now," constitutes a colloquialism that standing alone does not convey a threat of actual physical harm. Under all the factual circumstances here, we affirm the judge's conclusion that Bender's conduct was not so egregious as to render his concerted activity unprotected or to make him unfit for further employment. See Consumers Power Co., 282 NLRB 130 (1986).

289 NLRB No. 72

DECISION

Statement of the Case

Richard H. Beddow Jr., Administrative Law Judge. This matter was heard in Dubois, Pennsylvania, on 11 February 1987. Subsequent to an extension of filing dates, briefs were filed by all parties. The proceeding is based on a charge filed 26 September 1986[1] by James E. Bender, an individual. The Regional Director's complaint dated 10 November 1986, as amended,[2] alleges that Respondent Leasco, Inc., of Indianapolis, Indiana, violated Section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act by terminating Bender because of his protected concerted activities.

Subsequent to the close of the hearing, Respondent made a timely request to reopen the record and the General Counsel replied. By Order dated 4 March 1987 the motion was denied.

On a review of the entire record in this case and from my observation of the witnesses and their demeanor, I make the following

Findings of Fact

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent is a corporation that leases motor vehicles and the services of drivers to an affiliated company, a common carrier by motor vehicle certified to engage in interstate and foreign commerce. It has an office and place of business in Indianapolis, Indiana, and performs services in States other than Indiana, including Pennsylvania. During the 12-month period ending 31 August 1986, Respondent had gross revenues in excess of $50,000 for services performed directly at locations outside Pennsylvania and it admits that at all times material it has been an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

II. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICE

James E. Bender was one of over 150 drivers based at the motor carrier's Dubois, Pennsylvania terminal and had been employed by Respondent for over a year until he was terminated on 12 September for allegedly threatening a company official in a confrontation that occurred the previous evening.

Respondent's employees are not represented by a union. On 11 September the Dubois terminal was visited by company officials Gerry Meyers and Bruce Anderson to inform drivers that the motor carrier operations were going to be changed to a "slip seat" operation and that regular tractors would no longer be "assigned" to them. Later that day, after hearing indirectly about the change, several drivers, including Bender, who had not yet been formally notified of the conversion, met that evening after work at a local bar to discuss what was happening.

[1] All following dates will be in 1986 unless otherwise indicated.

[2] In accordance with provisions made at the hearing the General Counsel filed a second amended complaint that incorporates oral amendment made at the hearing. The Respondent also filed an amended answer and both documents (Bd. Exhs. 2(a) and (b)) are received into evidence.

Bender and other drivers were highly upset by the change because it meant that they would no longer drive the same vehicle each day but would change to different units and be faced with operating equipment of condition unknown and that had been used and slept in by other drivers. They also were upset because they no longer would be able to drive vehicles to their home as was their practice and because they had experienced serious, undesirable problems using the "slip seat" method when they worked for other companies. Near midnight the drivers learned that Anderson and Meyers had gone to a lounge at the Dubois Ramada Inn. Approximately seven drivers, including Bender and drivers John Slike, Ronald Dinklocher, John Davies, Danny Williams, Donald Manges, and Rummel went to the Ramada "to get some answers."

The drivers each had about five to six beers during the evening, which they said was not an abnormal amount, prior to arriving at the Ramada Inn between 12:30 and 1 a.m. they found Anderson in the company of trainer and dispatcher Douglas Mills and two girls, Stephanie Scott, an assistant dispatcher and Kim Jenny, a traffic clerk, all employed at the Dubois terminal. Bender who led the drivers into the lounge approached the group and asked, "Who's the bigwig from Indianapolis?" Bender and the drivers were then introduced to Anderson. Then Bender, joined by the other drivers, particularly John Slike, began to voice their concerns about the switch to a "slip seat" system and Respondent's taking away their assigned trucks. Anderson initially refused to discuss the matter, saying this was neither the time nor the place. The conversation became loud and profane (a band also was playing for part of this period), and Bender accused Anderson of "giving us a bunch of bullshit." Scott testified that she told the drivers "to shut the fuck up" because they were interrupting her "good time." Several drivers testified that Anderson would not discuss their complaints and appeared to have a "smirk" on his face. Kim Jenny also testified that Anderson's face had "like a smirk." Jenny also testified that she heard someone tell Anderson "I'm going to kick your ass, or something to that effect" and believes that it was Jack Slike or Danny Williams.

Slike testified that he, Bender, and Williams were talking more than the others, that Williams' behavior was the most "radical" (Williams had already told the other drivers he was leaving for another job the next day) but that he did not make the remark to Anderson. He recalled hearing Bender tell Anderson "he could be knocked off of the stool." Bender recalls that he was upset that Anderson would not even discuss the matter with them and further upset by Anderson's smugness, and told Anderson that "you shouldn't be like that to people when they are asking you a question because some day, somebody is eventually going to knock you off your barstool."

Anderson testified that he had dinner around 9 p.m. and then joined Mills at the bar around 10 p.m. and had two or three drinks prior to the arrival of the drivers. He did not know Bender at the time of the confrontation but recalls that Bender persisted in talking and said, "If you're taking my truck, I'm kicking your ass right now." Anderson said the comment was repeated at least once but was not accompanied by any raising of a fist or motion toward him; however, he said Bender pointed a finger at him, as if to emphasize his point. Anderson testified that Williams also said he would kick his "ass." Anderson admitted that he has commonly heard such vulgarities around truckdrivers; however, the comment was not previously directed at him as a manager. He testified that he was "concerned" about the confrontation with the group of emloyees but was not "upset" and made no effort to leave. After he did leave the bar area, he remained nearby and talked with some of the other drivers for about 10 minutes.

The next day between 8 or 8:30 a.m., Bender, Slike, and driver Donald Bowman went to Respondent's terminal and asked Manager Richard Ramey for a meeting with Meyers; however, Meyers was not yet present. Bowman repeated the request between 9:30 and 10 a.m., when approximately 20 to 30 drivers were in the drivers' lounge. About 5 minutes later, Bender was called into Ramey's office and was told by Ramey that he was fired for "harassing a company official." Bender denied harassing a company official and tried to explain to Ramey what had occurred. Ramey told Bender that he had 5 minutes to clear out his truck and get off Respondent's property.

Anderson, Meyers, and Ramey held a meeting with about 12 to 14 drivers, including Bowman and Slike about 11:30 a.m. Meyers told the employees that some "radicals" went to the Ramada Inn the previous evening and that the "culprit" had been taken care of—discharged.

Two witnesses testified that Meyers told the drivers that if any of them wished to continue their discussion, he would be glad to take his coat off and meet them in the backroom after the meeting. Bowman responded that he was there to find out about his job, but if Meyers wanted to, he would join Meyers in the backroom. No fight occurred and Bowman was not disciplined as a result of his challenge to Meyers.

Anderson testified that when he went to the terminal the following morning Mills identified Bender and Williams to him and Anderson told Meyers "what took place and how the threats were made to me (by both Bender and Williams), that I was going to get my ass kicked." Sometime prior to 10 a.m. Meyers called Indianapolis, spoke to some unidentified person at the company's office and informed Anderson that Bender would be fired. Mills testified that neither he nor Anderson recommended that anyone be fired and that he was just asked to identify the drivers for Anderson.

Terminal Manager Richard Ramey testified that about 10 days before the incident Williams had informed him that he would be quitting for another job. Ramey said he told Williams he was a good driver and that he was welcome back if things did not work out. On 12 September Williams went to the terminal to see if they wanted him to complete delivery of a load he had brought in the previous evening but was told a local driver would do it. He went to Ramey's office around 10 a.m., confirmed that it was his last day, waited a short while, and filled out and signed a resignation form supplied by Ramey. He was not asked about the previous evening and no mention of it was made. Williams recalls that Ramey shook his hand and again was told he was a good driver and to come back if he needed to. Ramey, however, indicated that this comment was made only at the earlier occasion.

Ramey also testified that he was told by Meyers to terminate Bender between 8:30 and 9:30 a.m. Meyers told him he had just talked to "corporate" to bring Bender in, terminate him, and give him 10 or 15 minutes to get off the property. No other names were mentioned. Ramey previously had overheard Anderson, Meyers, and Mills mention Williams when they were talking about the incident, and he told them that Williams had already given notice that he was quitting. He heard no statement that they were considering any discipline for Williams. Ramey said he called Bender to his office and told him that he screwed up last night, threatened a company official, and that he had been instructed by Meyers to terminate his employment. Bender argued that it did not happen on company property and asked what was going to happen to the other drivers. Ramey replied he did not know, it was not his decision. On cross-examination Ramey was asked why he did not fire Williams and he said that it was because he had already quit. He did not indicate whether anyone had suggested or inquired about also terminating Williams.

Ramey also stated that he overheard Anderson's initial conversation with Meyers that morning, which occurred in an open area outside his office, and recalls that Anderson's first words were "you should have been with me last night, I almost got my ass kicked."

III. ADMISSIONS AND STIPULATIONS

In its answer to the second amended complaint, Respondent admits that, on the evening of 11 September 1986, Bender concertedly complained regarding wages, hours, and working conditions. Respondent further stipulates that, by the same conduct, Bender was engaged in concerted activity for mutual aid or protection.

IV. DISCUSSION

The sole issue in this proceeding is whether Bender engaged in misconduct sufficient to deny him the protection his concerted protest would have otherwise enjoyed under Section 7 of the Act.

Bender was terminated the morning after he and others had engaged in a "loud and profane" conversation regarding working conditions with a company official in a public lounge. The alleged justification for Respondent's action is that Bender threatened a company supervisor. Respondent's disciplinary action was decided on or endorsed by an unidentified company official in Indianapolis based on a phone conversation (with a possible reply) with another company supervisor, Meyers, who had heard about the incident minutes before. Meyers was at the Dubois terminal to inform drivers about the Company's immediate changeover to a new type of operation, a change opposed by the drivers engaged in the conversational confrontation. Within 1-1/2 hours of first learning of the incident, Meyers directed Terminal Manager Ramey to terminate Bender. He made no attempt to interview Bender, the other terminal employees who were present, or any of the other drivers, and he made no other investigation of Bender's alleged conduct.

Anderson and Mills, the two company officials who witnessed the incident, made no recommendation for disciplinary action and the Respondent presented no evidence of any company policy regarding disciplinary actions. Here, I find that the decision to terminate was based solely on Bender's alleged statement to Anderson: "if you take my truck, I'll kick your ass," which was construed to be a threat to a company supervisor. Bender denies making that specific comment; however, he admits using a somewhat similar phrase, absent any profanity. I do not credit Bender's description of his comment to Anderson, and I find that the corroborating and credible testimony of several witness to the incident clearly support Anderson's version of the words used.

Anderson's testimony makes it clear that he considered Bender (who clearly was the most articulate driver) to be the principal spokesman for the group of drivers that attempted to speak with him. His impression was relayed to Meyers, who made a decision to pursue disciplinary action. Anderson also identified Williams as one who was present and who made a similar "I'll kick your ass" remark as well as other vulgarities. As noted above, no attempt was made to discipline Williams. He was not given any admonition for his role in the confrontation, and he was allowed to complete a previously announced plan to resign, although Respondent had the opportunity to terminate him before he did so, or to otherwise place some disciplinary-type admonition in his personal file.

Although the conversation between Anderson and the drivers was loud and profane, it was not accompanied by any physical gestures such as the clenching or shaking of a fist, no invitation to "step outside," and no actual or potential physical contact. Anderson testified that he was "concerned" but was not "upset" and he remained around to talk for 10 or more minutes after Bender had assumed a peacemaker role and escorted the more verbally abusive Williams from the area. Slike offered an apology to Anderson at this time and Anderson otherwise remained seated in an open public lounge in the presence of two young women from the office. Anderson, who is 5 feet 11 inches tall and weighs 245 pounds (compared with Bender at 6 feet 1 inch tall and 215 pounds), is a former truckdriver and was described as appearing calm and unfrightened. Mills, who had heard Bender's remark to Anderson, subsequently had a conversation with Bender and said he did not feel he was in any danger from Bender.

As stated by the Board in Consumers Power Co., 282 NLRB 130, 132 (1986):

> The Board has long held, however, that there are certain parameters within which employees may act when engaged in concerted activities. The protections Section 7 affords would be meaningless were we not to take into account the realities of industrial life and the fact that disputes over wages, hours, and working conditions are among the disputes > most likely to engender ill feelings and strong responses. Thus, when an employee is discharged for conduct that is part of the res gestae of protected concerted activities, the relevant question is whether the conduct is so egregious as to take it outside the protection of the Act, or of such a character as to render the employee unfit for further service.

Here, Anderson and Mills, the two supervisors actually present during the confrontation, did not take the matter so seriously that they recommended disciplinary action. Supervisor Meyers, however, initiated a phone call to other managerial personnel at company headquarters and then he instructed Terminal Manager Ramey to fire Bender. Meyers did so without benefit of any meaningful investigation and within only a few minutes of first learning of the incident. Respondent also failed to consider the use of the same language by Williams sufficiently egregious as to warrant even an admonition for his personal file and it also failed to react to Manager Ramey's offer to fight and driver Bowman's acceptance of that offer as egregious conduct that would warrant some disciplinary action against them, thereby indicating that Respondent has substantial discretion in choosing how it would respond to Bender's conduct.

Under these circumstances, I conclude that Respondent's decision to discharge Bender was arbitrary, discriminatory, and capricious, and I infer that it would not have occurred were it not for Bender's protected concerted protests about conditions of employment. Respondent seized on an incident in which an employee used a profane colloquialism and construed his statement as threatening, insubordinate conduct in order to get rid of an apparent leader of the drivers who had raised questions about its planned changes in working conditions. Respondent imposed the most severe penalty possible, discharge, rather than some lesser degree of discipline that would have permitted Bender to remain as an employee still in a position to speak out under the protection of the Act.

I find that the words used by Bender were not accompanied by any other threats, actions, or circumstances that were understood by Anderson to be a threat of an actual physical confrontation. I find further that the phrase "I'll kick your ass" (and variations thereof) is a profane colloquialism used commonly to verbalize the speaker's desire to prevail over another person or group. Its apparent usage in this respect has been accepted by prominent sports and political figures and, standing alone in its ordinary usage, it does not convey a threat of actual physical harm.

Accordingly, I find that the record fails to show that Bender's conduct was so egregious as to lose the protection of the Act or of such a character as to render him unfit for further service. I conclude that the counsel for the General Counsel has met his overall burden of proof and has persuasively shown that Respondent's discharge of Bender violates Section 8(a)(1) of the Act as alleged.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. By discharging James E. Bender on 12 September 1986, Respondent engaged in an unfair labor practice in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in an unfair labor practice, it is recommended that the Respondent be ordered to cease and desist therefrom and to take the affirmative action described below, which is designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

With respect to the necessary affirmative action, it is recommended that Respondent be ordered to reinstate James E. Bender to his former job or, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to his seniority or other rights and privileges previously enjoyed, and make him whole for any loss of earnings he may have suffered because of the discrimination practiced against him by payment to him of a sum of money equal to that which he normally would have earned from the date of the discrimination to the date of reinstatement, in accordance with the method set forth in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), with interest as computed in New Horizons for the Retarded, 283 NLRB 1173 (1987),[3] and that Respondent remove from its files any reference to the discharge and notify him in writing that this has been done and that evidence of this unlawful discipline will not be used as a basis for future personnel action against him.

Otherwise, it is not considered to be necessary that a broad order be issued.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[4]

ORDER

The Respondent, Leasco, Inc., Dubois, Pennsylvania, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Discharging any employee for activity protected by Section 7 of the Act.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Offer James E. Bender immediate and full reinstatement and make him whole for the losses he incurred as a result of the discrimination against him in the manner specified in the remedy section of this decision.

(b) Remove from its files any reference to the discharge, of James E. Bender on 12 September 1986, and notify him in writing that this has been done and that evidence of this unlawful discharge will not be used as a basis for future personnel actions against him.

[3] Under New Horizons for the Retarded, interest is computed at the "short-term Federal rate for the underpayment of taxes as set out in the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621. Interest accrued before 1 January 1987 (the effective date of the amendment) shall be computed as in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

[4] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

(c) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(d) Post at its Dubois, Pennsylvania facility, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[5] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 6, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately on receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(e) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND CRACRAFT

On February 4, 1988, Administrative Law Judge Arline Pacht issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a brief in support, and the General Counsel filed an answering brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, Nu Dawn Homes, Inc., Federal Way, Washington, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

---

[1] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

In affirming the judge's finding that the Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(1) of the Act by discharging employees Martin and Greenland because they insisted on being paid overtime in accordance with the wage and hour laws of the State of Washington, we find it unnecessary to rely on the small-plant doctrine in determining whether the Respondent was aware of the concerted nature of their activity. There is ample evidence, as found by the judge, that the Respondent knew that the two were acting not only for themselves but also on behalf of their coworkers.

Further, we correct the judge's analysis insofar as she states that under Wright Line, 251 NLRB 1083 (1980), enfd. 662 F.2d 899 (1st Cir. 1981), the General Counsel bears the initial burden of proving that the employees were engaged in protected concerted activity which was a "dominant" factor prompting the employer's action. The General Counsel bears the initial burden of proving that the protected concerted activity was a motivating factor in the employer's action.

Linda Scheldrup, Esq., for the General Counsel.

Chris McCleod, Esq. (Harpold, Fornabai & Fiori), of Auburn, Washington, for the Respondent.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

ARLINE PACHT, Administrative Law Judge. On charges filed by Susan K. Martin (Martin) and Modesta L. Greenland (Greenland) on April 10 and 30, 1987, respectively.[1] A consolidated complaint issued on May 29 alleging that Respondent Nu Dawn Homes, Inc. violated Section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act), by terminating Martin and Greenland and thereafter refusing to reinstate them because they concertedly asserted their right to be paid for overtime work. The Respondent filed a timely answer on June 4, as amended on June 8 and October 9.

The case came to trial before me in Seattle, Washington, on October 14 and 15, at which time the parties had full opportunity to examine and cross-examine witnesses, to introduce documentary evidence, and to present oral argument. After considering the witnesses' demeanor, the parties' posttrial briefs, and the General Counsel's reply brief,[2] and on the entire record, pursuant to Section 10(c) of the Act, I make the following

I. THE RESPONDENT'S BUSINESS

Respondent, a Washington corporation with an office and place of business in Federal Way, Washington, is engaged in constructing residential homes. During the past 12 months, a representative period, in the course and conduct of its business, Respondent had gross sales of goods and services valued in excess of $500,000. Further, during the 12 months prior to the issuance of the complaint, Respondent purchased and caused to be transferred and delivered to its facilities within the State of Washington, goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from sources outside of the State or from suppliers within the State, that in turn obtained such goods and materials directly from sources outside of the State. Accordingly, the complaint alleges, Respondent admits, and I find that Nu Dawn Homes is and has been at all times material herein an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Dramatis Personnae

Respondent, a small, closely held corporation, is one of five allied enterprises wholly owned by John C. Tynes and Floyd Hoffman, his brother-in-law, who serve as president and vice president, respectively, of the companies. At the time of the operative events described below, Della Pulley, Respondent's vice president for management and finance, was responsible for bookkeeping and office personnel management for all the sister companies. Three administrative assistants, Susan Martin, Modesta Greenland, and Kathleen Zulaski—plus a receptionist, Shirley Ebeling, worked under her supervision. Don Winslow, vice president for acquisitions and marketing, his assistant, Donna Heider, and Respondent's architect, Fred Wopfer, all worked in the same somewhat cramped office space.

[1] Unless otherwise specified all events took place in 1987.

[2] Because Respondent's counsel inadvertently filed his brief late, after having received opposing counsel's brief, the General Counsel was authorized to submit a reply.

289 NLRB No. 73

Greenland began working for the Respondent as a receptionist-secretary on February 26, 1986, at a starting monthly salary of $800. By end, she was earning $1000 per month. In addition, Company President Tynes awarded her a $100 bonus in November. A month later, he congratulated her on receiving high grades in two computer program courses she had just completed at Respondent's expense.

Respondent's managers evidently were pleased with Greenland's work and spoke highly of her industry at a corporate meeting in December 1986. Don Winslow related that at this meeting Tynes praised her as "the hardest working person in the Company . . . ." Tynes, Pulley, and Hoffman then agreed that Greenland should be promoted to a position as Pulley's assistant, effective in January 1987.

Greenland continued as receptionist/secretary while gradually assuming some of her new duties until her replacement, Shirley Ebeling, was hired in mid-January. Greenland then became responsible for Ebeling's training.

Martin, who had worked with Pulley at another company in 1976, was recruited by her and began working for Respondent in April 1986, performing a variety of bookkeeping tasks. In addition to a 1-year college accounting course, Martin had more than 20 years' experience working for various companies using secretarial, bookkeeping, and computer skills. Consequently, at her initial interview, Pulley advised her that she might be overqualified for the position with Respondent. At that same time, Pulley also mentioned that because another employee, Linda Vixie, had complained to her about Respondent's overtime policy, she wished to make it clear that any overtime work would be compensated with time off but not with extra pay. Martin's starting salary was $1200 per month. By December 1986, she was earning $1600 with pay periods falling on the 5th and 20th of each month. She also received several bonuses, most recently in November 1986. During the last week of January, she received flowers with an appreciative note from Pulley who thanked her for proposing a new accounting procedure that, as Pulley put it, "will make us efficient, accurate, and help us to get out of here at 5."[3]

In August 1986, after Linda Vixie gave notice of her intent to resign, Respondent hired Kathleen Zulaski. Witnesses for the General Counsel and the Respondent offered widely divergent views of the quality of Zulaski's performance during the first 6 months of her employment. According to Vixie, who trained her initially, and to Martin, who took over when Vixie left, Zulaski worked slowly and frequently needed considerable assistance particularly when transferring data from invoices to the computer. Others, including Tynes, complained about Zulaski's inept handling of telephone inquiries.

Tynes and Pulley acknowledged at the hearing that Zulaski was far less experienced than Martin. However, they both maintained that because her formal training in accounting was superior to that of Martin's or Greenland's, she had the potential to out-perform the other women. However, Pulley and Tynes erred as to the extent of Zulaski's formal training when they testified that she held two accounting degrees. In fact, she received one accounting certificate from a business school after taking two accounting courses, each lasting approximately 3 months. She received a second certificate from the same school after completing an additional course in management. She also had a one-year college course in computer science. Prior to her employment with Respondent she had held two temporary jobs whose duration was no more than a week or two. By Zulaski's own account, she was a novice in the business world and had much to learn. She candidly acknowledged turning frequently to Martin for advice and to making mistakes entering data into the computer. She revealed that she was reprimanded in January 1987 for not processing utility bills to Pulley's satisfaction and that she had made a few errors in writing checks. At the time of trial, her work was still under review by Pulley.

B. The Employees Challenge Respondent's Overtime Policy

Greenland and Martin recalled discussing Respondent's overtime policy with Vixie in July 1986. When Vixie tendered her resignation that same month, she told Pulley that she thought Respondent's failure to pay overtime was unlawful and bad for employee morale. Pulley responded that the Respondent would not alter its policy and would continue granting compensatory time off rather than paying for extra hours worked.

While working late one evening in December 1986, and after having accumulated a considerable amount of uncompensated overtime hours, Martin remarked to Pulley that she had heard it was illegal for employees not to be paid for overtime. Pulley reminded Martin that she accepted the job with knowledge of Respondent's overtime policy and that if she was dissatisfied she could find another position.

Beginning in January 1987, Martin and Greenland became increasingly assertive in questioning Respondent's overtime practices. As noted previously, Greenland became Pulley's assistant in January. However, Greenland apparently misunderstood the terms of her promotion, believing that she would receive a $500 raise as soon as she assumed her new post. When she failed to receive the anticipated raise or payment for a modest amount of overtime worked in 1986 on each of two pay periods in January and again on the first pay period in February, she questioned Pulley about the delays on several occasions.

When Greenland first raised the matter, Pulley advised her that the raise would commence at the end of January. It was not until February 5 that Greenland received a check for $600 reflecting a pay raise of $100 per pay period. However, this amount was less of a raise than she believed she had been promised. Therefore, she again pursued the matter with Pulley, questioning both the wages she thought were due as well as payment for overtime. Realizing that there had been a misunderstanding, Pulley prepared a memo on February 7 that explained that Greenland had embarked on a 6-month training program as her assistant at a salary of $1200 a month ranging upward to $1500 depending upon the responsibilities that she might assume. The memo further noted that Greenland would receive a $100 check making her pay raise retroactive to January 1 and also cover the "extra-time" that she previously had worked, an apparent reference to the overtime. Greenland signed this memo on February 9 and received the $100 retroactive paycheck on February 11.

[3] In its brief, Respondent contends that Martin could not recall the details of her proposal. The record proves otherwise for she clearly explained that she suggested transferring data to the computer from the accounts payable records rather than from the more cumbersome check ledger.

Greenland shared her concerns about her pay raise and the overtime situation with Martin since, as she explained, she anticipated having to work more overtime as Pulley's assistant. When she mentioned a newsletter published by the State Department of Industries and Labor, which contained an article concerning overtime pay, the women agreed that Greenland would call the agency to make further inquiry. She did so about February 11 and then reported to Martin that State law required that an employer pay time and a half for each hour of overtime worked unless the employee was granted time off within the time period in which the overtime was worked. The next day Martin called the agency herself to confirm Greenland's understanding.

After both women had ascertained the applicable law on overtime compensation, they talked with other office employees about their right to overtime pay. Receptionist Ebeling recalled that Martin asked her to keep any incoming calls from the Department of Labor and Industries confidential. Ebeling also confirmed that Greenland had spoken to her about overtime. However, out of fear and a desire to avoid office politics, Ebeling indicated that she did not wish to get involved. Martin also spoke to Zulaski about the overtime matter and found that she, too, exhibited some apprehension and said she would prefer to take compensatory time off. In addition, Martin and Greenland spoke to Wepfer, Winslow, and Heider about the overtime matter.

On the evening of February 12, Martin and Greenland conferred by telephone about how best to present their findings about overtime pay to Pulley. Martin testified that on the following day she told Pulley in private that she wanted to be paid for her overtime at time and a half, and advised Pulley that she had an obligation to inform the employees of their legal rights under state law. According to Martin, Pulley grew very angry and said she would respond to Martin's request after checking with Respondent's attorney. Martin testified that the following week Pulley informed her that Respondent's counsel had said it was the Company's choice either to pay for overtime or grant time off. She agreed to pay Martin for her overtime but at a straight time rate and asked her to sign a statement agreeing that it was a one-time only payment. Martin refused to sign such a statement and bluntly told Pulley that her information about the Company's legal obligation was incorrect. Pulley ended that conversation by saying that she would consult Tynes as to the next step.

Thereafter, on February 23, Pulley received a letter from Respondent's attorney confirming what Martin and Greenland already had learned; that is, that an employer was obliged to provide compensatory time within the same pay period or else pay time and a half for each hour of overtime worked. Greenland happened to see the attorney's letter since at the time she was supervising Ebeling in distributing the mail. On the day after this letter arrived, Ebeling told Greenland that Pulley had been upset on receiving the mail. That same day Pulley instructed Greenland that she was no longer to review incoming mail.

About the same date, Pulley informed Martin that she would receive a check for her overtime at time and a half. According to Martin, Pulley added that she did not understand why Martin was being so disloyal; that she was "stabbing me [Pulley] in the back." Soon thereafter, Martin was correctly paid for her overtime work.

Without specifically denying the remarks Martin attributed to her, Pulley offered a much different account of their exchange about overtime pay. She related that in early February Martin requested time off for 50 hours of accumulated overtime work. Fearing that extended absence would create a paperwork backlog, Pulley maintained that on her own initiative she sought Vice President Hoffman's approval to pay Martin for her overtime. Pulley admitted, however, that she did advise Martin that the payment would be a one-time practice, that Martin insisted it was the employee's option to take leave or seek wages for the overtime, and suggested that she advise the other office employees as to state overtime requirements.

I find Martin's detailed version of these matters more reliable than Pulley's vague recollection. Pulley, for example, thought that counsel's letter arrived early in February until she was shown the February 23 date stamped on the document. In contrast, Martin recalled facts by tying them to particular events, some of which (such as their phone call) were corroborated by Greenland. Moreover, regardless of who initiated the conversation with regard to overtime pay, Pulley did verify some of the salient details of Martin's account, including the fact that it was Martin who insisted that employees had a right to seek wages for overtime and that other employees should be notified of their rights.

Pulley testified at the trial that she was not at all disturbed about this overtime controversy; rather, she was relieved to have the matter resolved. Time may have mellowed her recollection of this event, however, for Winslow recalled that her reaction to the overtime pay problem was an angry one. Thus, he testified that Pulley told him that she was very upset and frustrated at the situation that Martin and Greenland had created. Further, Hoffman asked Winslow in an agitated manner if he had heard about the overtime problem with "Della's girls" and asserted that if they were his workers he would "kick their butts out in the street."[4]

[4] I credit Winslow's account for I found him to be a calm, thoughtful witness who candidly acknowledged having harbored and overcome bitter feelings when he was terminated. Moreover, Hoffman, who shared an office with Pulley, was not called as a witness and, thus, did not contradict the statement Winslow attributed to him.

C. Respondent's Financial Difficulties

For the past several years, since at least 1986, Respondent and its affiliated companies had been operating in the red, a situation that did not improve during the first quarter of 1987. Thus, a profit-and-loss statement covering the Nu Dawn enterprises' fiscal year ending March 31, 1987, showed an overall deficit of $171,000. The single greatest cause of this loss, approximately $67,000, was due to Nu Dawn Realty's failure to sell as many homes as had been projected, thereby creating what Respondent claimed was a serious cash flow problem.

At a management meeting in early January, Tynes, Hoffman, and Pulley agreed to search for ways to reduce overhead expenses. About February 18, Hoffman held a general meeting with employees, including office and field personnel, at which time he focused on the Company's financial plight.[5] It is undisputed that at this mid-February meeting, Hoffman stated that he wanted to dispel rumors that employees might lose their jobs and assured them that salaries would be reduced before any discharges took place. In keeping with this approach, he announced that he would move into the field as chief job superintendent while current job superintendents would shift into construction work.[6]

Notwithstanding Hoffman's assurances to the contrary, Pulley testified that after the January management meeting, she decided to reduce the number of officeworkers. Consequently, she stated that throughout January and February, she evaluated the performances of her subordinates. By early March, she had selected Greenland and Martin for dismissal, allegedly because they were less competent than Zulaski and Ebeling.

In comparing Martin and Zulaski, Pulley testified that Zulaski's formal accounting education equipped her to be a more desirable employee in the long run. Further, Pulley maintained that Martin made several errors that revealed her shortcomings as a bookkeeper. First, she pointed out that during her absence in October 1986 Martin was put in charge of the office and during this time twice issued a check for $13,000 to the same supplier. Fortunately, the second check was returned uncashed. Martin also erred in failing to add a tax onto a contractor's bill and reversed the debit and credit columns on one occasion. Pulley acknowledged that Martin responded favorably when these errors were brought to her atention and no further oversight of her work was required. Pulley also stated that she was dissatisfied with Martin's training of Zulaski who performed more effectively under her own supervision. Contrary to Pulley's recollection, Zulaski herself indicated that she was not supervised by Pulley until after Martin had been dismissed.

Pulley also stated that Greenland was less capable than Zulaski. Pulley was particularly distressed at what she claimed was Greenland's lack of responsibility in failing to make a deposit one Friday afternoon, which would have transferred $60,000 from one of Respondent's accounts to another. This sum was to serve as earnest money to cover a particular sales transaction. Pulley explained that Respondent was spared embarrassment only because the customer failed to verify whether the earnest money had been deposited over the weekend. Greenland did not deny failing to make the deposit, but explained that the bank refused to handle such a large transaction at its outdoor window. Not understanding what the problem was, Greenland retained the check over the weekend. Pulley maintained that she did not offer to return Greenland to her former position as a receptionist since Greenland had been adamant about receiving a higher salary. Further, Pulley indicated that Greenland was diverted by marital problems, and therefore was less efficient than the new receptionist, Ebeling.

Finding that the Company's economic health posture was continuing to decline, Pulley decided in early March that she would have to terminate Greenland and Martin. Accordingly, she obtained Tynes' approval for her decision and at the end of the day on March 13 advised each of the women separately that they were terminated, effective immediately, for lack of funds. However, Pulley quickly perceived that she had to fill the gap left by Martin's and Greenland's departure. Accordingly, in early April she advertised for a new bookkeeper and on April 6 Janet Munger began working for the Respondent at a monthly salary of $1500. On March 23, Winslow was dismissed and within several months Nu Dawn Realty, the business for which he had primary responsibility, was phased completely out of existence.[7] As a further economy, Tynes reduced his own salary from $6000 to $2000 a month, but not until August. At some undetermined time in 1987, he took a second mortgage on his home, using the $100,000 proceeds for operating expenses.

Discussion and concluding findings

The General Counsel contends that Greenland and Martin were terminated because they protested the Respondent's failure to pay for overtime work as required by state law. Respondent asserts, however, that they were discharged solely as a way to offset the Company's serious business losses. Because the Charging Parties' discharges arguably involved both permissible and impermissible causes, assessing the true reason for the Respondent's actions requires analysis under the standards set forth in Wright Line, 251 NLRB 1083 (1980), enfd. 662 F.2d 899 (1st Cir. 1981), cert. denied 455 U.S. 989 (1982); approved in NLRB v. Transportation Management

[5] Respondent asserted in its brief that this meeting with employees took place in early January, mistakenly relying on Pulley's testimony.In fact, the record shows that Pulley alluded to a January corporate meeting that was attended solely by Hoffman, Tynes, and herself. Moreover, one of Respondent's own witnesses, Architect Fred Wepfer, generally corroborated Greenland's and Martin's recollection as to the date when he testified that the staff meeting at which Hoffman pledged that no one would be let go occurred just a few weeks before the women were discharged.

[6] Respondent stated in its brief that one field superintendent was dismissed as part of a financial reorganization. Although the record is not altogether clear in this regard, I infer from Tynes' testimony that a field superintendent was not dismissed but was transferred to a lesser paying job framing houses. See Tr. 9.

[7] Winslow had been in charge of marketing new homes, acquiring new properties, and supervising the sales staff.

Corp., 462 U.S. 393 (1983). Under Wright Line, the General Counsel bears the initial burden of proving that the employees were engaged in protected concerted activity that was a dominant factor prompting the employer's disciplinary action. If the General Counsel succeeds in establishing a prima facie case, the burden shifts to the Respondent to prove affirmatively that its adverse actions would have been the same even in the absence of the employees' protected conduct.

On applying these standards, I am convinced that the General Counsel has met its burden. The protected nature of Greenland's and Martin's efforts to reform Respondent's overtime policies requires no discussion, for the Board long has held that such conduct comes within the guarantees of Section 7. See, e.g., Joseph De Rario, DMD, P.A., 283 NLRB 592 (1987).

The record also contains proof that their actions were concerted, as the Board has construed that word of art. In Meyers Industries, 281 NLRB 882, 884 (1986), the Board reaffirmed the definition of concerted activities adopted in the first Meyers case[8] ruling that "to find an employee's activity to be 'concerted,' we shall require that it be engaged in with or on the authority of other employees, and not solely by and on behalf of the employee himself." Here, uncontroverted evidence establishes that Martin and Greenland shared their concerns about the Respondent's overtime practices with one another as well as bringing it to management's attention on more than one occasion. They also advised their coworkers about the requirements of state law and encouraged them to seek just compensation for any overtime that might be worked. When Martin met with Pulley and challenged Respondent's failure to compensate the employees at time and a half, she did so with at least Greenland's express consent. Moreover, when Martin urged Pulley to advise others in the office about state requirements governing overtime pay and when Greenland urged a fellow worker to keep careful records so that she too might receive proper compensation for overtime, they clearly were engaged in activities that went beyond their own self-interest.

Further, Respondent cannot seriously claim that it was unaware of Martin's and Greenland's interest in obtaining overtime pay for themselves and others in the office. Pulley admitted as much when she testified that Martin urged her to advise the other employees of state law, and learned that Martin had already spoken to Zulaski about the matter. Pulley's sudden withdrawal of Greenland's duty to review the distribution of mail the day after receiving counsel's letter regarding overtime pay can be explained in only one way, she knew that Greenland was allied with Martin in demanding that Respondent comply with state overtime requirements. Pulley maintained at trial that she was relieved to have the overtime issue resolved, but her latter-day recollection of such feelings cannot be reconciled with the evidence of her expressions of frustration to Winslow about Greenland's and Martin's activities. In addition, Hoffman's remarks to Winslow regarding the effrontery of "Della's girls" challenging Respondent's overtime policy revea Respondent's knowledge of and hostility toward th women's concerted activity. Considering that Hoffma shared office space with Pulley, with whom he conferre about overtime payment for Martin, and considering als that he was vice president of the firm and Tynes' broth er-in-law, his undisputed comments to Winslow are par ticularly probative on the question of knowledge an animus.

Although abundant evidence establishes that Respond ent was well aware of the Charging Parties' concerte efforts, knowledge also may be inferred by application o the Board's "small plant" doctrine. See, e.g., Wiese Plo Welding Co., 123 NLRB 616 (1959). Here, within th confines of Respondent's crowded quarters, enough dis cussion of the overtime issue took place so that even new disinterested employee like Ebeling had hear "something going on about overtime." If Ebeling, wh wished to abstain from politics, knew of the overtim controversy, then certainly, Pulley, an alert and defen sive manager, most certainly knew of it.

Pulley's and Hoffman's angry reaction to Greenland' and Martin's insistence on a revised overtime polic leads to suspicion that the discharges were prompted i large part by unlawful reasons. These suspicions are int virtual certitude when the events leading to the dismis sals are juxtaposed and examined in context. In bare out line, the salient events are as follows: (1) In January an in the first week of February, Greenland complained tha she had not obtained her proper wage increase, (2) an had not received her overtime pay. The following wee Martin challenged Pulley about Respondent's overtim pay policy and insisted on compliance with state regula tions. On February 18 or thereabouts, Hoffman promise that wages would be trimmed before jobs were cut. O February 23, Pulley received a letter from counsel indicating that Martin had been right on the overtime issu and she had been wrong. Realizing that Greenland ha seen the letter, Pulley reacted swiftly, excluding he access to such information by relieving her of the dut to review the mail distribution. On March 13, Pulle fired Greenland and Martin and on April 6 hired a new bookkeeper. The Board often has drawn an inference o unlawful motivation when a close connection in tim exists between employees' protected concerted activit and an employer's adverse response. See, e.g., Aluminum Technical Extrusions, 274 NLRB 1414, 1418 (1985); Limpert Bros., 276 NLRB 364, 374 (1985). Such an inferenc is warranted here.

Respondent argues that because Martin had questione its overtime policy in 1986 without being disciplined, i follows that her discharge in 1987 was unrelated to he protected activity. The record shows, however, tha Greenland and Martin became aware of Respondent' failure to comply with state overtime regulations in February and thereafter insisted that Respondent comply with those requirements. Thus, it was not until mid-February that the conflict about overtime came to a head. Respondent's acknowledgment that it had erred in refusing to properly compensate for overtime preceded the discharges by only several weeks. The close nexus between these critical events undermines Respondent's argument that it had long tolerated employee criticism of its overtime policy.

[8] 268 NLRB 493 (1984), revd. and remanded Prill v. NLRB, 755 F.2d 941 (D.C. Cir. 1985).

The abruptness of the discharges, announced in the middle of a pay period and without prior notice to two long-term employees who previously were considered valuable contributors to the Company, lends support to the conclusion that Greenland and Martin were fired because of their stand on the overtime issue.

In defense, Respondent contends that its financial predicament compelled it to trim its office personnel and that Martin and Greenland were selected for discharge only because they were the most expendable members of its clerical staff. It is true that the Nu Dawn sister companies were losing money, but business necessity is not invariably a complete defense; it certainly may not be used to conceal employment decisions that are unlawfully motivated. Here, the Respondent's contradictory and illogical actions persuade that the selection of Greenland and Martin for discharge was not driven by its economic problems.

Respondent admittedly had suffered business reverses continually since 1986. However, no climactic economic event occurred in 1987 that might explain why in early March of that year Pulley decided she could wait no longer to decimate her staff by 50 percent, thereby eliminating in one swoop, her two most experienced office employees. Certainly, Respondent's economic situation was not serious enough to compel Tynes to reduce his own salary by 70 percent until some 5 months after the terminations occurred. The abrupt discharges seem particularly inexplicable when only a few weeks earlier Hoffman had pledged that wages would be reduced before jobs were eliminated. Indeed, Hoffman adhered to that pledge by stepping down to the position of field superintendent and transferring job supervisors to construction work rather than discharging them. Yet, contrary to Hoffman's assurances, neither Greenland nor Martin was offered the opportunity to remain at a reduced salary. By deviating from its own proclaimed policy in firing the women, Respondent provides telling evidence that cost savings were not at the root of these actions. Respondent's subsequent dismissal of Winslow does not defeat this conclusion for his departure was simply one step in the complete abolition of an entire Nu Dawn operation.

Pulley's alleged reasons for retaining Zulaski and Ebeling in preference to Martin and Greenland seem based on factors freshly marshalled at the time of trial rather than at the time of their discharges. It is significant that until March both Martin and Greenland were treated as valued employees. Martin, who came to her job with a wealth of experience, was awarded pay raises and bonuses. At the end of January, Pulley acknowledged that she had made a notable contribution to office procedure. Pulley's negative appraisal of Martin just 2 months later, which supposedly rested in part on an error Martin made the previous October, is a transparent attempt to conceal the true reason for her discharge.

Respondent's contention that it discharged Martin and Greenland to reduce overhead expenses was undermined by its hiring Janet Munger just 3 weeks later. If lack of funds was the real reason for Martin's dismissal (and the only reason Pulley mentioned during the exit interview), then surely Respondent would have recalled a seasoned employee like Martin when funds became available enough to fill the vacancy she left. Respondent also tries to justify its action by pointing out that it hired a "full charge" bookkeeper who was more skilled in accounting than Martin. This argument, too, is unconvincing for when Martin was dismissed Respondent had no way of foreseeing who would replace her. In any event, Martin and Munger performed virtually the same sort of bookkeeping chores. In addition, Respondent submits that because Munger worked little overtime she was a more efficient employee than Martin. Respondent may not fairly compare Martin's efficiency with Munger's when it presented no evidence showing whether the quantity of office work remained the same after March. Surely the abolition of Nu Dawn Realty as a business entity had to reduce the amount of paperwork in the office. Pulley herself admitted that the number of invoices declined substantially in 1987, and Martin's improved bookkeeping procedure also had to affect the amount of overtime worked.

In attempting to defend its actions, Respondent unfairly degrades Martin's contributions and exaggerates Zulaski's worth. While Zulaski may be a diligent and competent employee, it is clear from the record that Respondent's positive comments about her performance relate to her work at the time of trial, a year after she joined Respondent, and not as of March 13. Evidence establishes that at that earlier time, she was inexperienced, made mistakes, and was slower at performing her work than was Martin. Respondent's witnesses conveniently disregarded these deficiences when they praised her at the hearing. Pulley and Tynes accorded educational credentials to Zulaski that she did not possess, and in so doing underscored the contrived quality of Respondent's defense.

Similarly, Respondent found fault with Greenland's performance at trial, yet its conduct toward her prior to March 13 demonstrates that she was held in high regard. Like Martin, Greenland received raises and a bonus. Just 1 month before her rude termination, Pulley confirmed her promotion and, despite Respondent's declining fortunes, assured Greenland that she could expect greater responsibility accompanied by increased earnings. In paying the tuition fee for Greenfield's accounting course, Respondent appeared to be investing in training her for a career position with the Company.

Even acknowledging that Greenland made errors in her new position, surely, Pulley could have offered to return her to the receptionist job at which she had been "outstanding." Respondent's claim that Ebeling was a better receptionist than Greenland appears less than objective. Tynes had praised Greenland's industry and her educational achievement. Further, Tynes acknowledged, her marital problem was long known in the office and viewed sympathetically; it had never prevented her advancement. Moreover, if she had been offered and agreed to return to the receptionist position, Respondent would have had the benefit of an experienced receptionist who also was well trained on the computer and was in the process of acquiring accounting skills. If Pulley's evaluation had been genuinely neutral, Ebeling, who was new to the office and who had neither prior exposure to computer operations nor accounting training, could not reasonably be considered a more desirable employee than Greenland.

In light of the foregoing considerations, I find that Respondent has failed to prove that it would have selected Greenland and Martin for discharge even if they had not protested its overtime policy. Respondent's financial problems appear to have been genuine, but its asserted reasons for dismissing the Charging Parties are pretextual and designed to mask an unlawful intent to penalize its employees for exercising a right protected by Section 7 of the Act.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. The Respondent, Nu Dawn Homes, Inc., is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. By discharging Susan Martin and Modesta Greenland on March 13, 1987, because they engaged in protected concerted activities, the Respondent interfered with, restrained, and coerced them in exercising rights guaranteed by Section 7 of the Act, thereby violating Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

3. The aforesaid unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

On concluding that Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I find it necessary to recommend that it cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act. Having unlawfully discharged Susan Martin and Modesta Greenland, Respondent shall offer them reinstatement, and make them whole for lost earnings and other benefits computed on a quarterly basis from the date of discharge to the date of a proper offer of reinstatement, less net interim earnings in accordance with F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), plus interest as computed in New Horizons for the Retarded, 283 NLRB 1173 (1987).[9]

Wells Fargo Alarm Services, a Division of Baker Protective Services, Inc. and International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local 332, Petitioner. Case 32–RC–2549

June 30, 1988

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

Pursuant to a Stipulated Election Agreement approved June 10, 1987, an election by secret ballot was held on July 10, 1987, under the direction and supervision of the Regional Director for Region 32, among the employees in the stipulated unit.[1] The tally of ballots shows 13 votes for, and 6 against, the Petitioner; there were 13 challenged ballots, a sufficient number to affect the results.

After investigation, the Regional Director on August 6, 1987, issued a report and recommendations on challenges and notice of hearing in which he ordered a hearing on the challenged ballots.

A hearing was held before Hearing Officer Sharon Chabon. On October 23, 1987, she issued and served on the parties her report recommending disposition of the challenged ballots. The hearing officer recommended that: (1) the challenges to the ballots of guard operators Mark Brestel, Humberto Mahecha, and Armando Montour be sustained on the grounds they are guards within the meaning of Section 9(b)(3) of the Act and thus excluded from the unit; (2) the challenges to the ballots of lead shift operators (also designated by the Employer as relief shift supervisors) Rita Gangloff, Donelle Lopez, Cindy Madrid, and Mimi Marquez be overruled on the grounds they are not supervisors within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act; and (3) the challenges to the ballots of service technicians John Dana, Jeffrey Gerard, George Partan, Donald Pfaff, Elbert Travis, and John Wilson be overruled on the grounds that they are not statutory guards. Consequently, the hearing officer recommended opening and counting the ballots of the latter 10 voters and issuing a revised tally of ballots.

On November 2, 1987, the Employer timely filed exceptions to the hearing officer's report and a supporting brief. The Employer contends that the hearing officer erred in overruling the challenges to the ballots of the lead shift operators and the service technicians. The Employer argues that the lead shift operators/relief shift supervisors are statutory supervisors. In the alternative, it argues that, as employees, they function as operators who, along with the service technicians, are guards.[2] The Employer further contends that, because these challenged employees are guards, the unit is inappropriate because it contains guards and nonguards and, hence, the petition must be dismissed. The Petitioner filed an answering brief in which it supported the findings and recommendations of the hearing officer.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the hearing officer's report and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to adopt her findings, conclusions, and recommendations only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order.[3]

In ruling on challenges in cases where the parties have stipulated to the appropriateness of the unit, the Board will rely on the scope of the stipulation itself, with its various inclusions and exclusions, unless it is contrary to any express statutory provisions or established Board policies.[4] In this case, the Employer and the Petitioner agree that employees designated as lead shift operators are included in a classification stipulated as within the unit, namely, "operators." The Petitioner further contends that the service technicians are within the unit classification of "service personnel." The Employer appears to disagree, but fails to explain why the service technicians should not be considered to be clearly and unambiguously within the service personnel classification. If the employees in either or both of the disputed classifications are guards, as contended by the Employer, then the unit is not appropriate under Section 9(b)(3). If the employees in the disputed classifications are not guards, as contended by the Petitioner, then the challenges should be overruled and the challenged ballots opened and counted. Consequently, the Board must decide the issues relating to the lead shift operators and the service technicians notwithstanding the finding that the guard operators are guards. This is so because the evidence indicates that the parties may not have intended to include guard operators in the stipulated unit. Thus, there is no unit classification entitled "guard operators," the Employer

[1] The stipulated unit is:

> All full-time and regular part-time installation technicians, installation helpers, lead installers, systems technicians, fire inspectors, alarm technicians, operators and service personnel employed by the Employer at its facility located at 466 Vendome Street, San Jose, California, excluding all other employees, including office clerical employees, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act.

[2] Because, as set forth below, we agree with the latter position we find it unnecessary to decide the Sec. 2(11) issue.

[3] No exception was filed to the hearing officer's finding that the guard operators are statutory guards and we therefore adopt it, pro forma.

did not include these employees on the Excelsior list, and the record does not disclose that the Petitioner asserted that they were within the unit. In any event, for the reasons set forth below, we find that the unit as stipulated includes guards along with other employees, and thus the Board is required by Section 9(b)(3) to vacate this election and dismiss the petition.[5]

The Employer provides property protection services to approximately 2500–2800 industrial and commercial customers by installing, maintaining, and monitoring electronic security devices to detect unauthorized entry, fire, and other contingencies. The Employer's San Jose facility consists of a central station and installation and service departments. The central station operates 24 hours per day, 7 days per week, with an overall complement of approximately 11 employees. Typically, one operator, two guard operators, and a lead shift operator,[6] or an undisputed supervisor work each shift. Service technicians are supervised from central station employees, although they can receive work assignments from central station personnel. Approximately five service technicians work the weekday day shift and approximately four others cover all or at least part of the remaining weekday shifts and the weekend shifts.[7]

The duties of the central station employees involve both providing services to the Employer's customers and protecting the Employer's own facility. With respect to the former responsibility, when a customer's security system is triggered, the central station employee monitoring the signal immediately notifies the customer and the police or fire department. For the approximately 8 percent of the Employer's customers who have additionally contracted for a guard response service, the central station employee will also immediately dispatch an employee to the customer's premises. Depending on the number of such "guard runs" required, the ordinary service calls scheduled on any given shift, and the availability of personnel, the employee dispatched will generally be a guard operator or, if necessary, a service technician.[8]

A guard operator or service technician making a guard run will report his arrival to the central station and visually inspect the customer's premises for signs of entry. He will wait for the arrival of the police or firefighters and, in some instances, the customer. During that time he will ask any individual seeking to enter the facility for identification and he will refuse entry to unauthorized persons. The Employer has instructed all employees making guard runs not to use force to prevent such entry. The only difference in the duties of guard operators and service technicians during a guards run is that the latter also may make repairs to the security system.

The hearing officer found that the guard operators are guards within the meaning of Section 9(b)(3) of the Act. She relied on evidence showing that, though most of a guard operator's worktime is spent in the central station monitoring alarm equipment, an essential part of his job is to respond to certain alarms and do whatever is necessary to see that the customer's premises are continuously protected. The hearing officer cited Electro-Protective Corp., 251 NLRB 1141 (1980), in which the Board, on nearly identical facts, found that the employees dispatched to a customer's premises to protect it until the police or the customer arrives and have the authority to deny entry to persons lacking proper identification are, like those employees protecting their employer's own property, statutory guards. As indicated above, no party excepted to this finding.

The hearing officer, while recognizing that the identical analysis used to determine the status of guard operators should be applied to the service technicians, who are included in the stipulated unit description (which on its face intends to exclude guards), found that they too infrequently perform "guard runs" to qualify as statutory guards. We disagree. Though the primary function of the service technicians is to repair and service the security devices located at customers' locations, the record makes clear that guard run responsibilities are an essential component of the service technicians' work duties. While this assignment is performed less frequently by service technicians than by guard operators, the record shows that over 20 percent of > decid[ing] that any unit is appropriate . . . if it includes, together with other employees, any individual employed as a guard to enforce against employees and other persons rules to protect property of the employer or to protect the safety of persons on the employer's premises . . . .

[6] The record shows that the lead shift operators, to the extent they are not performing duties alleged by the Employer to be supervisory, perform the same duties as operators.

[7] A service technician is on duty only until 1:30 a.m. during the 11 p.m.-7 a.m. central station shifts.

[8] The testimony of Jorge Santamaria, the central station lead shift supervisor, shows that during a typically busy month for guard response calls, January 1987, approximately 18 of the 24 guard runs were made by guard operators and the remaining 6 by service technicians. During a typically slow month for this service, July 1987, 9 of the 11 guard runs were made by guard operators and the remaining 2 by service technicians. It is likely that those guard runs assigned to service technicians occur primarily on night and weekend shifts, based on the testimony of two service technicians, both of whom work the weekday day shift. Donald Pfaff testified that he had never made a guard run during his 4 months of employment. George Partin testified that although he had been assigned guard runs during the first 13 years of his employment when he worked the 4:30 p.m. to 1 a.m. shift, he had not made any guard runs during the preceding 3 or 4 years he has been working the weekday day shift.

the guard runs are made by service technicians. More importantly, while on these runs, the service technicians perform the same duties as the guard operators. We find, therefore, that the service technicians, insofar as they are required to protect property a portion of their time, are also guards within the meaning of Section 9(b)(3) of the Act.[9]

As for the challenged lead shift operators, the hearing officer did not pass on their status as guards because she found the Employer made no such argument. The Employer acknowledges that, in challenging the ballots of the lead shift operators, it did so on the basis of their alleged supervisory status; but it contends, as it did on brief to the hearing officer, that the issue of their status as employees eligible to vote in the election, having once been properly raised, encompasses the issue of whether they are guards. We find merit in that contention, particularly when, as here, the issue strikes at the heart of the unit's statutory appropriateness. We further find that, because lead operators, when not performing alleged supervisory duties, perform as operators (a class of employees included in the stipulated unit), any determination we make concerning the guard status of lead operators in their occasional role as operators will apply as well to all other operators.

As correctly found by the hearing officer, all central station employees, that is, lead operators and operators, and guard operators when not out on a guard run, perform essentially the same tasks. In addition to monitoring the security systems of the customers, they have a continuing responsibility to protect the integrity of the central station itself, which is located within a freestanding building. A television camera is mounted outside the building to cover the entrance from the main parking lot to the building. A second camera is located in a security lobby or "man-trap" situated just inside the outer door. Monitoring screens for both cameras are placed at the control desks within the central station area itself. The operator, guard operator, or lead shift operator on duty is responsible for identifying any person seeking entrance to the central station and controlling access by means of a buzzer system attached to the inner door of the man-trap.

Each central station employee is thus charged by the Employer to enforce its rule forbidding unauthorized persons from entering the central station. Thus, to the extent that the duties of the operators and lead shift operators involve the protection of their own Employer's property, we find that these employees are guards under the Act. Brink's Inc., 272 NLRB 868 (1985).

Having found that the operators, including the lead shift operators, and the service technicians are guards within the meaning of Section 9(b)(3) of the Act, we further find that the stipulated unit in this proceeding is not and cannot be appropriate for collective-bargaining purposes because, as constituted, it includes both these employees and nonguard employees. Accordingly, no question concerning representation exists and we shall vacate the election and dismiss the petition.

ORDER

The election is vacated and the petition is dismissed.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On June 22, 1987, Administrative Law Judge Peter E. Donnelly issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions[2] and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, Ernst Enterprises, Inc., Dayton, Ohio, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

---

[1] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[2] We adopt the judge's conclusion that the Respondent engaged in bad-faith bargaining in September and October 1986 by insisting to impasse on wage and benefit reductions, in retaliation against its employees for having supported the Union. In so doing, we emphasize the particular facts of this case, including the Respondent's 8(a)(1) violations, such as the threat to cut wages and benefits if the Union won the election, and the Respondent's grant of a 5-percent wage increase only 4 months prior to insisting on wage reductions without any substantiating reasons.

Robert J. Brown, Esq., of Dayton, Ohio, for the Respondent.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

PETER E. DONNELLY, Administrative Law Judge. The charge was filed by International Union, United Automobile, Aerospace and Agricultural Implement Workers of America, UAW (Union or Charging Party) on 6 October 1986. A complaint issued on 24 November 1986 alleging that Ernst Enterprises, Inc. (Employer or Respondent) had unlawfully threatened, promised, and otherwise coerced employees in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. Further, that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (d) of the Act in that Respondent, in the course of negotiations, "insisted to impasse that wage and benefit concessions be agreed to by the Union and included in any collective-bargaining agreement reached, notwithstanding the fact that Respondent had granted all unit employees a 5-percent wage increase in May 1986, immediately prior to the NLRB election which resulted in the Union's certification." A hearing was held before me in Dayton, Ohio, on 17 and 18 March 1987. Briefs have been timely filed by the General Counsel and Respondent and have been duly considered.

289 NLRB No. 75

I. EMPLOYER'S BUSINESS

The Employer is an Ohio corporation with facilities in various States, including facilities at Cincinnati and Lebanon, Ohio, the facilities involved in the instant proceeding, where it is engaged in the manufacture and nonretail sale and distribution of ready-mixed concrete and other products. During the past 12 months Respondent purchased and received at its Cincinnati and Lebanon, Ohio facilities products, goods, and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from points outside the State of Ohio. The complaint alleges, the answer admits, and I find that the Employer is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. LABOR ORGANIZATION

The complaint alleges, the answer admits, and I find that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Facts[1]

Beginning in late March or early April 1986,[2] the Union began an organizing effort at the Respondent's two cement plants in Lebanon and Cincinnati, Ohio. These two facilities are managed jointly, treated as one in the corporate structure, and served by one crew of about 20 cement truckdrivers and about 5 support employees, mechanics, and general maintenance. Cincinnati is a new plant. It became operational in October 1985 and began its first full production season 1 April 1986.

[1] There is conflicting testimony regarding some allegations of the complaint. In resolving these conflicts, I have taken into consideration the apparent interests of the witnesses. In addition, I have considered the inherent probabilities, the probabilities in light of other events, and corroboration or lack of it, also the consistencies or inconsistencies within the testimony of each witness and between the testimony of each and that of other witnesses with similar apparent interests. In evaluating the testimony of witnesses, I rely specifically on their demeanor and have made my findings accordingly. While apart from considerations of demeanor, I have taken into account the above-noted credibility considerations, my failure to detail each of these is not to be deemed a failure on my part to have fully considered it. Bishop & Malco, 159 NLRB 1159, 1161 (1966).

[2] All dates refer to 1986 unless otherwise indicated.

The Union's principal employee organizer was Kevin Lamb, a driver. Lamb solicited authorization cards for the Union, held union meetings, and distributed union pamphlets, stickers, and pins. The union campaign was conducted openly. Union supporters, including Lamb, wore hats and pins and displayed bumper stickers in the presence of supervisors, including Denny Cole, division supervisor; Mark Van de Grift, vice president of operations; and John Ernst, president.

About mid-May, prior to the representation election on 5 June,[3] in the dispatch trailer at the Cincinnati plant, Robert Beatty, former plant manager for Cincinnati-Lebanon, testified to a conversation he overheard between Ernst, Cole, and Julie Cain, the dispatcher, in which Ernst made the statement that he would bargain with the Union presumably if it won the election, but would not sign a contract. Cole and Ernst denied this conversation. However, having carefully weighed the testimony, I am satisfied that Beatty was the most candid and reliable of these witnesses, and I credit his testimony. Sometime in May at a time when Respondent was hiring drivers for the Cincinnati-Lebanon operation, Beatty testified that he was told by Cole that they did not want to hire any of the Union "son-of-a-bitches" from Reading Concrete, whose employees were represented by the Teamsters. It appears that some Reading drivers were terminated when the operation was sold to another company. Cole denies that he said this, although he admits that he instructed Beatty that they were not going to hire any terminated Reading employees since he felt they were not qualified if they were not rehired by the new owners. In evaluating the testimony on this matter, I am persuaded that Beatty was the more convincing and should be credited.

In late May shortly before the June 5 election, Ernst approached Lamb at the trailer parking lot of the Cincinnati operation and said to him "'Let's face it. You have some influence on the people around here.' And he said, 'If you forget about this union stuff here we have possibly some management openings in Atlanta you could work into.' And I said, 'Well, I can't do that John.' And he said 'Well, how about if we make you a lead man right here at this plant here and we can work out a contract for these guys. We don't need a union to do that.' And I said 'I can't do that neither.' He said, 'Well, I respect you for where you stand.' And that was about the end of the conversation." Ernst admits that he took Lamb aside to discuss problems at the Cincinnati facility and to see what his complaints were. He also concedes that he asked Lamb if he would want to go to Atlanta, because they needed employees in the Respondent's new Atlanta operation, and Lamb had previously shown some interest in going there, but that he was not offering any supervisory position in either Atlanta or Cincinnati for Lamb to withdraw his support from the Union. He also denied offering to work out a contract without the Union. A careful analysis of the testimony convinces me that Lamb was the more reliable witness, and I credit his testimony. Accordingly, I find that by offering Lamb a management position to withdraw his support for the Union, and by soliciting Lamb to circumvent the Union by dealing directly with him, Respondent has interfered with the organization rights of employees guaranteed in Section 7 of the Act.

A few days prior to the 5 June election, James Moore and Mark Blevins, both drivers, testified that they were in the yard of the Cincinnati plant discussing the union campaign when Van de Grift broke into their conversation and stated to them that if the Union were voted in, the Respondent had a legal right to cut their wages and benefits. Neither Moore nor Blevins responded to this and went about their work. Van de Grift recalls the conversation but not specifically what he said. However, Van de Grift testified that what he had told employees throughout the campaign was that they can start where they are and can negotiate either down or up. Having reviewed the testimony, I am satisfied that the mutually corroborative testimony of Moore and Blevins is a more reliable account, particularly since Van de Grift did not recall specifically what he said. Accordingly, in the circumstances, I conclude that Van de Grift's statement was coercive and constitutes interference with the organizational rights set out in Section 7 of the Act.

In May 1986, Van de Grift testified employees were given a 5-percent wage increase, which was provided for in Respondent's budget.[4]

A representation election was held on Friday, 5 June, in a unit of production and maintenance employees, including truckdrivers, loader operators, and mechanics at the Cincinnati and Lebanon facilities. The Union won the election and was certified on 13 June.

On Monday, 8 June, at 6 a.m., Ernst called a meeting of all the unit employees for both locations at the parking lot of the Cincinnati plant, just outside the trailer being used as temporary office space. Management employees present were Cain, Cole, Beatty, Van de Grift, John Ernst, and John Ernst Jr., son of John Ernst, assistant vice president of operations, and another management employee named Andrew Allen. Ernst addressed the employees telling them, according to Lamb, in substance, that he would bargain with the Union in good faith because he had to but that he would stand 100 percent behind the eight people who did not vote for the Union in the election. Also that he would dedicate his life to the fight against the Union and that if something happened to him, his son, John Ernst Jr., would take over. This testimony is generally corroborated by the testimony of Moore and Blevins.

Ernst testified that the meeting was called because of "chaos" within the unit concerning the effect of representation by the Union. According to Ernst, he told the group that the Respondent had lost the election and he would bargain in good faith, denying that he said "because he had to." Also, that it was "looking like a pretty good year coming up," and that they needed everyone pulling together. He denied saying that he would dedicate his life to fighting the Union but as to the eight who voted against the Union, Ernst testified.

[3] The election was won by the Union by a vote of 12 to 8.

[4] No unfair labor practice charge was filed alleging illegality in the granting of this wage increase.

> And the people had voted for me, in the trust of the company, or trusted me in the company, that I wouldn't betray that trust. And if something ever happened to me, I pointed to my son and said, "You'll carry that trust on." And that was the end of the conversation.

A series of negotiating sessions began with noneconomic items being discussed in the early sessions. The Union was represented by International Representatives Ronald Mason or Jim Caldwell, and several employees, including Lamb, Moore, Blevins, and Don Brown. Respondent was represented by spokesman Attorney Richard Brown, Van de Grift, John Ernst Jr., and Cole. Certain economic issues, wages, and fringe benefits were discussed at the 15 September meeting, and at the 24 September meeting Respondent made its initial economic proposal. The unit consisted of approximately 20 drivers, 2 operators, a lead mechanic, a mechanic, and a service employee. The proposal provided, among other things, for wage reductions effective 15 January 1987 in the above classifications ranging from cuts of $1.22 per hour (drivers) to none for the mechanic. The economic proposal also provided for elimination of the Employer-paid family option to the health insurance coverage unless the employee paid the premium for such coverage. The monthly premium cost for the family health coverage option is $105 to $115 per month, or just about double the individual rate. Respondent also proposed elimination of a third week of paid vacation after 9 years of service although at the time no employees had 9 years of service. Respondent also offered an alternative economic proposal providing for $1.35 per hour in each classification over its original wage proposal, but eliminating all employee payments for holidays, vacation, and insurance premiums. Robert J. Brown, Respondent's attorney and spokesman during the negotiations, explained that these economic concessions were being sought because economic projections in the Respondent's budget as to production and sales for the Cincinnati-Lebanon operations were not being met. Respondent placed in evidence "Budget Income Statements" for August and September 1986 to support this position. However, at the negotiating session the Union did not request nor did Respondent offer any documentation of its oral position. Van de Grift also testified that it was his best guess that budget projections in the "area" of April and May 1986, when the 5-percent wage increase was granted, were not met either.

In testifying about the economic condition of the Respondent, Van de Grift stated that the Cincinnati operation was begun because of Respondent's desire to expand the Lebanon operation in order to break into the Cincinnati market. As noted above, Cincinnati did not begin operations until late 1985 for the 1986 season. However, during the summer of 1986 it produced more concrete than Lebanon and employs about 15 drivers compared with 4 in Lebanon. Van de Grift testified that Respondent has plans to open another plant in the Cincinnati area around Miamitown, Ohio. Van de Grift testified that Cincinnati-Lebanon is a growing operation and Ernst testified, as noted above, that the prospects were "pretty good" for 1986 and later testified that 1986 turned out to be a "pretty good" year.

Brown also told the union negotiating committee that a wage survey of their competitors disclosed that some of those wage rates were much lower than Respondent's. This wage survey was conducted primarily by a salesman named Donald Flowers by making telephone calls to some other employers and asking various people about their wage rates and benefits. Cole wrote down whatever information he received and this was the basis of Respondent's position.[5]

At this negotiating session, Lamb asked Van de Grift how come they were given a raise in May and now it was being taken back and Van de Grift told him that bookkeeping was months behind and that they "just didn't catch it until now" that wages needed to be cut. Lamb also asked Brown if they were planning on making any wage cuts of Respondent's other plants and Brown said they were not at that time. It appears that prior to being unionized, Respondent had, in May 1985 at the Lebanon operation, eliminated Saturday overtime and daily overtime after 8 hours, granting overtime only after 40 hours per week had been worked. Some of Respondent's other operations, apparently owned or controlled by Ernst, are under contract. These include four plants in the Dayton area (Teamsters), Springfield, Ohio (Teamsters), and Richmond, Indiana-Fort Jefferson, Ohio (Laborers). In Dayton, a contract concession in May 1985 consisted of a wage reduction from $10.28 to $8.50 per hour and elimination of overtime after 8 hours and Saturday, with overtime only after 40 hours per week. However, the rate went up to $9.34 per hour in January 1986. In Springfield, a wage concession in the January 1987 contract included a wage reduction from $8.90 to $8 per hour with elimination of daily and Saturday overtime and a fourth week of vacation eliminated from the schedule as well as elimination of an employer contribution to an IRA fund.

At the 24 September meeting, Brown advised the Union, on inquiry, that this was not Respondent's final offer. At the next negotiating session on 29 September, Respondent produced another written economic proposal in which the hourly wage rates were all raised 50 cents per hour over the prior proposal, and also Respondent agreed to pay the first $12 per week of the premium cost for those employees electing the optional family health insurance coverage, with the employee paying the rest. Respondent's original alternative proposal would also be increased by 50 cents per hour, still eliminating any payment for insurance premiums, holidays, or vacations. Respondent's 29 September proposal also provided for jury pay and funeral leave benefits. On [5] Flowers did not testify nor did any representative of any of the surveyed employers, nor was any supporting documentation offered to support the representations made. Thus, while the document was admitted as relevant to the issue of motivation as to the good-faith bargaining aspect of the case, it is obviously hearsay and not probative as to the accuracy of the representations made.

3 October, Respondent presented its "Full and Final Economic Proposal," adding 25 cents per hour to its proposal for all classifications and also to the alternative proposal. In addition, Respondent proposed a full draft contract containing many other contract provisions to which the Union had tentatively agreed, subject to ratification by the membership, except to the extent that the Union's written proposals of 29 September was at variance with it. Thus it appears that on 3 October Respondent's final proposal provided for a wage reduction of 47 cents per hour from the wages being paid on 25 June 1986, for drivers and operators with smaller reductions for the lead mechanic and service employee and an increase of 75 cents per hour for the mechanic. In addition, employees were required to pay the first $12 per week for family health insurance coverage with the Company paying the remainder. Also, a third week of vacation after 9 years of employment was eliminated.

There also remained outstanding the above-noted union proposal about economic and noneconomic contract provisions, and the parties concede that impasse was reached at the 3 October session. Despite a meeting of the parties attended by a Federal mediator on 15 December, neither party made any further modifications in its proposal.

B. Analysis and Recommendations

The General Counsel takes the position that Respondent, by bargaining to impasse regarding wage and benefit concessions, was acting in retaliation against its employees for having supported the Union. Respondent contends that its action was not retaliatory but was motivated by economic considerations. It is undisputed that Respondent, in May 1986, shortly before the representation election on 5 June and the certification of the Union on 13 June, gave the employees a 5-percent wage increase. It is also undisputed that Respondent's first wage proposal on 24 September 1986, about 4 months later, called for substantial wage cuts for nearly all unit employees as well as substantially reduced health insurance coverage unless the employees paid the premiums for the reduced coverage. Also proposed was the elimination of a third week of paid vacation after 9 years of service, although it appears that no employees were affected by the last proposal since none had obtained 9 years of employment; all to become effective 15 January 1988.

Respondent explains that the 5-percent wage raise was given in May because it was budgeted. The much greater proposed reduction in wages and health care in September, it argues, were made for economic considerations. What then happened between May and September 1986 to the business condition of Respondent to justify or explain the proposed reductions?

Respondent argues that the basis for its proposed concessions was that its budget projections were not being met. However, one must be careful not to equate projected budget figures with the actual economic condition of the Respondent. Projected budgets, by definition, involved estimates and evaluations concerning annual anticipated business operations of the company. These estimates and evaluations may be either cautious or optimistic depending on the projector; or perhaps even unrealistic. The fact that projections are or are not being met does not define the economic condition of the company. It is possible for a company to be financially robust, showing generous growth and substantial profits, and still not be meeting projected business goals. This is especially true in the instant case where Cincinnati is a new plant, opening in 1986, with really no history of operations on which to predicate any realistic projections at that time. In any event, Van de Grift's testimony suggests that projections were not being met a few months earlier at the time the May 1986 wage increase was granted. However, Respondent apparently deemed its financial position sufficiently secure to grant the 5-percent wage increase at that time. In addition, it appears that the economic condition of the Respondent was good. Indeed, Respondent does not contend, or at least offered no evidence to show that its business was not profitable or even only marginally profitable, and Respondent's president testified that 1986 promised to be and was a pretty good year for the Cincinnati-Lebanon operation.

Respondent also argues that its insistence on the proposed concessions was justified by the fact that a wage survey of its competitors disclosed that some of them were paying less in wages and benefits. However, the written wage survey submitted to support that contention is insufficient as a matter of evidence to establish that fact. The wage survey was essentially a long-handed account of information acquired by a salesman of the Respondent by making telephone calls to various unnamed individuals apparently employed by some of Respondent's competitors. Neither the salesman nor those he spoke to testified. The information itself is incomplete and nonspecific. If it were complete and detailed, it would still have no probative value for the purpose of establishing that the actual wage rates and benefits of the other companies contained therein were accurate since the document is clearly hearsay for that purpose. As the record reflects, the document was admitted only for the purpose of showing that some information on the document was read to the Union at a negotiating session.

Respondent argues in its brief that the Union never demanded documentation to support the information set out in the wage survey nor did it request substantiating data for Respondent's claim that failure to meet budget projections motivated Respondent to propose wage and benefit concessions. However, this argument begs the question. The question is whether there did in fact exist justification for Respondent's insistence on its proposals. Whether the Union demanded proof is beside the point in establishing that proposition.

It is also true that Respondent, notably Ernst, did not accept the notion of unionization. Respondent resisted the Union's organizational efforts, even telling his supervisors that if the Union won he would bargain but would not sign a contract. Ernst manifested his continuing animosity when he called a meeting of unit employees on 8 June, the first working day after the Union won the election. In addressing them, as noted earlier, he stated that he would negotiate with the Union because he had to but would dedicate his life to fighting the Union and would stand 100 percent behind those who voted against the Union. Although Ernst testified that he called the meeting to stabilize or normalize the operation after the election, these remarks were not conciliatory, they were hostile and reflect a continuing rejection of and contempt for the bargaining process, even after the Union was certified.

In these circumstances, I conclude that Respondent's proposals to reduce wages and benefits were not made in good faith and that while negotiations subsequently produced impasse, that impasse was not bona fide since it was tainted and motivated by retaliatory considerations.[6]

IV. THE EFFECT OF THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES ON COMMERCE

The activities of the Respondent, set forth in section III above, in connection with Respondent's operations described in section I above, have a close and intimate relationship to traffic and commerce among the several States and tend to lead to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce and the free flow of commerce.

V. THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act, I shall recommend that Respondent be ordered to cease and desist therefrom and from infringing in any like or related manner upon its employees' Section 7 rights and that it take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

Having found that Respondent engaged in bad-faith bargaining by proposing and insisting to impasse on retaliatory wage and benefit concessions, it shall be recommended that Respondent be required, on request, to bargain in good faith with the Union.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By offering a job promotion to an employee for abandoning his support for the Union, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

4. By proposing to bypass the Union and deal directly with the employees, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

5. By threatening to cut wages and benefits if the employees elected union representation, the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

6. All production and maintenance employees, includng truckdrivers, loader operators, and mechanics, employed by the Respondent at its 10093 Princeton-Glendale Road, Cincinnati, Ohio facility and its 43344 Columbia Road, Lebanon, Ohio facility, but excluding dispatchrs, batchmen and all office clerical employees and all rofessional employees, guards, and supervisors as dened by the Act constitute a unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act.

7. At all times material, the Union has been and is the exclusive representative of the employees of the Respondent within the unit found appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining.

8. By proposing and insisting to impasse on retaliatory wage and benefit concessions, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[7]

ORDER[8]

The Respondent, Ernst Enterprises, Inc., Dayton, Ohio, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Offering employees job promotions for abandoning their support for the Union.

Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

[6] The General Counsel contends, in par. 6 of the complaint, that an mployee, Bill Hubbard, was threatened by Cole. However, since the ly testimony offered was the rejected hearsay testimony of Beatty, I all recommend the dismissal of par. 6.

[7] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[8] In the absence of circumstances indicating the propriety of a visitatorial clause as a part of the proposed remedial order, the General Counsel's request therefore is denied.

[9] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

(d) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS JOHANSEN, BABSON, AND CRACRAFT

On June 30, 1987, Administrative Law Judge James F. Morton issued the attached supplemental decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, the General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Respondent filed a brief in response to the General Counsel's exceptions.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the supplemental decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions only to the extent consistent with this Supplemental Decision and Order.

The Respondent's employees who were represented by Local 455, the Union, went on strike on July 1, 1975. In January 1976, the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(2) and (1) of the Act by soliciting its employees to abandon their support for the Union and urging and soliciting them to join Teamsters Local 810 and violated Section 8(a)(1) by threatening plant closure as an inducement for the employees to abandon their support for the Union.[3] The Respondent subsequently violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by refusing to bargain with the Union when it requested bargaining in July 1978.[4] In August 1978, the Union made an unconditional offer to return to work. In 1980, the Board found that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) by failing to reinstate fully its striking employees.[5] Subsequently, the Regional Director issued the instant backpay specification.

The judge found, inter alia, that no discriminatee for whom the General Counsel sought backpay pursuant to the make-whole order was entitled to reimbursement for fringe benefits lost as a result of participation in the strike. The judge also found that Sylvio Ruta, Roger Williams, and Robert Catalano, strikers who returned to the Respondent's employ, were not entitled to receive reimbursement for lost wages pursuant to the make-whole order. Additionally, the judge found that Williams and Catalano were not entitled to reimbursement of medical expenses. For the reasons set forth below, we disagree with the judge.

1. It is well settled that the "finding of an unfair labor practice . . . is presumptive proof that some backpay is owed by the [Respondent]."[6] The burden is on the General Counsel to prove the gross amount of backpay due.[7] The burden then shifts to the Respondent to establish facts that negate or mitigate its liability.[8]

In analyzing the General Counsel's backpay claims for Joseph Cassara, Albert Cioffoletti, Junius Howell, Joseph Reiss, Sylvio Ruta, Roger Williams, and Robert Catalano, the judge acknowledged that the collective-bargaining agreement effective just prior to the 1975 strike provided unit employees various fringe benefits. He also found that the Respondent did not provide these contractual benefits to employees after the strike began. The judge mistakenly stated that the Regional Director's second amended backpay specification sought to make the discriminatees whole by requiring the Respondent to provide them the fringe benefits that the Union had established in subsequent contracts with other employers during the backpay period. The judge then reasoned that requiring the Respondent to provide such benefits would compel the Respondent to grant concessions to the Union that had not been achieved in negotiations, contrary to Section 8(d) of the Act.

The Regional Director's second amended backpay specification does not seek to impose on the Respondent any terms in the Union's subsequent collective-bargaining agreements with other employers; rather, the specification uses a formula based on continuing the terms of the parties' expired agreement. Although the Second Circuit held that the Respondent validly withdrew from the multiemployer group following the 1976 impasse in bargaining between the group and the Union,[9] the Union, as the incumbent, was still entitled to a presumption of majority status among the Respondent's unit employees.[10] The Respondent was, therefore, obligated to bargain on request with the Union as an individual employer, because the Respondent did not show a good-faith doubt as to the Union's majority status.[11] Because the Union retained majority status, the Respondent was obligated to bargain with the Union on its July 1978 request for bargaining.[12] The Respondent was likewise required to continue giving effect to its expired collective-bargaining agreement with the Union until bargaining to impasse.[13] Thus, the second amended backpay specification, based on the expired agreement's terms, correctly calculated the gross amounts of backpay due. The Respondent, on the other hand, has not established any facts to negate or mitigate its liability.

[2] In sec. E of his supplemental decision, the judge inadvertently stated that Albert Cioffoletti suffered net wage losses totaling $9677.47. Cioffoletti actually suffered net wage losses totaling $7030.10, as claimed in the second amended backpay specification, and reimbursement of that amount is ordered.

Specifically, the judge denied all claims set forth in the second amended backpay specification for vacation, holiday, and sick leave pay, as well as contributions to the Union's Welfare, Pension, and Annuity Funds. We will, therefore, order the Respondent to make the discriminatees whole by paying them the respective amounts set forth in the second amended backpay specification for vacations, holidays, and sick leave,[14] and by making the contributions to the Local 455 Welfare Fund,[15] Pension Fund, and Annuity Fund on their behalf in the respective amounts set forth in the second amended backpay specification.

2. The backpay specification also claimed that Sylvio Ruta, Roger Williams, and Robert Catalano, strikers who returned to work for the Respondent,[16] are owed $294.83, $4651.60, and $9677.47 in back wages, respectively, on the theory that they would have received the same pay rates and wage increases that similarly situated replacement employees received, absent the discrimination against them. The measure of back wages due used in the specification was the pay rate each earned before the strike, plus increases granted similarly situated employees, less the rates each actually earned, multiplied by the hours each worked.[17]

The judge rejected the claims for Ruta, Williams, and Catalano because he found that the pay rates set and increases granted before July 1, 1978, were not discriminatory and did not constitute continuing violations of the Act. This proceeding, however, is not an unfair labor practice proceeding; the unfair labor practice has already been found and affirmed by a court of appeals. Kuno Steel Products Corp., 252 NLRB 904 (1980), enfd. sub nom. NLRB v. Koenig Iron Works, 681 F.2d 130 (2d Cir. 1982). The judge apparently misunderstood the Kuno order. The Board specifically found that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) by not fully reinstating strikers who individually returned to work before August 9, 1978,[18] but ordered that, under the circumstances, the Respondent's backpay liability would run only from 6 months before the instant charges were filed.[19] Manifestly, the Board contemplated the use of the discriminatees' prestrike pay rates and increases granted to similarly situated employees before the backpay period to determine the amounts of back wages due. Accordingly, we will order the Respondent to make whole Sylvio Ruta, Roger Williams, and Robert Catalano by paying them $294.83, $4651.60, and $9677.47, respectively, as claimed on their behalf in the backpay specification.

[14] Sylvio Ruta, Roger Williams, and Robert Catalano are entitled to $3033.80, $7662.50, and $9839.20, respectively.

[15] The Respondent asserts that a discriminatee is made whole when he is reimbursed for the cost of premiums incurred in obtaining substitute health insurance coverage and for his out-of-pocket medical expenses to the extent that those expenses would have been reimbursed through the Local 455 Welfare Fund. To be made whole, however, a discriminatee must be restored to the position he would have occupied had the discrimination not occurred. This includes not only reimbursement of the discriminatee's premiums and medical expenses, but also requires the Respondent to contribute to the Welfare Fund according to the expired contract's terms so that the discriminatee's future interests in the Fund will be ensured. "[T]he diversion of contributions from the union funds undercut[s] the ability of those funds to provide for future needs." Stone Boat Yard v. NLRB, 715 F.2d 441, 446 (9th Cir. 1983).

Hassett Maintenance Corp., 260 NLRB 1211 (1982), a cryptic decision on which the Respondent relies, focused on what it characterized as the double insurance costs that would result from requiring the employer (which had provided other coverage) in that case to make contributions to the welfare fund. Hassett did not address restoring the full range of an employee's interests in the welfare fund. The Hassett decision did not reconcile its limited remedial order with pre-Hassett precedent requiring employer contributions to union welfare funds on employees' behalf, see, e.g., Kraft Plumbing & Heating, 252 NLRB 891 (1980), affd. mem. 661 F.2d 940 (9th Cir. 1981), as does precedent decided after Hassett. See Stone Boat Yard, 264 NLRB 981 (1982), which the Ninth Circuit enforced. The court rejected the double-coverage/punitive claim: the "employer cannot complain of the extra cost of improperly created, substitute fringe benefits. . . . The company is merely required to repay what it has unlawfully withheld." Stone Boat Yard v. NLRB, 715 F.2d at 446.

[16] Member Cracraft continues to adhere to her position that in certain circumstances an employer's obligation to bargain may be suspended with regard to the wages, hours, and terms and conditions of employment of employees who abandon a strike and return to work. See Schmidt-Tiago Construction Co., 286 NLRB 342, fn. 9 (1987) (joining then Chairman Dotson's dissent in relevant part). This position was and continues to be a minority view. For institutional reasons, Member Cracraft will apply precedent in this area. She notes, additionally, that the parties have not raised the issue in this case.

[17] The calculation, computed quarterly, was adjusted for overtime and part-time.

[18] Although Robert Catalano returned to the Respondent's employ on August 24, 1978, after the Union's unconditional offer to return, the Board grouped him with those who returned before August 9, 1978, for purposes of the make-whole order in Kuno, supra at 906.

[19] Id. at fn. 5.

3. The General Counsel has excepted to the judge's failure to include in the make-whole remedy reimbursement of Roger Williams and Robert Catalano for the purchase of substitute health insurance and out-of-pocket medical expenses incurred during the backpay period. The second amended backpay specification, to the extent supported by the documents the General Counsel introduced at the hearing, claimed $5253.22 for Catalano's and $3572.53 for Williams' substitute medical insurance premiums and out-of-pocket medical expenses. The judge, who, as stated above, dismissed all fringe benefit claims for all discriminatees, did not specifically address medical expenses.

It is customary to include reimbursement of substitute health insurance premiums and out-of-pocket medical expenses in make-whole remedies for fringe benefits lost.[20] Because the Respondent has established no facts that would negate or mitigate its liability, we will order the Respondent to reimburse Catalano $5253.22 and Williams $3572.53 for their documented medical expenses during the backpay period.

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

JAMES F. MORTON, Administrative Law Judge. This is a proceeding to determine how much backpay, if any, is due seven employees who, as found by the Board, were discriminated against by G. Zaffino & Sons, Inc. (Respondent) because they took part in a strike called by Shopmen's Local Union No. 455, International Association of Bridge, Structural & Ornamental Iron Workers, AFL-CIO (Local 455). The hearing in this case was held in conjunction with five other backpay cases, all of which had their genesis in a strike that began almost 12 years ago.

Three of the seven discriminatees involved in this case had been reinstated by Respondent to their former jobs, but not fully. The other four had been unlawfully denied reinstatement.

The General Counsel amended the backpay specification to allege that Respondent was owned by four Zaffino brothers and that they, together with a realty company they controlled, should be held jointly and severally liable for all backpay found to be due.

[20] See, e.g., RMC Constructors, 266 NLRB 1064 (1982).

[21] 283 NLRB 1173 (1987). Interest on and after January 1, 1987, shall be computed at the "short-term Federal rate" for the underpayment of taxes as set out in the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621. Interest on amounts accrued prior to January 1, 1987 (the effective date of the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621), shall be computed in accordance with Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

Respondent, in its answer to the amended specification, asserts that no backpay is due. Regarding the three discriminatees who had returned to its employ, Respondent states that they have been fully reinstated. Concerning the remaining four discriminatees, Respondent contends that they "were unavailable for work" as of the start of their backpay period. It further contends that one of those four incurred a willful loss of interim employment.

Counsel for Respondent also represents the four Zaffino brothers and the realty company involved, VABS. They all deny that they should be liable for any backpay.

On the entire record, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses and after due consideration of the briefs filed with me, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACTS

I. BACKGROUND AND OUTLINE OF THE CASE

Respondent had been engaged in the business of making and installing iron, steel, and related products in New York City and vicinity. In mid-1975, it had been a member of an employer association then negotiating a collective-bargaining agreement with Local 455 to supersede the one that was then scheduled to expire on 30 June 1975. Local 455 struck on 1 July 1975 and the approximately seven unit employees of Respondent began picketing.

A bargaining impasse was reached on 19 January 1976. See NLRB v. Steel Fabricators, 582 F.2d 135 (2d Cir. 1978). Respondent withdrew from the multiemployer unit. Local 455 requested Respondent, on 13 July 1978, to bargain regarding its unit of employees. Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act in rejecting that request. See Kuno Steel Products Corp., 252 NLRB 904 (1980). Respondent had by then made numerous changes in the wage and benefits of its unit employees. The Board made some reference to it in finding that three of the discriminatees had, prima facie, not been fully reinstated, but there was no contention that those changes were unilaterally instituted in violation of Section 8(a)(5).

Three of Respondent's striking employees abandoned the picket line and returned to Respondent's employ. In the underlying decision in this case, the Board made the findings excerpted below. See Kuno Steel Products, supra at footnote 5, which reads

> The General Counsel presented evidence establishing a prima facie case, which [Respondents have] not adequately rebutted, that . . . unfair labor practice strikers individually returned to work prior to August 9, [1978] and were not fully reinstated to conditions current at the time the strike began. Since an individual employee may make an unconditional offer to return to work, each individual employee who was reinstated pursuant to an unconditional offer was entitled to full reinstatement to the status quo which he occupied at the time he went on strike. The Laidlaw Corporation, 171 NLRB 1366, 1381–82 (1968), enfd. 414 F.2d 99 (7th Cir. 1969), cert. denied 397 U.S. 920 (1970). Accordingly, in light of Respondents' failure to rebut the General Counsel's prima facie case, we find their conduct in this regard to be violative of Sec. 8(a)(3) of the Act.
> We agree with the Administrative Law Judge's recommendation that determination whether the total wages and benefits package these employees have received since returning to work is substantially equivalent to the wages and benefits they received prior to the strike—and thus satisfies the full reinstatement requirement—should be considered in the compliance stage of this proceeding. Under the circumstances of this case, we hold that Respondents' backpay liability to any employee who returned to work before August 9 shall run only from 6 months prior to the filing of charges herein (i.e., from 1 July 1978).

In the footnote just quoted, "August 9" is the date on which Local 455 applied, inter alia, to Respondent on behalf of the remaining strikers to return to work. In Kuno Steel, supra, the Board found that Respondent had unlawfully refused to accept that application and ordered Respondent to offer those strikers reinstatement and to make them whole.

The Board's order in Kuno Steel was enforced. See NLRB v. Koenig Iron Works, 681 F.2d 130 (2d Cir. 1982). Seven years had, by then, passed since the strike had begun. In related proceedings, the Board has had occasion to comment on the lengthy history of the litigation arising from that strike.

Shortly after the strike began, Respondent hired replacements and reemployed two of the striking employees when they abandoned the strike. It paid these employees lower wage rates and provided them with different fringe benefits than those given just prior to the start of the strike. It has, throughout the years since, effected many other changes in the wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment of the unit employees. Respondent stated, in its brief, that no unfair labor practice charges have even been filed against it for either (i) unilaterally paying to bargaining unit replacements wages and benefits lower than those paid prior to the strike or (ii) unilaterally changing prestrike benefits granted to strikers on their return to work.

Bargaining between Local 455 and Respondent resumed in 1983. Local 455 filed an unfair labor practice charge on 8 July 1983 and a complaint issued thereon against Respondent alleging that it violated Section 8(a)(l) and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act, by refusing to bargain in good faith. That complaint was dismissed on a finding that Respondent was engaged only in lawful hard bargaining. See G. Zaffino & Sons, 275 NLRB 456 (1985).

The first three claims discussed below are for those discriminatees who had returned to Respondent's employ.

II. SYLVIO RUTA

Just before the strike began in July 1975, Ruta had worked for Respondent as a mechanic at $6.70 an hour. He joined the strike on 1 July 1975 but left it on 9 September 1976 to return to work for Respondent. He was the first striking employee to return. According to footnote 5 of the Board's decision in Kuno Steel, supra, his backpay period did not begin then but started on 1 July 1978—the date 6 months prior to the date on the underlying unfair labor practice charge was filed in this case.

As of the start of his backpay period, he was receiving $7.50 per hour. The General Counsel contends that he should have then been receiving $7.70 an hour based on average raises given other employees since the strike began and is due a total of $294.84. Shortly after the backpay period began, he received a raise that disposed of any further wage claim. Strangely, Ruta actually received larger raises in his backpay period and more total wages than the General Counsel's gross backpay formula would have given him.

The General Counsel's formula, in essence, asserts that, at some point antedating the start of the limitation period of Section 10(b) of the Act, i.e., 1 July 1978 as set by the Board in footnote 5 of Kuno, supra Respondent gave raises to unit employees, including Ruta and that Ruta, at that point, should have been receiving $7.70 an hour. The General Counsel's formula then projects that figure into the backpay period. In other words, the General Counsel contends in effect that Respondent's failure to pay Ruta an average increase at a time barred by Section 10(b) was a discriminatory act that continued into the backpay period. Such a theory is clearly without merit under the doctrine of Machinists Local No. 1424 v. NLRB, 362 U.S. 411 (1960).

I therefore find that Respondent has not discriminated against Ruta concerning his wage rates on or since 1 July 1978.

The General Counsel also contends that Ruta should be made whole regarding alleged fringe benefit losses he suffered. The General Counsel contends that he was discriminatorily denied all the fringe benefits provided for in Local 455's contract with Respondent, which had expired on 30 June 1975 and also all the improvements in those benefits in the subsequent standard contracts Local 455 reached with other companies in the New York City area.

As noted above, a bargaining impasse had been reached in 1976. No unfair labor practice charge was ever filed to protest Respondent's discontinuance of the use of Local 455 benefit plans and recently, the Board dismissed a complaint that Respondent had failed to bargain collectively with Local 455 about a new contract. In these circumstances, were Respondent required now to provide Ruta with the fringe benefits of Local 455 contracts, it would effectively be compelled to grant concessions, a result proscribed by Section 8(d) of the Act. Moreover, the furnishing of such benefits to Ruta and not to all other unit employees would constitute disparate treatment based on the fact that Ruta had taken part in the Local 455 strike. To award him those benefits would constitute, not remedy, discrimination.

I therefore conclude that Respondent is not obligated to provide Ruta or for that matter the other discriminatees, with the fringe benefits contained in Local 455 contracts.

Respondent has provided certain fringe benefits for unit employees. The General Counsel has not asserted any claims thereunder for any of the discriminatees. I note this here because later in this decision, the discussion of fringe benefits claims asserted by the General Counsel for some of the other discriminatees refers to the above.

I find that Respondent provided Ruta, during the whole of his backpay period, with a nondiscriminatory wages and benefits package and I conclude that he was fully reinstated with no backpay due him.

III. ROGER WILLIAMS

Williams had been employed by Respondent as a finisher just prior to the start of the strike; he was then earning $7.40 per hour. He joined the strike but left it on 6 April 1978 to return to work for Respondent at $9 an hour, the rate he was earning at the start of his backpay period, 1 July 1978. The General Counsel's backpay formula states that he should have then been receiving only $8.40 an hour. I have some difficulty comprehending the nature of the backpay claim asserted for him. The formula used by the General Counsel is based on an average of wage increases given since 1975. According to the General Counsel, Williams' actual hourly wage rates continued to exceed those projected for him under the General Counsel's formula for the first 10 quarters of his backpay period. At that point, the "average" increases received by others began to outweigh the increases he actually was given. Obviously, if the compliance investigation had been completed in the first year or two of the backpay period, the General Counsel would have had no wage claim to make for Williams under its present formula.

The critical point for me to decide, in any event, is whether Respondent had, as of the start of the backpay period, discriminated against Williams. Certainly, based on his wage rate, it did not because he was then earning 60 cents an hour more than the rate the General Counsel contends he was entitled to get. Regarding his fringe benefits, he and the other employees of Respondent then were all being treated equally. The General Counsel's claim on behalf of Williams for fringe benefits is the same as the one I already rejected for Ruta.

It may be that, as the General Counsel contends, in the 11th calendar quarter after 1 July 1978, Respondent paid him less than the average wage rate because of some unlawful reason, but it would be inappropriate for me to assume that Respondent resumed then, for no apparent reason, its earlier discriminatory treatment of Williams. There was no unfair labor practice charge filed during or after the 11th quarter alleging any such resumption.

Based on the above I find that Williams had been fully reinstated as of and since 1 July 1978 and is due no backpay.

IV. ROBERT CATALANO

Catalano returned from the strike to Respondent's employ after Local 455 had applied on 8 August 1978 for reinstatement of the strikers. It appears from the Board's order in Kuno Steel, supra, that it treated Williams as one who had returned before the application. In any event, he had been earning $6.70 an hour as a mechanic when the strike began in 1975. He returned to Respondent's employ on 24 August 1978 as a mechanic earning $7.50 an hour. The General Counsel contends that, based on average raises granted to unit employees in the 3-year period antedating the start of the backpay period, Catalano's hourly rate should have been $7.70 an hour then, not $7.50. However, the first discriminatee discussed above, Ruta, was receiving $7.50 an hour then based on raises received earlier and, in his overall backpay period, there was no discrimination shown him, according to the General Counsel's own formula. If the $7.50 rate was discriminatory, it was set well before the backpay period began to run. The General Counsel's formula uses average raises to calculate the rates Respondent should have paid. As noted earlier, the rate on which $294.83 was claimed for Ruta was set long before the limitations period of Section 10(b) of the Act began to run. The raises he received during the backpay period exceeded the average. For the second discriminatee who returned to work, Williams, his wage rates for 2-1/2 years after the start of the backpay period, also exceeded the average. For Catalano, his rates were lower than the average. It may fairly be said then that the rates of those three discriminatees, on average, were about equal to the average raises given replacements. Certainly, no separate basis exists to infer that Respondent sought to further penalize the discriminatees during the backpay period because they once had taken part in the Local 455 strike. The fact that Catalano did not get the same raises as the other two discriminatees is no basis to find that Respondent continued to discriminate against him. I find, instead, that the mathematical computations for Catalano in the General Counsel's formula are insufficent by themselves to show that he was given disparate treatment because he once took part in this Local 455 strike.

Respecting the claim made on his behalf for fringe benefits, the finding above about similar claims made for Ruta and Williams are applicable. Accordingly, I conclude that Catalano had been fully reinstated on his return to work for Respondent and that no backpay should be awarded to him.

V. ALBERT CIOFFOLETTI

In this and following sections, the claims of the four discriminatees who were not reinstated by Respondent are discussed.

According to the amended backpay specification, Cioffoletti had the most seniority among Respondent's employees who were still on strike when Local 455 applied for their reinstatement on 9 August 1978. On that premise, the specification alleged that he should have been reinstated on 31 August 1978 when Respondent instead hired a replacement. In support of that allegation the General Counsel offered the testimony of the supervisory compliance examiner in Region 29 who stated that all of the material allegations in the amended specification were based on information and records furnished to Region 29 by Respondent. Respondent did not controvert that account. Indeed, its own formula, discussed below, uses much of the same data relied on by the General Counsel, and its formula differs from the General Counsel's principally in that Respondent would omit certain data as irrelevant.

Respondent, in its answer, asserted that Cioffoletti incurred a willful loss of employment during his backpay period and thus is entitled to no award. Respondent contends that Cioffoletti had retired from employment soon after the start of the strike and long before Local 455 applied for his and other strikers reinstatement. In support of that assertion, Respondent placed in evidence a document furnished it by the General Counsel. The document was submitted to Region 29 by Cioffoletti when it was conducting its compliance investigation. The document is entitled "Statement of Claimant for Backpay." It is signed with Cioffoletti's name and the General Counsel acknowledged that Cioffoletti did sign it. The General Counsel noted too that the answers to the printed questions were inserted in longhand by someone whose handwriting clearly was not that of Cioffoletti. That is obviously the case. The handwritten answers are to some extent confusing. On the one hand the "No" box is checked alongside a question asking if the claimant was unavailable for work during the backpay period.[1] Yet, at another point in the document, there is a note to the effect that the claimant was unemployed during the backpay period, and a further note, with an asterisk that reads, "Did not pursue employment" and still a further note, reading "None" (also asterisked) in the section asking claimant to describe efforts to secure employment. The document contains no explanation why the asterisks were placed on it.

The Respondent has the burden of establishing that a backpay claimant has incurred a willful loss of employment. See Clear Pine Mouldings, 268 NLRB 1044, 1059 (1984) and cases cited there. Respondent, to prove that Cioffoletti incurred such a loss, offered only the document described above. On its face, it is ambigious. Cioffoletti's signature on it seems to some extent to be written by a feeble hand. If there had been some other evidence before me, I might have been able to give some weight to this document but, by itself, it affords no basis to reject Cioffoletti's claim. There is nothing to explain the apparent contradictions in the document, or the use of the asterisks or the variations in the handwriting. Respondent has offered, without more, an ambiguous document as an admission against interest. Cf. Industrial Waste Service, 268 NLRB 1180 at fn. 1 (1984), where the Board (absent consistent, objective facts) rejected the General Counsel's contention that a decedent's affidavit should be given weight. Had Respondent offered some clarification of the apparent inconsistencies and confusion in the document before me, the burden might have shifted to the General Counsel to come forward with rebuttal evidence. On the record before me, I can give no weight to the document. More significantly, Respondent easily could have tested the validity of its own theory, that Cioffoletti was unavailable because he was retired. It could have, on receiving Local 455's application on his behalf, offered to reinstate him. It did not. It cannot be allowed to exploit the very ambiguity its unlawful acts created.

[1] The "Yes" box alongside had a crossed out "X" in it.

The gross backpay formula relied on by the General Counsel is based on the earnings of the mechanic who was hired in place of Cioffoletti. The use of this formula has been approved by the Board. See Big Three Industrial Gas & Equipment Co., 263 NLRB 1189, 1194–1195 (1982). Respondent offered an alternative formula, one based on an amalgam of Cioffoletti's wage rate when he went on strike in July 1975 and the rates paid to his replacement, beginning more than 3 years later. Respondent contends that the Board, at footnote 5 of Kuno Steel, supra, specified that the formula it proposes is the one to be used. Footnote 5, however, refers to those discriminatees who had returned to Respondent's employ without full reinstatement. It has no application to Cioffoletti's case or to those of the other discriminatees discussed below. If Respondent's formula had been used, Cioffoletti would be credited with less pay than his replacement received—a result that would compound the very wrong that footnote 5 was aimed at correcting.

The General Counsel's claim for fringe benefits allegedly owed Cioffoletti fails for the reasons discussed at length above concerning essentially the same such claim for Sylvio Ruta.

Based on the foregoing, I find that Cioffoletti suffered quarterly, net wage losses totaling $9677.47.

VI. JOSEPH CASSARA, JUNIOUS HOWELL, AND JOSEPH REISS

The gross backpay formula used by the General Counsel in calculating wage losses of these discriminatees is premised on the same concept used in computing Cioffoletti's, just discussed, i.e., the earnings of replacements as disclosed by Respondent's own records. Respondent's answer raises the same contention already considered in discussing Cioffoletti's claim. For the same reasons set out above, I reject those contentions of Respondent and find that these discriminatees are entitled to awards respectively for the net backpay claimed in the second amended specificiation. The fringe benefits claimed for them, however, are denied for the reasons discussed above in the section relating to Sylvio Ruta's claim. Thus, the sums due these employees appear alongside their names:

Joseph Cassara	$4,942.25
Junious Howell	3,719.35
Joseph Reiss	2,557.40

VII. THE OTHER RESPONDENTS

The General Counsel contends that VABS Realty Corp. (VABS), and Vincent Zaffino, Angelo Zaffino, Bruno Zaffino, and Salvatore Zaffino are, with Respondent, a single-integrated business enterprise and therefore that all are jointly and severally liable for backpay due under the Board Order.

Vincent Zaffino, Angelo Zaffino, Bruno Zaffino, and Salvatore Zaffino are brothers who, over 40 years ago, took over their father's business. In 1947, they formed VABS, an acronym comprised of the first initials of their respective first names, for the purpose of holding title to the real property and the building where the operating companies were then housed. They, with their sister Clementine, each owned one-fifth of the shares of VABS stock. The four brothers also founded Respondent in 1947 in order to incorporate the operating company; each owned one-quarter of Respondent's issued stock.

These brothers were the only ones to manage Respondent's operations. It appears that Bruno took care of all purchasing, hiring and firing employees, and administrative functions. The other brothers worked in the shop, and in the field as estimators or overseeing operations. The four were the only officers of Respondent; no board of directors was ever established.

It appears that there never was a written lease of the building to Respondent by VABS. Each month Respondent paid a certain sum to Clementine as her share of the rental of the building. The four brothers later increased that rental payment to her. When Vincent died in 1980, his widow also began to receive regular rental payments from Respondent. It does not appear that the other three brothers drew any money from VABS. In fact, at one point VABS mortgaged its holdings in order to provide Respondent with operating capital. The arrangement that Respondent had with VABS was characterized by one of the brothers as very informal and the same thing has to be said of the way the brothers operated Respondent. Thus, its records indicate that items of a personal nature were paid by Respondent, e.g., the cost of perpetual care of their father's grave; maintenance work on an apartment building owned by one of the brothers was paid out of Respondent's assets.

Vincent died in 1980. His widow, instead of inheriting his stock, received the proceeds of an insurance policy paid for by Respondent, which also retired the stock presumbly held by Vincent. The same practice was followed when Bruno died. Angelo and Salvatore Zaffino then were the sole stockholders. They sold the business to AT&T Iron Works in 1984 for $120,000 and split that sum between them. The real property held by VABS was also sold then, for the sum of $325,000, presumably for the benefit of the five shareholders; Angelo, Salvatore, Clementine, and the widows of Vincent and Bruno.

The relevant indicia of a single enterprise are (1) interrelationship of operations, (2) centralized control of labor relations, (3) common management, (4) common ownership or financial control, and (5) representation to the public as a single-integrated enterprise, although no one of these factors is controlling. See Capital Theatre, Capital Rock, 231 NLRB 1370, 1374 (1977). In that case, a realty company and the operating companies were held to constitute a single-integrated enterprise responsible for remedying the unfair labor practice filed therein. The record in the case before me shows dealings between VABS and Respondent, that cannot be characterized as being at arms length. Instead these furthered the common interests of the overall business. On the basis of the foregoing and the record as a whole, I find that VABS and Respondent were highly integrated enterprises in terms of ownership, operation, and centralized control of labor relations and, as such, constitute a single employer within the meaning of the Act.

The Board's Order ran against Respondent's officers, agents, successors, and assigns. As the corporate assets were distributed to the Zaffinos in 1984 when the business and property were sold and as a corporation cannot by divesting itself of all property leave remediless the holder of a contingent claim, it is appropriate now to pierce the corporate veil to hold those individuals liable for the backpay up to the amounts of the funds distributed to them from corporate assets. See F & W Oldsmobile, 272 NLRB 1150 (1984).

THE REMEDY

For the reasons set forth above, I find that the obligations to the discriminatees will be discharged by the payment to them of the respective amounts found due set forth above. The backpay provided with interest is to be computed quarterly in the manner prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), and Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977), minus any tax withholding required by Federal and state laws.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On July 25, 1984, Administrative Law Judge Harold B. Lawrence issued the attached supplemental decision. Thereafter the Respondent, Continental Insurance Company, and the General Counsel filed exceptions and supporting and answering briefs.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record and the attached Supplemental Decision in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions[2] only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order.

In his decision, the judge concluded that backpay claimants Bertha DePalma, Angelo Bonomo, and Elaine Hickey should receive the backpay sought for them by the General Counsel. Specifically, the judge found that these three discriminatees made reasonable and diligent efforts to obtain employment during the backpay period. The Respondent has excepted to these findings and, for the reasons set forth below, we find merit in the Respondent's contentions.

The record shows that on February 27, 1981,[3] Marriott Food Service, Inc. (Marriott) terminated the operation of a cafeteria and executive dining room for personnel of the Continental Insurance Company (the Respondent) at the Company's offices in downtown Manhattan. In June, Interstate United Corporation (Interstate) resumed operation of the facility and offered similar positions to many of the previously discharged cafeteria employees. The reinstatement and tolling date for the backpay period was July 6.

Bertha DePalma

Claimant Bertha DePalma, who resided on Staten Island, was employed by Marriott as a waitress at its downtown facility. While employed in that position she traveled to work by ferry and bus to downtown Manhattan. According to DePalma's testimony, she talked to Marriott's general manager, Carol Kramer, about employment opportunities at other Marriott facilities. As a result, Kramer offered DePalma a similar position at Marriott's midtown Manhattan facility located on 42d Street.[4] However, in order to reach this facility, DePalma would have had to travel by subway to midtown after the ferry ride. DePalma testified that it was too far to travel on the salary being offered and that she had never ridden the subway. For these reasons, she rejected Kramer's offer.

The judge found that DePalma's rejection of this position was not, by itself, a sufficient ground to disqualify her from receiving backpay. Rather, he concluded that DePalma was under no obligation to accept employment in midtown since she had diligently sought positions elsewhere[5] and there was an abundance of restaurants in the downtown Manhattan area.

Unlike the judge, we view DePalma's action not in terms of the reasonableness of limiting her job search but as a refusal to accept an offer of similar employment.[6] DePalma testified that she rejected

[1] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[2] In accordance with our decision in New Horizons for the Retarded, 283 NLRB 1173 (1987), interest on and after January 1, 1987, shall be computed at the "short-term Federal rate" for the underpayment of taxes as set out in the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621. Interest on amounts accrued prior to January 1, 1987 (the effective date of the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621), shall be computed in accordance with Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

[3] All dates are in 1981.

[4] On termination of its operation at the Continental facility, Marriott transferred Kramer to its Pfizer facility, located on 42d Street, as the general manager there.

[5] In this regard the evidence shows that DePalma read newpaper advertisements each day and answered a number of them. She contacted several brokerage firms, applied at several restaurants, and inquired of a friend who was a dining room supervisor at Chase Manhattan Bank. She did not accept any of the jobs advertised because they required night or weekend work and she wanted to continue to work normal daytime hours as she had done at the Respondent's facility.

Kramer's offer at Marriott's midtown facility because it was too far to travel on the salary being offered and because she had never ridden the subway. DePalma offered no specifics, however, as to the difference in travel time or expense. The absence of such evidence, coupled with the fact that her stated reason for not riding the subway was a personal preference, leads us to conclude that the record contains an insufficient basis for excusing DePalma's rejection of this job offer.[7] Accordingly, we find that DePalma's rejection of a comparable job offer tolled her backpay.

Angelo Bonomo

Angelo Bonomo had been employed as the first chef at the Continental facility and was 66 years old at the time of his discharge. A few days prior to the closing of the cafeteria, Bonomo advised Marriott's general manager, Carol Kramer, that he intended to retire. According to Kramer's testimony, Bonomo stated he would not apply for a position at other Marriott facilities because "he was an old man and intended to retire." Similarly, Marriott's personnel director, Delores Coe, testified that Bonomo had advised her that he intended to retire on his dismissal.[8]

During the backpay period Bonomo collected social security and union pension payments in addition to receiving unemployment insurance benefits. Moreover, according to his credited testimony, Bonomo sought employment by reviewing newspaper advertisements, and by visiting the Union's employment office, a private employment agency, and the New York State employment referral service several times a week.

The judge found that Bonomo was eligible for backpay. In arriving at this determination, he relied on the fact that Bonomo had collected unemployment insurance benefits and concluded that Bonomo had conducted a reasonable job search. The judge further found that Bonomo's collecting social security benefits and union pension payments did not automatically mean that he had elected to rely exclusively on that income, and that his acceptance of those benefits is not necessarily inconsistent with a desire to obtain employment. Since he found that Bonomo had conducted a reasonable job search, the judge concluded that this claimant is entitled to backpay from February 27 to June 29, when he failed to accept Interstate's offer of reinstatement. We disagree.

The unrefuted evidence demonstrates that Bonomo advised three management officials and one fellow employee that he intended to retire on the closing of the cafeteria. Consistent with this stated intention, Bonomo actually collected both social security and union pension benefits. Although Bonomo also collected unemployment insurance benefits and visited several unemployment agencies, there is no substantial evidence that Bonomo either interviewed or applied for specific positions during the backpay period. The record does show, however, that Bonomo was contacted during this time and offered employment by AT&T as an occasional cook. Bonomo rejected this offer because he was going away but stated that he would contact AT&T on his return. He never followed up on this offer.[9] Bonomo was also offered reinstatement by Interstate in mid-July but effectively rejected the offer by responding that he was planning a vacation and would be unavailable until September.

In the particular circumstances here, we find that Bonomo's visits to several employment agencies do not warrant finding that he engaged in a reasonable job search. Thus, Bonomo's stated intent to retire and his acceptance of retirement benefits, his response to the AT&T and Interstate job offers, and the absence of a showing that he actually interviewed or applied for a specific job lead us to conclude that, if he did not retire, he effectively removed himself from the job market.[10] More specifically, Bonomo's refusal of jobs with AT&T and Interstate because those jobs did not suit his convenience demonstrate that he would only have accepted work when he chose and as he pleased. That being so, Bonomo's visits to employment agencies are not inconsistent with his announced retirement intentions (which may well have dissuaded Marriott from offering him work at its other facilities) and his claiming social security and pension benefits. Indeed, viewed in the context of Bonomo's job refusals and the receipt of such benefits, those visits appear to have been for the purpose of enabling him to decide if there were any jobs he might be interested in, rather than as active efforts on his part to seek work and fulfill his obligations to mitigate any backpay that might be owed him.[11] Accordingly, we find that Bonomo is ineligible for backpay.

[7] We acknowledge, as our dissenting colleague notes, that DePalma is a grandmother. We also note, however, that she testified that she "[had her] health" and that her subsequent acceptance of a position as a waitress makes it clear that she was physically capable of carrying out the duties of that job.

Regarding her objection to taking the subway, DePalma testified that she did not do so because "I don't have to." Under further questioning by counsel for the General Counsel, she elaborated on her reasons as follows: "I'd be afraid to. I don't know anything about the subway. I may as well tell you the truth. I never rode them. I worked on Bleeker Street, and then I worked on Maiden Lane." We note, however, that so far as the record indicates, the job at Marriott's midtown facility, which DePalma declined, was a day-shift job that would call for travel on the subway at times when millions of other New Yorkers are traveling by subway to their jobs. We further note that DePalma also testified that she "take[s] the bus" in New York, but she indicated that she had not bothered to find out whether the bus would take her to 47th Street, where the Marriott facility was located, since she had "never travelled that far."

[8] The judge did not discredit the testimony of either Kramar or Coe. Bonomo did not contradict the testimony of management officials or a fellow employee that he told them he planned to retire.

[9] We find this evidence relevant not for the purpose of showing a comparable offer, but as an indication of Bonomo's actions consistent with his stated intention to retire.

[10] In so finding we are not overruling the judge's crediting of Bonomo's testimony that he made attempts to find employment, but are finding that such attempts were insufficient to establish a reasonable job search.

Elaine Hickey

Elaine Hickey had been employed as a waitress for Marriott and resided on Staten Island. During the backpay period she followed advertisements in a Staten Island newspaper, and applied for positions at several restaurants, department stores, and a clothing store. With the exception of a diner in Brooklyn, all of these positions were located on Staten Island. In this regard, Hickey testified that she did not apply for jobs in other city boroughs but confined her search to the Staten Island area because she believed it was too expensive to commute to Manhattan.

Although the judge observed that by essentially limiting her job search to Staten Island, Hickey had eliminated prospects for employment in other boroughs, he, nevertheless, concluded that this did not mean that she failed to conduct a diligent job search. Rather, based on the evidence, the judge found Hickey made reasonable efforts to find employment on Staten Island and is entitled to an award of backpay.

Contrary to the judge, we find that Hickey unreasonably limited her job search. We find it significant that Hickey was working for Marriott in Manhattan when she was unlawfully discharged and she subsequently accepted reinstatement with Interstate there. Her exclusion of this area is, therefore, at odds with a reasonable job search and, therefore, we conclude that Hickey did not make reasonable efforts to seek interim employment. Accordingly, we find her to be ineligible for an award of backpay.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge as modified below and orders that the Respondents, Continental Insurance Company, Division of Continental Corporation; Marriott Food Service, Inc., A Division of Marriott Corp.; and Interstate United Corporation, their officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order as modified.

Delete the following named claimants and the amounts set forth opposite their names from the Order: Angelo Bonomo, Elaine Hickey, and Bertha DePalma.

MEMBER JOHANSEN, dissenting in part.

It is a rare and regrettable chapter in the annals of Federal statutory compliance in which a panel majority of the National Labor Relations Board informs a grandmother earning social security that she must either conquer her fear of the New York City subway system or forgo restitution under the Act. Backpay claimant Bertha DePalma actively sought out job opportunities waitressing on two shores of New York Harbor and rejected no job offer in the relevant job market for a woman of her age,[1] experience, and skills.[2] I dissent from the tolling of her backpay on June 29, 1981.

[11] Likewise, his claiming unemployment benefits indicated no more than that he believed he was entitled to such benefits simply because he had been terminated from his job at the Continental cafeteria.

[1] To a question by counsel for the General Counsel seeking to adduce her precise age, DePalma gave the following response: "Do I have to tell my age? All that matters is that I have my health, right?"

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

HAROLD B. LAWRENCE, Administrative Law Judge. Pursuant to an Order of the National Labor Relations Board approving a stipulation entered into among the Respondents and the Board on July 15, 1981, in which it was provided that the Respondents, jointly and severally, would make whole the losses suffered by the discriminatees named in these proceedings for any loss of pay that they may have suffered by reason of the alleged discrimination against them, and differences having arisen concerning to the amounts payable under the Order, the Regional Director for Region 2 issued a backpay specification and notice of hearing in Cases 2-CA-17886, 2-CA-17887, and 2-CA-18204. The Respondents have filed an answer and two amended answers to the backpay specification, which admitted the allegations of the backpay specification except regarding cutoff dates, the effect on the claimed amounts of wage increases, overtime payments, vacation pay, bonuses, and fringe benefits, and denied knowledge or information sufficient to admit or deny the interim earnings data supplied in the appendices to the specification. However, the Respondents admitted the correctness of the allegations relating to gross backpay of the claimants, the formula for determining the net earnings, and the formula for determining net backpay.

The Respondents have conceded the correctness of 11 of the backpay specifications; questioned one, that of Octavio Parra, only as to the correctness or propriety of including medical expenses in the backpay award; requested retention of jurisdiction for 1 year with respect to 4 claimants who did not appear at the hearing; and contest the eligibility for backpay of 29 of the claimants. They have alleged affirmative matter in the answer and amended answers that essentially embraces five points: that the claimants failed to exercise reasonable diligence in seeking employment during the backpay period; that claimants who did not follow up on a suggestion made by Marriott that they file applications for employment at other Marriott facilities should be deemed to have willfully failed to seek employment; that the backpay period should be deemed tolled as of the date when Respondent Interstate sent out a mailgram to the claimants offering reinstatement; that the Respondents are entitled to offset severance pay given to the employees; and that Respondents are entitled to offset certain amounts that were erroneously paid to two employees when the employees received vacation paychecks to which they were not entitled.

A hearing was held before me at New York City, New York, on April 25-27 and 29; May 2-5; June 1-3; and July 5, 1983. The parties were afforded full opportunity to be heard, to call, examine and cross-examine witnesses, and to introduce relevant evidence. Posthearing briefs have been filed on behalf of the General Counsel and by Respondent Continental Corporation on behalf of all the Respondents.

On the entire record and based on my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses and the manner in which they gave their testimony and after consideration of the briefs submitted, I make the following

I. BACKGROUND AND ISSUES

Marriott Food Service, Inc. (Marriott) is a division of Marriott Corp. It operated a cafeteria and executive dining room for personnel of the Continental Insurance Company at that Company's offices in downtown Manhattan, New York City. It terminated its operation of these facilities on February 27, 1981,[1] on very short notice to the employees. It paid many of them severance pay equal to 1 week's wages. Respondent Interstate United Corporation (Interstate) took over the operation of the facilities immediately thereafter. On June 26, Interstate sent mailgrams to the backpay claimants, as follows:

> You are hereby offered employment with Interstate United Corporation at 80 Maiden Lane, New York City, in the same job you formerly held with Marriott Food Service at that address or in a substantially equivalent job. If interested, please write Don Gerstein, Interstate United Corporation, 80 Maiden Lane, New York, N.Y., 10038, or telephone him at (212) 440-2670, within two weeks from your receipt of this message.

A number of the claimants responded to the mailgram and were interviewed by Donald Gerstein, Interstate's district food service manager. The proposed reinstatement date was July 6, 1981, which I accordingly find to be the date on which the backpay period was tolled except in certain specific situations noted hereinafter.

II. CONTENTIONS APPLICABLE TO MORE THAN ONE CLAIMANT

A. The Standard of Diligence by Which Claimants' Efforts to Find Employment Must be Judged

The Respondents' admission of the gross backpay computations made it incumbent on the Respondents to allege and prove any respect in which any of the claimants were ineligible for backpay or any respect in which the backpay specifications were incorrect. Marlene Industries, 234 NLRB 285 (1978); Blue Hills Cemetery, 240 NLRB 735 (1979). The Employer has the burden of showing that the backpay claimant incurred a willful loss by refusing to take new employment or by neglecting to make reasonable efforts to find interim work. Inland Empire Meat Co., 255 NLRB 1306, 1308 (1981), enfd. mem. 692 F.2d 764 (9th Cir. 1982). The determination of whether there has been a lack of diligence in looking for work depends on the facts and circumstances of each case. Amshu Associates, 234 NLRB 791, 794 (1978). The discriminatee is required only to make reasonable efforts to find work. Consequently, his failure to explore some employment possibilities or to employ a particular modality of search, as when an employee concentrates on personal applications but fails to consult newspaper advertisements, does not by itself compel the conclusion that a diligent search was not conducted. DeLorean Cadillac, 231 NLRB 329, 330 (1977), modified on other grounds 614 F.2d 554 (6th Cir. 1980). See Blue Hills Cemetery, supra at 736. Doubts respecting such matters are resolved in favor of the backpay claimant and against the respondent employer, who is the wrongdoer responsible for the existence of the uncertainty. United Aircraft Corp., 204 NLRB 1068 (1973).

Amshu Associates and Inland Empire make it very clear that examination of the backpay claimant and attempts to impeach his testimony are not acceptable substitutes for affirmative proof by the employer that the claimant failed to make reasonably diligent efforts to find interim employment, but there is an important qualification that is explicitly mentioned in both these decisions. The testimony of the backpay claimant must be credible. Thus, in Amshu it was held that a prima facie case was made of diligent effort to find work that shifted the burden to the Respondent to establish willful loss of earnings, but the testimony of the backpay claimant was expressly credited by the administrative law judge. Similarly, in Inland Empire, the respondent attempted to impeach the testimony of the backpay claimant in much the same way the Respondents attempted to do in this case, and was held not to have met its burden of proof in the face of testimony by the backpay claimant that the administrative law judge expressly credited. Nothing different is involved in those cases (such as Blue Hills Cemetery, supra) in which it has been held that the General Counsel meets his burden by putting the backpay specification into evidence, whereupon the respondent has the burden of showing failure to make a reasonable effort to find interim employment. If the Respondent calls the backpay claimant to testify and the administrative law judge credits the testimony, the Respondent will have failed to meet its burden, in the absence of introduction of any other evidence.

[1] All references to dates and quarter years refer to dates in 1981 and quarters of that year unless otherwise stated.

At the same time, it must be recognized that the rules respecting burden of proof are not matters of mechanical application. Where "reliance on the bare testimony of [the claimant] himself is not warranted based upon the record as a whole" the mere fact that the General Counsel has filed a specification will not clothe the backpay claimant with special standing to recover simply because the employer has been unable to produce affirmative evidence of failure to make diligent effort to obtain interim employment. See DeLorean Cadillac v. NLRB, supra, 614 F.2d at 555. I have found the testimony of several of the claimants in these proceedings to be unworthy of belief and have accordingly found them ineligible to receive backpay.

The fact that backpay liability arose in this case by reason of a stipulation between the General Counsel and the Respondents does not alter the parties' burdens of proof. They are in the same position as any other parties to a backpay proceeding. It is therefore in accordance with these and other generally applicable principles that I have reviewed the 29 disputed claims. The parties have also urged that I take into consideration court decisions rendered under other statutes and certain area employment statistical data.

The Respondents call attention to language contained in court decisions rendered under the Civil Rights Act of 1964 to the effect that award of backpay is a discretionary power that must be guided by meaningful standards. The Respondents assert that I should be guided by the application of standards consistent with the purposes of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act). Award of backpay under the Act is not at all discretionary with me but is mandated by law. Board decisions and court decisions interpreting the Act are controlling regardless of any seemingly contradictory language that may be found in cases dealing with an altogether different statute that addresses problems other than the concerns of this case and the National Labor Relations Act.

Both the General Counsel and the Respondents have urged me to consider statistics that they presented respecting employment conditions in the New York area, and that supposedly are of probative value with respect to the capacity of many of the claimants to find jobs. The Respondents challenge the reliability of the General Counsel's statistics, which concededly are based on a sample rather than a full count of the population. Sampling on a defined statistical basis is a standard method of preparing such statistics and does not invalidate them. However, I have not accorded any weight to the statistics adduced by either side, for they are simply not probative of the facts they were offered into evidence to prove. They would be relevant if they showed that it would be either difficult or easy for these particular claimants to obtain employment. They do not show that.

The utility of statistics to show whether jobs are available in an area is extremely limited. In Flite Chief, Inc., 258 NLRB 1124 (1981), affd. 696 F.2d 1003 (9th Cir. 1982), it was observed:

> At most, Respondents' statistical analysis may create an element of doubt. Any doubts must be resolved in favor of the backpay claimant rather than Respondents. [258 NLRB at 1128.]

Accordingly, my findings are based on the evidence actually adduced by the parties that would tend to show what efforts particular backpay claimants made or failed to make to find employment.

B. Offsets Claimed by the Respondents

The Respondents contend that a week's severance pay received by each of the claimants and vacation checks erroneously issued to two of the claimants are appropriate offsets against backpay due them.

The guiding principle underlying the award of backpay is that the discriminatees must be made whole for the losses that they have suffered by reason of the employer's unfair labor practice. In cases in which the employer has already compensated the discriminatees in some manner for that loss, failure to deduct the amount of such compensation from the gross backpay due to the discriminatees would in effect overcompensate them. Consequently, it has been held that severance payments made by an employer to discriminatees during the backpay period should be deducted from the amount of gross backpay awarded. Fibreboard Paper Products Corp., 180 NLRB 142 (1969), enfd. sub nom. United Steel Workers of America v. NLRB, 436 F.2d 908 (D.C. Cir. 1971).

The General Counsel calls attention to the Board's failure to make such a deduction in a later case, Laidlaw Corp., 207 NLRB 591 (1973), enfd. 507 F.2d 1381 (7th Cir. 1974), cert. denied 422 U.S. 1042 (1975). However, I do not believe that case is applicable to the instant situation. The severance payments made in Laidlaw were not made during the backpay period and did not overlap the backpay award. The language employed in the decision clearly indicated that the award of backpay, by itself, was the compensation for the loss suffered by the discriminatees and that the severance payment was voluntarily made independently thereof only to certain of the employees on closing of a plant in Peru, Indiana, several years after the latest backpay period date of any of the claimants in the case. One event had nothing to do with the other.

In the present case, Respondent Marriott made the severance payments at the time the facility was closed (February 27) in lieu of pay for the first week of the backpay period, and they must therefore be deducted from backpay owing for the first quarter of 1981. See W. R. Grace & Co., 247 NLRB 698, 704 (1980).

The Respondents claim to be entitled to an offset against the backpay due to two of the claimants because they were erroneously paid vacation pay to which they were not entitled. This tribunal is asked to ensure that the claimants are not unjustly enriched, because they will have received payment for vacation pay in the gross backpay as calculated by the General Counsel. It is agreed that accrued vacation pay normally is includable in a backpay award. Richard W. Kaase Co., 162 NLRB 1320 (1967); Kartarik, Inc., 111 NLRB 630 (1955), enfd. 227 F.2d 190 (8th Cir. 1955).

The Respondents' rights to a setoff is questionable. Dolores Coe, Marriott's director of personnel, testified that an explicit decision was made not to stop payment on the checks when it was discovered that they had been erroneously mailed out. No effort was made prior to these proceedings to recover the sums paid out. The making of the payments was a deliberate act that entailed payroll deductions, such as taxes. The entitlement of any of the Respondents to a refund is therefore a matter for determination in a plenary proceeding specifically directed to that issue. The Respondents can not be given an offset in this proceeding, which is concerned with altogether different types of issues, but must seek restitution in a forum that has jurisdiction to determine the relative rights of the parties with regarding the money and consider equitable factors that might justify an order of restitution.

Accordingly, vacation pay will not be offset from any amounts owed as backpay.

C. The Backpay Cutoff Date

The Respondents contend that the backpay cutoff date for all eligible claimants was June 26, on which date Respondent Interstate sent out mailgrams offering them reinstatement. It is uncontroverted, however, that claimants returning to work as a result of the mailgram were to start on July 6. Accordingly, the backpay period is tolled only as of that date except in certain cases noted below in which a different cutoff date is mandated by the particular circumstances.

D. Failure to Seek and Accept Alternate Positions with Marriott

The joint answers interposed by the Respondents contain an affirmative defense claimed to be applicable to Angelo Bonomo and Malcolm Thomas, to the effect that discriminatees who were offered and failed to accept alternate positions by Marriott are ineligible for backpay, and another affirmative defense claimed to be applicable to them and to 13 other employees, to the effect that discriminatees who were offered positions by Interstate and failed to accept such positions, though they were without alternate employment, are ineligible for backpay. The Respondents introduced evidence that on February 24, two of Marriott's Washington-based officers, Dolores Coe, the personnel director, and James Davis, Marriott's manager of employee relations, visited the Continental cafeteria and dining room in New York City and advised the employees being laid off that they could file applications for employment at other Marriott facilities, and that Carol Kramer, general manager of the facilities at Continental, also advised employees that they could file applications at the other Marriott facilities. It seems clear that such a visitation was made, but most of the employees dispute the claim that they were invited to file applications at other facilities.

Despite the Respondents' attack on the credibility of the claimants, I believe the testimony of the 22 employees who testified that they were not advised that they could file applications for employment at other Marriott facilities. The credible evidence indicates that only 10 of the claimants were approached. The Respondents' own witnesses conceded that application forms were given to only 15 of the employees who had just been laid off, and it is not even claimed that any information was disseminated about locations where job openings existed. Rupert Cayenne and Ruth Lang testified that they made inquiries at other Marriott facilities and received negative and discouraging responses. The evidence clearly establishes that no effort was made to advise the claimants that they could apply at other Marriott facilities. On the contrary, Respondent Marriott's witnesses conceded that, as of February 27, there were no job openings at other Marriott facilities. Marriott application forms were available at the premises, but no attempt was made to distribute them among all or among any large number of the employees who were leaving. The letter of February 27 advising the backpay claimants of their termination makes no mention of any opportunity to file applications at other Marriott facilities, though the letter contains information about numerous other matters such as vacation benefits, medical and life insurance, and other employee fringe benefits.

The Respondents' contention founders in any event on the obvious fact that the communication to the few employees to whom anything was said did not constitute an unconditional offer of employment. At best, it was merely an invitation to a few employees to put in applications at other locations, with no assurance that jobs comparable to those from which they had just been laid off were available.

A final point that deserves consideration is the basic question whether employees who believed, as many of the employees in the present case certainly believed, that they had been discriminatorily and unfairly treated, were obligated to pursue the suggestion that the Respondents' claim was made to them that they apply for positions at other facilities operated by the Marriott organization. An employee is not obligated to attempt to return to work for the very same employer who has discriminatorily discharged him, or with an affiliated employer. In the present case, therefore, the reason the claimants think they were terminated is a relevant consideration. The Respondents never conceded that such discrimination existed, but it was the gravamen of the complaint against the Respondents that was settled by stipulation, and thus it is a given factor in this case that the employees believed they had been discriminatorily discharged. That circumstance may be considered, therefore, in evaluating the reasonableness of their efforts to find employment, and in a proper context may preclude a determination that efforts had not been reasonably diligent because they did not seek or accept positions with the former employer.

III. THE CLAIMANTS

A. Undisputed Claims

The Respondents concede the eligibility and correctness of amount owed for backpay of only 12 of the 44 claimants referred to in the backpay specification. These claimants are Phillip Deutsh, Alice Fox, Esther Gutnick, Geoffrey Hill, Jenny Irizarry, Anna Jankunis, Bridget McNamara, Octavio Parra, Blanca Schauer, Elenora Sukovich, Gregory Taylor, and Maria Unterreiner. This concession is subject to the Respondents' general contention respecting the deductibility of severance pay received by all the claimants at the time of their termination, with which I concur and, in the case of Parra, subject to such adjustments as may be required by coordination of medical benefits with other private and governmental coverages (the basic backpay being conceded). As is shown in Appendix A hereto, I have made allowance for their receipt of severance pay in my calculation of the backpay to which they are entitled. Parra's claim for medical benefits is discussed separately below.

B. Claimants Who Did Not Appear at the Hearing

The Respondents contend that four claimants who did not appear at the hearing and did not testify (Lewis Barbee, Ermine Blades, Betty McPherson, and George Whitehead) are not entitled to be paid because their eligibility cannot be determined. Request was made in Respondents' posthearing brief that the administrative law judge retain jurisdiction for 1 year so that the record could be reopened on proper application.

It suffices that a backpay specification was filed, as is indicated by authorities previously cited. The claimants' failure to appear cannot automatically be deemed to suggest some fault or lack of credibility or reliability on their part or some lack of merit to their claims. The burden is on the Respondents, who have possession of the payroll records and had recourse to subpoenas to compel the attendance at the hearing of any claimants whom they wished to examine (a right of which they availed themselves when it suited them in the case of at least one other claimant), to show any respect in which the specifications were incorrect or inaccurate. No showing having been made that the specification fails to set forth the proper amount owning to these four claimants, their claims must be allowed as alleged in the specification.

The Respondents never lose the burden of proving that a claimant willfully incurred loss of earnings during the backpay period. They have sustained that burden only insofar as they have demonstrated that all four of the claimants received severance pay. However, since the Respondents have not had the opportunity to examine the claimants respecting interim earnings, the amount of gross backpay as reduced by the amount of the severance payments, as indicated in Appendix A, will be paid to the Regional Director to be held by him in escrow for a period of 1 year from the date of the Order. During that time, the Regional Director will arrange for the Respondents to conduct their examinations of the claimants, if the Respondents so desire, and afford them an opportunity to present other witnesses and other relevant evidence with respect to the amount of backpay due to the claimants. The General Counsel shall be represented at any such examinations or presentations. The Regional Director will determine whether any deductions should be made from the amount of claimants' gross backpay by reason of interim earnings or otherwise, returning all sums so deducted to the Respondents and making payment of the net backpay to the claimants. The Regional Director shall report the status of the matter to the Board on its conclusion.

Accordingly, the claimants, Lewis Barbee, Ermine Blades, Betty McPherson, and George Whitehead are awarded the amount of backpay alleged in the specification, less the amounts received by them as severance pay, as detailed in Appendix A hereto.

C. Contested Claims

1. Eric Allen

The specification alleges that Allen, who worked as an assistant cook, earned $5.10 per hour or $204 per week. A total of $3632 backpay is claimed for the period from February 27 to July 6, when he resumed work with Interstate. Respondents' objection to such payment is that Allen did not make a reasonable effort to obtain employment. The Respondents' contention is based on Allen's own testimony respecting his efforts to find employment, which are asserted to be not credible. To the extent that it is credible, Respondents argue that it shows that his efforts to obtain interim employment were inadequate because the claimant did not apply to employment agencies, did not seek work with any other food service contractor, and applied for a job as an electrician for which he was patently unqualified. Respondent explains the failure of the claimant to furnish information showing attempts to obtain employment on a form supplied by the Board, but as a general matter, I did not consider failure to list efforts to find employment on the Board forms as necessarily requiring that the claimant's testimony regarding such efforts be discredited, especially when the testimony regarding such efforts is clear and specific and remains unimpaired after cross-examination. See Crazy Horse Saloon, JD-621-81, slip op. at 21, 22.

Allen testified that he is illiterate, but that advertisements were read to him from the newspapers three or four times a week by his cousin. I do not credit his testimony. Allen could not say why three or four times a week was the appropriate number of times to check the newspaper, and later changed his testimony to assert that the advertisements were read to him five or six times a week. His testimony that he could not remember the name of his cousin, who supposedly read the newspapers to him so frequently, placed a near fatal strain on his credibility.

There is no requirement, however, that a backpay claimant seek the precise type of work in which he had engaged prior to his termination. Allen's failure to seek work with other food service contractors and his going for an interview for a job as an electrician does not disqualify him for the simple reason that his main reliance was on the placement service at the Unemployment Insurance Office to assist him in obtaining employment. It is that office that referred him for an electrician's position. He filed for and collected unemployment insurance until he was hired by Interstate. He was counseled by the Unemployment Insurance Office twice a week. Moreover, the evidence indicates that the Unemployment Insurance Office referred Allen for a cook's position and for one other position and that Allen, on his own, applied for a job as an auto mechanic at a company where his cousin was employed.

I am convinced from listening to the testimony and observing the demeanor of this witness that the witness made an effort to obtain employment that, in the light of all of his personal circumstances, was a reasonably sufficient effort. It consisted mainly of going to the Unemployment Insurance Office and going out on the job interviews with the prospective employers to whom they referred him. When an offering occurred at Interstate, he took the job.

I find that Allen made reasonable and diligent efforts to obtain work. No issue was raised with respect to the calculation in the specification of the backpay due him and I accordingly find him entitled to the amounts alleged, less severance pay that he received in the amount of $204. I have deducted that amount from his gross backpay owing for the first quarter and find him entitled to net backpay in the amount of $3468, as set forth in Appendix A.

2. Joseph Autry

Interim second quarter earnings as a pot washer in the amount of $400 reduced Joseph Autry's backpay specification to $2211 for the period February 27 to July 6. The Respondents suggest that Autry's attempt to find employment with a company for which he had formerly worked as a security guard, and which terminated him for being out of uniform, did not constitute a diligent effort to find employment. However, it may be argued with equal force that an employee who attempts to find work even with an employer who has once before discharged him is making an unusually diligent effort to find employment.

The Respondents are also critical because Autry admitted that the only newspaper advertisements he looked for were for security jobs and he did not look for another job as a pot washer. Autry testified that he considered his experience at Marriott to be bad since his employment there lasted only a few months, and that he looked for work as a security guard because he had several years of experience in that area. The law does not require an employee to limit himself to the lowest possible pay scale when he is looking for work or accept any work regardless of how menial. He is required to seek employment within the broad overall range of his experience and capabilities. The question, therefore, is whether Autry's efforts to find a job were reasonably diligent in the light of all the circumstances. His failure to look for a job as a pot washer does not mean that he could not have made a diligent search for some other type of employment.

Much more serious is Autry's concession that one of the Marriott supervisors advised him to transfer before the layoff occurred, but he made no effort to find employment at any other Marriott hotel or restaurant. He did not suggest any reason for his failure to do so that even remotely hinted at any desire to avoid a discriminatory employer. Furthermore, he gave an altogether unsatisfactory explanation of his failure to apply for unemployment insurance benefits. Though he was advised by Marriott personnel how to do so, he did not file for unemployment insurance benefits because, he said, he wanted to use his time to look for a job. I cannot believe that. (Strangely, the Respondents purported to believe him, asserting in their posthearing brief that "the reason he did not file was due to a previous experience wherein he was denied benefits.") The testimony of the claimant that he did not file leads me to believe that he did not make a reasonable effort to find employment. His testimony respecting his efforts to find work was totally incredible. He testified that he and a coworker named Whitehead went together to look for work and that he saw Whitehead every day because he lived in the same apartment as Whitehead throughout the backpay period, and Whitehead was also unemployed. The evidence indicates, however, that Whitehead was employed and that his total backpay entitlement amounted to only $86. It seems almost superfluous to note that Whitehead did not testify in this proceeding.

(The glaring inconsistency between Autry's testimony and the Whitehead backpay specification placed the burden on the General Counsel to call Whitehead as a witness. His failure to do so can only give rise to an inference that Whitehead's testimony would not have supported that of Autry.)

My grave reservations regarding Autry's credibility prevent me from crediting his account of efforts to find work as a security guard at five companies that he named and his testimony respecting his efforts to obtain work as a shipping clerk at Alexander's Department Store.

Accordingly, I find that Joseph Autry failed to make a reasonable effort to find employment during the backpay period and is not eligible for backpay.

3. George Bacote

George Bacote was alleged to be due backpay in the amount of $1743 for the period February 27 to July 14.

After being laid off, Bacote spent 7 or 8 months in New Haven, Connecticut. He did not apply for unemployment insurance benefits. After taking a few weeks off and living on money that he had saved, he confined his efforts to find work to visits to an employment agency specializing in temporary jobs. He showed up there at 6 a.m. three or four times a week. It was not until after the end of the backpay period that he became interested in looking for employment of a permanent nature.

The Respondents contend that they should not be compelled to support the lifestyle of a person whose ambitions are limited to a series of temporary jobs.

The legal requirement is not that a backpay claimant seek a permanent job, but that he make reasonable efforts to secure employment and mitigate the damages caused by his wrongful termination. The question in this instance is whether the claimant's search for a succession of temporary jobs amounts to the same thing as looking for one job with a single employer and therefore constitutes a reasonable attempt to mitigate the loss by obtaining interim employment.

There is good reason to answer in the negative. Implicit in solicitation of employment through a temporary agency is the prospect that whatever employment is obtained will come to a relatively speedy end, resulting in a renewed period of unemployment. Thus, solicitation only of temporary employment must be viewed as incurring a willful loss. The evidence is clear that Bacote only worked when the agency sent him out and as a result there were weeks when he did not work at all.

This type of situation has nothing to do with the kind of situation in which a backpay claimant's prior experience in job hunting and his work capacities severely limit the type of job hunting of which he is capable. It is possible to agree with the General Counsel's argument that, in judging the reasonableness of the claimant's efforts to obtain interim employment, we take him as we find him and judge his efforts in the light of his background and capabilities, while at the same time taking due cognizance of this claimant's testimony that it was only after the backpay period expired that he searched for permanent employment. If he is credible, then he had the capacity and should have hunted for permanent employment during the backpay period, and his failure to do so was a willful failure to mitigate the loss. His later conduct illuminated his conduct during the backpay period, and should not be overlooked. Big Three Industrial Gas & Equipment Co., 263 NLRB 1189 (1982).

Accordingly, I find that Bacote is not eligible for backpay. I have made a similar finding on somewhat similar circumstances in the case of Malcolm Thomas, below.

4. Marie Bellisi

The backpay specification for Marie Bellisi indicates net backpay owing in the amount of $1144, a reduction having been made for interim earnings in the second and third quarters of 1981. The Respondents point to an apparent error regarding her statement of interim earnings for the week of June 5, 1981, and submit that the General Counsel failed to meet the burden of proof.

The claimant obtained interim employment at a fixed salary of $160 per week, but the amount listed for interim earnings for the week ending June 5, 1981, was only $128. Her paycheck stub so indicated. The Respondent contends that she should be chargeable for the fixed salary of $160. The claimant testified that she did not recall the reason for the reduction in salary that week. She did not recall having been out sick and was unable to furnish any other explanation. This failure is not chargeable against her, however, but against the Respondents. The burden is on them to come forward with proof of lack of diligence on her part in reducing the loss. It should not have been difficult to establish the reason for the reduced pay in that 1 week, inasmuch as the Respondent Interstate was her Employer and had the pertinent records.

The claimant, on the other hand, worked the week before and the week after the week in question, as well as during the week in question. She cannot be said to have made no reasonable effort to mitigate the Respondents' damages.

Accordingly, the General Counsel was correct in computing her interim earnings for that week at $128, the amount that she actually earned and by which Respondents' backpay liability is mitigated.

The law requires that interim earnings be deducted from the gross amount of backpay and that the backpay claimant receive the net backpay after such deductions. That is precisely what the General Counsel has computed in this instance. I have made a further deduction of the amount of $184 paid to her as severance pay.

Accordingly, I find that Marie Bellisi is entitled to net backpay in the amount of $960, as set forth in Appendix A.

5. Angelo Bonomo

The backpay specification respecting Angelo Bonomo, who was employed as chief chef in the Continental facility, calls for payment of $5779 net backpay for the first and second quarters of 1981. There were no interim earnings during this period. At the hearing the General Counsel moved to amend the backpay specification to include an additional $336, vacation pay accrued during this period, bringing the total net backpay requested to the sum of $6115. The Respondents contest any backpay award to this claimant on the ground that he had clearly indicated his intention to retire, and consistently therewith, had refused to submit an application for employment at any other Marriott facility though invited to do so. Three Marriott officials and a former coworker testified with respect to statements he made respecting his intention to retire and the Respondents emphasize Bonomo's complete failure to work since he was laid off by Marriott. Nevertheless, the Respondents, despite their contention that Bonomo retired, introduced evidence that when he was offered reinstatement by Interstate as of June 29 he rejected the offer, but said that he would be available on his return from vacation in September. He received social security benefits and union pension payments, but also collected unemployment insurance benefits.

Bonomo testified that he visited the employment office of Local 302, that he visited a private employment agency, and that he went to the New York State Employment Referral Service four or five times a week. In addition, he applied for and collected unemployment insurance. He reviewed the advertisements in the New York Times. I found Bonomo's testimony credible.

The fact that Bonomo was collecting social security benefits and payments from a union pension fund, and therefore had other income, does not automatically mean that he had elected to rely exclusively on that income. His acceptance of those benefits is not necessarily inconsistent with a desire on his part to obtain employment and does not contradict his testimony regarding his attempts to find it. Because I credit Bonomo's testimony that he made the attempts that he described to find employment, the fact that he did not in fact return to work is not persuasive. The Respondents cite Big Three Industrial Gas & Equipment Co., 263 NLRB 1189 (1982), that holds that conduct after the close of the backpay period is not dispositive regarding the question of whether a backpay claimant has taken himself out of the labor market at an earlier point, thus indicating that to a degree an examination of such conduct may be pertinent. It is significant, however, only if there is some evidence tending to show a lack of serious interest in employment before the close of the backpay period. No such showing is made with respect to Bonomo. True, when he declined employment by Interstate he said he was taking a vacation; however, while that might bring into question his availability at that time and during some period (undefined in length) immediately preceding, it affords no warrant for wholesale speculation and it must be remembered that the offer from Interstate was not made until June 26, making for a backpay period much too long to support the kind of speculation in which the Respondents seek to indulge.

The Respondents properly raised the question; the burden remains on them, however, to come forward with proof (not speculation). The testimony of Bernice Jackson that she offered Bonomo employment did not help them in that regard. She was unable to fix the time when she made the offer, except to say that she made the offer between the months of May and July. Even at that, the offer was only for "an occasional cook's job" which is an altogether inadequate offer. It suffers from precisely the same deficiency that caused the Respondents to urge that backpay be denied to those claimants who only sought temporary work through temporary employment agencies.

Bonomo testified that he was on jury duty from late June (he said June 27, which was a Saturday) to July 14 and spoke to the Interstate manager the following Monday. The manager told him to come into work the next day, but Bonomo replied that he was taking the month of August as his vacation and could not come in until September. He patently was unavailable for work from June 29 onward.

I find that from February 27 to June 29, Bonomo was available to work and is entitled to backpay for that period, reduced by severance pay that he received in the amount of $336 and augmented by a like amount for accrued vacation pay. Having rejected a specific offer of permanent employment by Interstate on June 29, however, Bonomo cannot collect for the period after that date.

Accordingly, I find that Angelo Bonomo is entitled to backpay for the period from February 27 to June 29, in the amount of $5779, as set forth in Appendix A.

6. Rupert Cayenne

Backpay in the sum of $3876 was claimed by Rupert Cayenne for the first three quarters of 1981. He resumed work on July 6, 1981, after receiving an offer of reinstatement from Interstate. The Respondents contest his entitlement to backpay on the ground that he did not make credible efforts to obtain interim employment. Respondents specifically note Cayenne's testimony that he did not recall being invited to file an application for employment at any other Marriott facility. This is not a valid objection because even had he been told to file at another Marriott facility, his failure to do so would not by itself have disqualified him from receiving backpay. The issue is whether he made a reasonable effort to obtain other employment. In fact, Cayenne testified that he was told by Carol Kramer that he would not be employed in any other position with Marriott.

The Respondents also cite Cayenne's work stoppage in the last week, when he refused to work, until he was advised whether employees would be paid all moneys due them on their last day of work. I think that is irrelevant to the issue.

Cayenne testified that he was employed as a chef at a salary of $240 per week and had worked for Marriott for approximately 5 years. During the period from February 27 to July 6, 1981, he attempted to find employment. He applied first to a few of the airlines at Kennedy Airport. He specifically named Delta and North West, where he said he put in applications approximately 2 or 3 weeks after he was laid off and was told that he would be called if they needed him. He also went to Skychef.

The manager of Skychef called him in for an interview and told him that if he was needed they would call him. As a matter of fact, they did call him, 2 weeks before he was called back to work by Interstate, but by that time he was working in a factory.

Cayenne testified that he also put in applications at several hospitals, and named several of them. He put in an application at an employment agency where he applied for any type of job that he thought he could get and he either visited or telephoned the agency every week. In addition, he filed an application with the placement division of the New York State Unemployment Insurance Division, where he was advised that there were no openings. He followed the ads in the New York Daily News and the New York Post every day. Friends and relatives assisted him in the job hunt. Two weeks before Interstate called him back, a friend finally got him a job with a paper company as a machine assistant at $5.50 per hour for a 40-hour week.

The Respondents seek to impale Cayenne on his own testimony that experienced chefs like himself do not have difficulty finding work in the restaurant industry. This flies in the face of Cayenne's testimony respecting his unsuccessful efforts to obtain interim employment. Even if generalities such as this straw grasped by the Respondents might otherwise be helpful in weighing the facts, the credible testimony of Cayenne regarding the specific efforts made by him would always, and in this instance does, outweigh it.

I credit Cayenne's testimony that he was always available to work during the period from February 27 to June 26. He appears to have made a reasonable effort to obtain employment and, accordingly, I find him eligible for backpay. In my calculation of the amount of backpay owing, I find that he received severance pay in the amount of $240 that must be deducted from his gross backpay for the first quarter and I do not interpret the testimony as requiring deduction of 2 weeks' interim earnings from the gross backpay for the second quarter. Cayenne's testimony was that he was available through June 26. He worked on the interim job during the week of June 29 to July 3. (He testified that his friend got him the job 2 weeks before he resumed work with Interstate, not that he worked for those 2 weeks.) His interim earnings thus amounted to $220 for .4 weeks in the second quarter and .6 weeks in the third quarter. I therefore calculate Cayenne's net backpay at $4100 as set forth in Appendix A.

7. Bertha DePalma

The backpay specification in the amount of $2112 for Bertha DePalma covers the first two quarters of 1981 and the first 2 weeks of the third quarter, and is based on a weekly salary of $114. At the hearing, the specification was amended to allege average weekly earnings of $142.50 prior to termination and net backpay of $2,764.50. She had been a waitress at the Continental facility since April 1979, earning an hourly wage of $5.70. The number of hours that she worked each week varied.

The Respondents dispute her eligibility because she rejected a position with Marriott, and assert that if she is eligible the cutoff date should be not later than June 29.

DePalma conceded that she asked Carol Kramer about another job and Kramer offered her a job at the Marriott facility at the Pfizer facility. DePalma felt that the location was unsuitable because it was uptown around 47th Street in Manhattan. She lives in Staten Island. She did not feel that she could travel that far by ferry and bus on the salary that was being offered. She was used to coming to work by ferry and bus to downtown Manhattan and did not like the idea of having to ride the subway uptown. Because of the travel factor, she turned down the job.

DePalma's rejection of employment in midtown Manhattan is not, by itself, reason to disqualify her from receiving backpay. The test is whether she actively sought employment. She testified credibly that she did. She registered for and collected unemployment insurance benefits. She read the want ads in the New York Daily News and Staten Island Advance every day and answered several advertisements (she did not take the jobs advertised only because they required night or weekend work and she wanted to continue working normal daytime hours as she had done at the Continental facility). She contacted several brokerage firms in New York City. She applied at several restaurants in Staten Island. She made inquiry of a friend who was a dining room supervisor at Chase Manhattan Bank.

DePalma's testimony respecting her reluctance to use the subways and her desire to continue the mode of work that she had known up to that point is reasonable and credible. If downtown Manhattan was an area in which restaurants were few and restaurant work scarce, it might be argued that she was under some obligation to consider job openings in nearby areas easily reached by public transportation. However, restaurants are plentiful in lower Manhattan and DePalma did, in fact, subsequently obtain employment there with Interstate. She responded immediately to Gerstein's June 26 mailgram and came in for an interview with him. Under the circumstances, I find that DePalma's efforts to find employment were reasonable and sufficient to entitle her to backpay for the period.

In her interview with Gerstein, he authorized her to return to work on July 13, 1981, instead of July 6 because she was caring for her grandchildren while her daughter-in-law was in the hospital. She testified that she had made a commitment to take care of her grandchildren during the week of July 6, pursuant to plans that had been made in late June and early July. When she was offered a position by Interstate, to start July 6, she requested and received permission to start on July 13 instead. The Respondents contend that in view of that circumstance the proper cutoff date for backpay is June 29, arguing that her unreadiness to resume work on the date requested makes it highly unlikely that she was looking for work the week of June 29. They assert she could not have been looking if she had a commitment for the week of July 6.

The Respondents' argument runs afoul of the fact Gerstein did not offer DePalma work for the week of June 29, and thus their assumption that she could not have been looking for work fails to take into account the possibility that had Gerstein asked her to work the week of June 29, she might have agreed, while still arranging to take the following week off. The latter speculation is sounder than that of the Respondents.

Furthermore, it is well settled that a reasonably diligent effort to find interim employment does not require that the search be conducted in each and every week of the backpay period, but only that a reasonably diligent effort be conducted over the course of the entire backpay period. That is what was proved to have been done in DePalma's case.

The General Counsel agreed that DePalma's backpay period should be tolled as of July 5, instead of July 12, by reason of her unavailability during the week of July 6, and amended the backpay claim to $2622 instead of $2,764.50, deducting $142.50 for that week.

I have reached a different result for the amount of the backpay owing to the claimant. I have calculated DePalma's backpay at $142.50 per week for the 4.4 weeks of the first quarter, the 13 weeks of the second quarter, and .6 weeks of the third quarter, and have deducted the amount of severance pay received by her from her backpay for the first quarter. This has yielded a final net backpay figure of $2,416.80, as elucidated in Appendix A.

8–9. Louise Fuller and Celia Hassett

Louise Fuller and Celia Hassett were part-time waitresses who were employed solely in connection with special functions held in the Continental facility's Monroe Room. They worked an extremely limited schedule.

I am satisfied that the evidence establishes that both of them made reasonably diligent efforts to find employment as part-time party waitresses comparable to that which they had had prior to the layoffs.

The Respondents characterize the testimony of these claimants respecting their efforts to obtain employment as vague, generalized, and uncorroborated. Listening to the claimants at the hearing, I heard them testify to various efforts that they made to obtain employment, including following ads in the newspapers and making visits to various prospective employers. Fuller listed a number of such employers, identified the newspapers in which she followed ads, and testified that she sought assistance from friends in finding employment and kept in touch with Marriott. She collected unemployment insurance during this period and reported regularly to the New York State Placement Service.

Hassett's testimony was similar. She named employers from whom she sought employment, followed the newspapers, and reported to the New York State Placement Service after registering for unemployment insurance benefits. Both claimants returned to work when they were called back. I found the testimony of the two claimants sufficiently specific and detailed to merit credibility in all particulars.

The real issue with respect to these claimants pertains to the computation of the amount of their backpay. The General Counsel has computed the sum of $2268 to be owing to Louise Fuller and the sum of $2916 to be owing to Celia Hassett. His calculation assumes that they would have worked the normal weekly hours that they had worked previously. In fact, however, they both would have worked considerably fewer hours. It is altogether unnecessary to speculate or make assumptions respecting this question, for the Respondents introduced into evidence a listing of the functions held in the Monroe Room from March 2 through October 30, 1981. The records establish precisely the number of hours Fuller and Hassett would have worked. Ironically, in this instance, the General Counsel and the Respondents adopted the reverse of the positions they argued in the case of Marie Bellisi, when the Respondents wanted to speculate that she really earned her normal salary while the General Counsel rested on the actual paycheck stub.

The General Counsel further urges, in his posthearing brief, that the information regarding the actual number of functions held at which these two waitresses would have worked ought to be excluded from evidence because they were not alleged in either the Respondents' original answer or in their first amended answer. The argument that the Respondents are required to set forth in their answer with specificity the basis on which they contend that the backpay should be calculated differently than as set forth in the specification is true generally but is not applicable in these circumstances. The purpose of that requirement is to place on the Respondents the burden of showing any respect in which an error is claimed to exist and to prevent surprise to the General Counsel. When evidence is introduced by the Respondents that shows the existence of an error in the specification and shows in what respect an error exists, and goes further to establish incontrovertibly the true facts of the case, there is no justification for excluding such evidence. The Respondents have met precisely the burden that is placed on them by the rules that govern the procedure in backpay cases.

The General Counsel does not complain of surprise. There is no respect in which the backpay claimants can legitimately complain that they have been prejudiced by the introduction into evidence of the actual history of the dining room during the pertinent backpay period, which fixes the maximum number of hours they could possibly have worked there. With the actual facts available, it would be unconscionable to hold that backpay should nevertheless be based on the average earnings of the claimants during the period prior to the layoffs, for that would entail conscious and deliberate speculation regarding something whose history is already fully known (and which contradicts the proposed speculation). I not only refuse to speculate when I have the actual facts before me, but I reject the General Counsel's contention that the Respondents' argument is "speculative"; I cannot see how proven facts can be deemed a matter of conjecture. I also decline to speculate, as the General Counsel urges, that Fuller and Hassett might have requested and been granted additional work to fill in as executive dining room waitresses. There is not a shred of evidence to support that argument, which is literally couched in speculative terms, and the evidence of the claimants as to the type of interim employment they looked for makes it clear that, if anything is probable, it is that they would not have sought to augment their working hours.

In any event, though the Respondents' answer and first amended answer did not deny the correctness of the formula used to compute gross backpay, the second amended answer alleged that the number of shifts the claimants would have worked had they continued in Marriott's employ during the backpay period (a fact that is known precisely because the number of functions is known) should be the basis of the computation. That was sufficient compliance with the pleading requirements, for it clearly put the General Counsel on notice that the Respondents expected to introduce the history of the dining room and argue that the claimants' backpay should be calculated on the basis of it.

The Respondents introduced evidence to the effect that 29 functions were held in the Monroe Room on various dates during the backpay period: on six dates in March, 3 dates in April, 5 dates in May, 5 dates in June, 6 dates in July, 3 dates in August, and 1 date in September. The claimants' maximum earnings can thus be calculated. Each would have worked a maximum of 6 hours. Fuller would have earned a maximum in the entire period of $1,017.90 ($5.85 x 6 x 29) and Hassett would have earned a maximum of $1131 ($6.50 x 6 x 29). For the purpose of fixing the backpay award, I assume (or speculate) that they each would have worked all 29 functions. That speculation is permissible because it involves clearly defined limits, and in backpay proceedings doubts are resolved in favor of the claimants.

Hassett and Fuller each received severance payments for which due allowance has been made. As is set forth in Appendix A, I have calculated Fuller's net backpay in the amount of $900.90 and Hassett's net backpay in the amount of $1001.

10. Gerald Furby

The Respondent objects to the specification filed on behalf of Gerald Furby for net backpay in the amount of $2448 for the period from February 27 to July 6, the date when he was reinstated by Interstate, on the ground that the claimant's testimony as to his efforts to find employment are contradicted by the recitation of extremely limited efforts set forth in a statement that he signed on August 3, 1981. The Respondents offer no evidence that would indicate a good reason to discount Furby's testimony other than the paucity of information contained in the written statement of claim. They assert that "Furby's testimony bears a remarkable resemblance to the litany of efforts to obtain employment testified to by most of General Counsel's witnesses." I see nothing remarkable about it: there are just so many ways in which an unemployed person can seek employment and the backpay claimants in this case inevitably had recourse to similar means of looking for a job, including interviews with prospective employers, applications to the New York State Placement Service, scrutiny of newspaper ads, and followup of leads furnished by relatives and friends. Written statements furnished by the claimants on various occasions, such as interviews by Board investigators, are not necessarily more accurate accounts of their efforts to find employment than their testimony. Their testimony under oath, subject to cross-examination, and under controlled conditions is much more dependable. Respondents' disappointment in their failure to elicit retractions on cross-examination does not justify doubts about the veracity of the claimants based solely on the meager contents of their earlier statements, which were obviously prepared by the claimants, persons unaccustomed to preparing such documents, with scant regard to their ultimate importance in these proceedings.

I find that Gerald Furby made reasonable efforts to find employment during the backpay period. Deducting severance pay in the amount of $136, I calculate his backpay at the sum of $2312 as set forth in Appendix A.

11. Nicholas Graham

Graham was unemployed for 5.2 weeks in the first and second quarters of 1981 (February 27 to April 7). The backpay specification alleges a sum owing in the amount of $832 with interest. There were no interim earnings. The Respondents contend that because he concededly collected unemployment insurance benefits during this period, the amount he received should be deducted from the backpay, along with severance pay which he received. By their calculation, he sustained no loss of earnings and therefore is entitled to nothing, since he testified he received unemployment insurance benefits till he returned to work.

The claimant testified initially that he collected benefits for 1 week; he later stated he collected them until he returned to work. His testimony is not inconsistent. Because collection of benefits must await expiration of a 2-week waiting period, he patently was referring to the circumstance that he collected benefits for 1 week, which was the week before he returned to work. In any event, unemployment insurance benefits are not an offset against gross backpay. However, severance pay that claimant received in the amount of $160 is an offset and brings net backpay to the sum of $672, as set forth in Appendix A.

12. Curtis Hailey

The net backpay alleged in the specification for Curtis Hailey for the period from February 27 to July 6 is $2408, allowing for interim earnings in the second quarter in the amount of $400. Hailey earned $156 per week at Continental as a cook's helper. He testified that he sought employment during the backpay period with various restaurants, with a drycleaning establishment, and with a security guard company, followed up newspaper advertisements and leads from friends, and registered for unemployment insurance benefits.

The Respondents pointed out a number of specific circumstances testified to by Hailey himself as casting doubt on the sincerity of his attempts to seek employment. The Respondents contend that he should therefore be found ineligible for backpay. However, in each case Hailey offered specific and detailed explanations of what had occurred.

For example, though Hailey applied for unemployment insurance benefits, he was disqualified from receiving them because he failed to appear on one of his reporting dates (May 20). He testified that he failed to report because he had been ill on that day, and that the failure was not excused because he could not cope with the agency's procedure for removing the default (he was asked to fill out certain forms, but he did not do so because he could not understand what was required of him). This certainly is enough to arouse suspicion, but closer examination of all the circumstances discloses that Hailey did collect unemployment insurance for about a month and a half up to the date when he missed making his report. He had started collecting in the second week in March, and testified without contradiction that he reported to the unemployment insurance office on two earlier occasions when he was supposed to report.

Another questionable circumstance for which he made a satisfactory explanation was his rejection of a job as a dishwasher 3 or 4 weeks after he filed for unemployment insurance benefits. He told the interviewer he was looking for a job as a cook's helper. While he was at the Unemployment Insurance Placement Office the placement worker telephoned the prospective employer and was advised that there was an opening for a dishwasher, and asked him if he wanted the job. He declined it. He wanted to try to stay a cook's helper. This is credible in light of his testimony that he filled out applications and sought employment in restaurants as a cook's helper. I do not believe that Hailey's credibility is diminished by the fact that he accepted temporary employment as a carpenter's helper, assisting the owner of the house in building an extra room. He worked from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. 5 days a week for 4 weeks and earned $100 per week, clearly proving his willingness to work if worthwhile work was available.

The fact that he did not respond to the mailgram offering him reinstatement is cited as a refusal on his part to accept work. He testified that he ignored the mailgram because he never actually read it. I find no difficulty in believing, on the basis of all his testimony, that had he understood the mailgram he would have reported. That certainly was his reaction when he received a telephone call instructing him to report for work. This objection by the Respondents ignores the claimant's testimony that friends furnished leads and that the lead to the construction work came from his brother. I attach no significance to Hailey's failure to contact Local 6. He is required to have made a reasonable effort to obtain interim employment; that does not mean he must be penalized for having overlooked some possibility that has occurred to the Respondents' lawyers.

The fact that the construction work started shortly after May 20 has prompted the Respondents, in their posthearing brief, to speculate that Hailey missed his reporting date at the Unemployment Insurance Office because he was already working, and that the period of interim employment is therefore longer than he admits. However, no affirmative proof was presented, such as testimony from the owner of the house. Backpay cannot be reduced on the basis of speculation.

The questions that the Respondents raise respecting the claimant's testimony are not unreasonable, but in each instance that they cited, the claimant provided an explanation plausible enough to entitle his overall testimony that he attempted to find other work to be credited. Again, it is to be noted that doubts are required to be resolved in favor of the claimant in a backpay proceeding.

I credit the claimant's testimony that he looked for work. In fact, he found work and when he did, he worked a full working day, 5 days a week, for an entire month. The fact that there is no testimony that he spoke to friends or relatives or contacted Local 6, a point argued in the Respondents' posthearing brief, does not eradicate the substantial evidence of the efforts that he did make to find work.

Accordingly, allowing for the severance pay that he received in the amount of $156, and his interim earnings in the amount of $400 in the second quarter, I find him entitled to backpay in the amount of $2252 as set forth in Appendix A.

13. Eddie Hall

The backpay specification for Eddie Hall is $2332, for a period covering 13.4 weeks, from February 27 to June 3, at $175 per week. Though Hall obtained employment before receiving an offer of reinstatement, the Respondents contend that he failed to make diligent efforts to obtain interim employment. Their position is based entirely on the manner in which Hall testified. The Respondents point out that initially Hall testified to efforts that he made during the month of March, and those seemed to be the only efforts that he made; after what the Respondents characterize as prompting by the General Counsel, he testified to efforts made subsequently.

I did not have the impression, while listening to this claimant, that his testimony was the result of prompting, nor did I find it incredible that he did not succeed in obtaining employment by following newspaper advertisements. I credit his explanation that he was not qualified for many of the positions advertised.

During the backpay period, he signed up to take several civil service examinations. He took and passed the Post Office examination but was not called for a position. The Respondents' argument, that Hall failed to go after certain jobs that appeared to offer only minimum wages, ignores Hall's very credible explanation that these particular employers were looking for people just coming out of school who would be willing to work for the minimum wage. There was no point to his taking a job that paid a salary below what he needed to live, and the law does not require acceptance of employment on a level lower than that from which he was discriminatively discharged.

Accordingly, allowing for $160 severance pay that Hall received, I calculate his net backpay at $2172 as set forth in Appendix A.

14. Elaine Hickey

The backpay specification for Elaine Hickey indicated net backpay owing in the amount of $1857 for the first and second quarters of 1981, from February 27 to June 29, based on her weekly salary of $108. This was amended at the hearing to reflect a cutback of the period to May 8, 1981, and a reduction of net backpay to $1555. However, as a result of her testimony, the General Counsel has moved to amend the backpay specification, again, this time to toll backpay as of July 20 and to reflect a reduction in the amount of 1 week's pay for a week in which she was on vacation. Net backpay owing is therefore asserted to in the amount of $2052. The Respondents, however, contend that Hickey made no diligent effort to attempt to seek employment and therefore is ineligible, because she limited her search to Staten Island. Respondents point out that the unemployment insurance benefits that she was receiving, plus savings on carfare that resulted from her not coming into Manhattan, were almost equivalent to the amount of her former salary. They contend that this proves she had a motivation not to work. They hypothesize that she must have been unwilling to go job hunting in the brisk March weather after returning from a week's vacation in sunny Puerto Rico. Finally, they assert that the mere fact that she was eligible for unemployment insurance benefits does not establish that she made diligent efforts to find employment.

The Respondents' argument wholly ignores the actual evidence that is in the record and that they have failed to rebut. The fact that Hickey limited her job hunt to Staten Island and thus eliminated prospects for employment in other boroughs, chiefly Manhattan, does not mean that she did not conduct a diligent search in Staten Island. The mere fact that unemployment insurance payments that she received almost equaled her income when she worked does not negate the claimant's sworn (and credible) testimony respecting efforts that she made to find a job. The Respondents' skepticism cannot take the place of evidence. The Respondents' assertion of the obvious, that it is colder in New York in March than it is in sunny Puerto Rico, similarly proves nothing. Finally, the General Counsel did not rely on the fact that the claimant received unemployment insurance benefits but on her testimony as to actual efforts made by her to find a job.

Hickey testified that she applied to numerous restaurants on Staten Island and to a diner in Brooklyn; she applied for sales positions on two occasions at May's Department Store and at a clothing store on Staten Island; she filed an application with a private employment agency in Staten Island; she followed the want ads in a Staten Island newspaper, which furnished her leads to the opportunities at May's, at the clothing store, and at one of the restaurants. She reported to the unemployment insurance office weekly except for 1 week at the end of March when she went to Puerto Rico. When she was offered reinstatement by Interstate, she accepted and was reinstated as of July 20, 1981.

On this evidence I find that the backpay claimant made reasonable efforts to find employment and is entitled to backpay for 3.4 weeks in the first quarter, 13 weeks in the second quarter, and 2.6 weeks in the third quarter, with the first quarter's backpay reduced by the severance payment that she received. I calculate net backpay in the amount of $1944 as set forth in Appendix A.

15. Ruth Lang

The backpay specification for Ruth Lang, in the amount of $2931, covers the period from February 27 to July 6, when she was reinstated by Interstate. The Respondents contest her eligibility for backpay on the ground that she did not make reasonable efforts to find employment during the backpay period.

I do not believe that Lang made any serious attempts to find employment, notwithstanding the fact that she collected unemployment insurance benefits. Lang failed to list places to which she applied for employment on her statement of backpay claim dated August 4, 1981. Her demeanor and testimony during the hearing were such as to compel me to reject her explanation of her failure to furnish the information. Notwithstanding my reluctance to penalize claimants for lack of completeness in filling out such questionnaires, I cannot accept Lang's excuse that she did not furnish the information because she did not believe that her right to backpay depended on how many places she went to in search of a job. Unlike some other claimants whose statements were sparse or incomplete, she could not credibly fill in the details omitted from the statement by testimony regarding such efforts. Then she conceded that her efforts were minimal. I find altogether incredible her testimony that she did not look for employment because she did not have carfare. Her testimony showed that she had carfare to travel to the unemployment insurance office and to May's Department Store, where she claimed she looked for work; that on being laid off, she received a paycheck in the approximate amount of $137, a severance payment of $186, vacation pay of $502.20, and an additional erroneous check for vacation pay of $576.60; and that she collected unemployment insurance benefits during the backpay period. In the face of this, I cannot credit her testimony, when pressed for a reason why she did not have enough carfare to go job hunting, that she had to pay bills. I can understand the necessity to pay pressing expenses and the difficulty of traveling in an era of high transportation costs. Nevertheless, the quickest solution to her problems would have been to find employment. Under these circumstances, while failure to institute a job search immediately after being laid off does not disqualify a backpay claimant, in this situation the claimant's failure to begin looking for 3 or 4 weeks undermines her credibility. A much more strenuous effort was indicated than she appears to have made, and her excuse for her failure is singularly inappropriate.

Lang's credibility was not enhanced by her testimony that she was ignorant of the amount of money that her husband earned. Not only is that hard to believe, as I repress my incredulity at his failure to lend her carfare, but I am baffled at her testimony that her husband drove her back and forth by car to collect her unemployment insurance checks but she could not remember what kind of car he owned. I also cannot credit her testimony that even the little cash she had available for carfare was reduced because her bills increased after she became unemployed.

Accordingly, I find that Ruth Lang is not eligible for backpay by reason of her failure to make a reasonably diligent effort to obtain interim employment.

16. Tina Lindsey

The backpay specification filed for Tina Lindsey originally alleged backpay owing in the amount of $1755 for the 16-week period from February 27 to June 29, without offset for interim earnings. It was amended to reflect interim earnings of $640 in the second quarter and net backpay of $1013, and was further amended, in the General Counsel's posthearing brief, to reflect interim earnings of $770. Respondents question the calculation of net backpay.

On the basis of Lindsey having worked Saturdays and Sundays for 10 weeks, from April 18 through June 21, with average tips of $17.50 per day and an interim weekly salary of $42, making a weekly total of $77 per week, the General Counsel arrived at a total of $770 interim earnings for that period. On June 25, she began working a 28-hour week, at the same hourly rate of $3.50. Her weekly salary for the 4 days immediately preceding June 29 would therefore amount to $98, with tips of $70, bringing her total earnings for that week to $168.

I thus calculate that Tina Lindsey had interim earnings of $968 in the second quarter, which, with the severance pay of $102 that she received in the first quarter, must be deducted from her backpay entitlement. Her net backpay, as set forth in Appendix A, therefore amounts to $1285.

17. Evelyn Major

Evelyn Major's eligibility for net backpay for the period from February 27 through the third quarter of 1981 (June 29) amounting to $2322 is challenged by Respondents on the basis of her written statement in July 1981 listing only two prospective employers to whom she had made application for employment. These were the Chase Manhattan Bank and the Chemical Bank. The Respondents cite discrepancies between that statement and her testimony at the hearing and suggest that she may have been coached. They call attention to the similarity of her testimony to factors listed in the NLRB Casehandling Manual. I find nothing in the claimant's testimony that would lead me to believe that she had been "coached" in the pejorative sense of that term. That a witness covers essential favorable points in the course of her testimony is certainly not cause to disregard it—adherence to such a view would speedily reduce our legal system to shambles, for no prima facie case could ever be accepted as credible.

There has been no effective attack on testimony that she gave under oath as to her efforts to find employment. She testified that after her termination she returned to the Continental facility to seek employment by Interstate; she applied to Chase Manhattan Bank, Chemical Bank, Orbachs, and Macy's; she went back to an employment agency from which she had previously obtained part-time employment and attempted through that agency to obtain a full-time position; she read the want ads in the Daily News and the New York Post on a daily basis; she responded to an ad placed by a private employment agency for a cafeteria worker; she enlisted the assistance of other persons in her search for employment; she reported on several occasions to the New York State Placement Service, and she collected unemployment insurance benefits. As soon as Interstate offered her reinstatement she accepted the position and went back to work.

Accordingly, I find that she is entitled to backpay as alleged in the specification, but reduced by severance pay received by her in the first quarter in the amount of $136. As set forth in Appendix A, her net backpay thus amounts to $2186.

18. Peter McCabe

The only issue with respect to Peter McCabe's claim is whether the 1 week's severance pay given to him by Marriott at the time of his termination precludes his receiving backpay for the 1 week that elapsed before he was rehired. Though the specification alleged that he was out of work from February 27 to March 16, he testified that he was rehired 1 week after he was terminated. Acordingly, the Respondents contend he is not entitled to backpay.

McCabe testified that the Marriott operation at Continental Insurance closed on Friday and the following week he made application with Marriott to work at its Pfizer Corporation facility because he knew Marriott had just opened up there and needed help. He was hired 5 or 6 days thereafter. He testified that he was out just that week and went back to work the following week. Documentary evidence shows his return to work on March 11, 1981.

The receipt of severance pay does not destroy eligibility, but the amount of the severance pay received must be deducted from the backpay due the claimant. He is entitled to 1 week's backpay in the amount of $336. He received severance pay in the amount of $364, according to the schedule of severance pay introduced into evidence by the Respondents. He concededly received not less than 1 week's severance pay. He is therefore not owed any net backpay.

19. Catherine Moran

The backpay specification for Catherine Moran, as amended at the hearing, set forth a claim for backpay in the amount of $2709, representing gross backpay for the period from February 27 to August 24, allowing for a reduction in the amount of $258 for 2 weeks during which she was concededly unavailable for work. Interstate sent her a reinstatement mailgram on June 26, but she did not return to work for Interstate, for reasons discussed below; instead, she began work on August 24 at the executive dinning room of the Federal Reserve bank.

The Respondents, disputing her credibility, contend that Moran did not make reasonable efforts to obtain employment during the backpay period and that that period should be cut back to June 20 because her testimony indicates that she was not available for work after that date.

On direct examination, Moran testified that she visited and applied for employment at approximately 10 restaurants, which she named, and that she also applied to the caterers at a number of temples and one church. She further testified that she reviewed the advertisements regularly in the New York Times and in the Irish Echo; that she made three visits to the New York State Placement Service and that she collected unemployment insurance benefits throughout her backpay period. She responded affirmatively to the mailgram from Interstate, but advised Gerstein that she needed a 2-week delay in starting because two members of her family were ill at that time. On July 13, she filed an application for a position as an executive dining room waitress at the Federal Reserve bank.

I am not unmindful of the existence of some contradictions (seeming or actual) in Moran's testimony, but they are not material and do not detract from the essential credibility of her testimony as a whole. The Respondents, for example, call attention to testimony by her that they quote as being to the effect that she did not recollect whether she responded to advertisements in the New York Times and that the Irish Echo did not have a section devoted to advertisements for waitress' positions. Her actual testimony, however, was that she watched the New York Times and the Irish Echo that is published three times a week but she looked at it once a week. It was in response to a question whether she responded to any of the advertisements that she said, referring to the Irish Echo, that "there was no section of waitresses in there." This answer was patently the result of a misunderstanding of the question, because later in her testimony she explicitly stated that she read Irish Echo once a week and the New York Times three times a week, looking for a position as an executive dining room waitress.

The Respondents also seek to impeach the claimant's testimony that she was always available for work on the basis that she was not available during a period, in late June and early July, when her husband and her daughter were hospitalized or required care at home. It was plain to me, listening to her testimony, that Moran does not use the English language with the specificity that might be expected of lawyers, but that is not a sufficient basis for an attack on credibility.

The only serious question respecting Moran's credibility arose from her testimony that she made known to an interviewer at the unemployment insurance office the fact that Interstate had sent her a mailgram offering reinstatement. She continued to collect benefits thereafter. She testified that she returned to the unemployment insurance office the following week, but there was no followup respecting the job offer. She could not, however, recall what was said to her by the interviewer. She conceded that she did not tell the unemployment insurance interviewers that she had spoken to Gerstein by telephone and never revealed to them that she had told Gerstein that she was unavailable for work because she was taking care of members of her family.

I do not credit Moran's testimony that she advised the unemployment insurance interviewers that she had been offered a job, but I have no difficulty believing her testimony as to her efforts to find employment. Portions of a witness' testimony may be credited even though not all of it is believed. L. D. Brinkman Southeast, 261 NLRB 204, 205 fn. 5 (1982). Moran obviously did not seek employment during the several weeks that she was taking care of the two members of her family and that period of unavailability requires appropriate reduction of the gross backpay. However, her entitlement to backpay for the period prior to that time is not affected, and I do not agree with the speculative contention of the Respondents that she started actual work a month after she got the job at the Federal Reserve bank because she was taking care of her family. There is no record at the Federal Reserve bank that she had asked for deferral of her starting date there. Officials of the bank had no knowledge of the reason for the delay in putting her to work after she complied with the preliminary hiring requirements and was assigned to a position in accordance with the bank's routine hiring procedures.

I find, therefore, that Moran made reasonably diligent efforts to find interim employment.

Also at issue was the question of the proper cutoff date. Moran testified that she responded to Interstate's mailgram of June 26, but asked for an extension of time to return to work because two members of her family were ill. She had been caring for one of them since June 20. Moran testified that in a telephone conversation with Donald Gerstein, she was advised that if she did not return within the time specified in the mailgram, the job might not remain available for her. As she had to take care of her sick family members, she considered the opportunity at Interstate to have been extinguished, and counted on the promise of the job with the Federal Reserve bank. She started actual work there on August 24. The General Counsel therefore contends that August 24 is the cutoff date of the backpay period for Moran; the Respondents argue that, because she was not available from June 20, that is the cutoff date.

Unquestionably, Moran was not prepared to resume work when the offer of reinstatement was made by Interstate. She testified that her husband was hospitalized for 13 days, from June 20 to the middle of July, suffering from phlebitis, and that her daughter underwent surgery on June 28 and was hospitalized for 8 days thereafter. Other things being equal, her backpay period would end on June 20, in view of her testimony. However, the General Counsel contends that, because of what Gerstein said to her on the telephone, she was entitled to believe that she no longer had the Interstate offer, and had to continue job hunting. This she did successfully, landing the job at the Federal Reserve Bank. The problem there is that, though she asserted that she got the job in July, she did not begin until August 24. The Respondents contend she delayed beginning work in order to care for her husband and her daughter, but this is unproven speculation. The evidence indicates that the delay was not at all her fault.

Moran was interviewed and given a physical examination at the Federal Reserve bank, but was not directed to report until August 24. The bank personnel who hired her testified at the hearing that they were unable to explain the reason for the delay in her starting date. There is nothing in their records that would indicate that Moran asked for any delay in starting, and routine personnel procedures of the bank appear to have been followed in all respects, except for the delay in starting her. The Respondents have produced no evidence that the delay was Moran's fault, and the burden is on them to produce such evidence, if there is any.

I credit Moran's testimony respecting her telephone conversation with Gerstein. She therefore properly relied on the job offer from the Federal Reserve bank. Accordingly, her backpay period runs from February 27 to August 23, with deductions for severance pay, in the amount of $120, and for the period of unavailability from June 20 to July 12. I calculated her net pay in the amount of $2718 as set forth in Appendix A.

20. Sheila Nelson

The backpay specification for Sheila Nelson covers a period of 8 weeks from the first quarter through a portion of the third quarter in the total sum of $3744. There were no interim earnings. Her period of unemployment ended when she was reinstated by Interstate on July 6, 1981. The Respondents contend that she did not make a reasonable effort to find interim employment.

Nelson testified that she visited the personnel department at Continental Insurance Company seeking employment but did not file an application because no one gave her an application to fill out. She named the person to whom she spoke. The Respondents, however, produced two witnesses who worked in the Continental Insurance Company personnel department at the time Nelson says she filed her application, and who testified that the procedure of the office was that anyone who inquired about employment was routinely given an application to fill out. The company's affirmative action plan was cited as requiring that applications be given out. These witnesses also testified that there had never been a person employed in the personnel department with the name given by Nelson.

The Respondents also fault Nelson for failing to register with any private employment agency, failing to seek help through the Union, failing to answer any newspaper advertisements, and even failing to speak with any of her fromer coworkers in order to be kept informed. However, the test of whether a claimant has made reasonably diligent efforts to obtain employment is not what she failed to do, but what steps she actually took to secure interim employment. Nelson had been a cashier who worked in the office at the Continental facility. She testified that during the period from February 18 to July 6, 1981, she looked for employment by making personal visits to large stores and applying for whatever jobs they might have open. At the May's store in Brooklyn, New York, she was told that an opening for a cashier had just been filled, and told the interviewer that she would take any other job that they had. She went to another department store in downtown Brooklyn and applied for a position either as a cashier or as a floor girl; she was advised that there were no openings. She did not file written applications with either store and testified that this was because she was not asked to do so. She visited some of the jewelry stores in the downtown area of Brooklyn. She was unable to furnish the names of any of the stores she visited, but testified that they all said they had no openings. She went to 120 Broadway and applied for a job as a clerk. She was uncertain about when she did that, but thought it might have been in March. She could not state either the name of the company to which she made application or the name of the supervisor to whom she spoke. She did not fill out a written application. She described the incident as follows: She walked in and asked a man at the front desk if she could talk to a supervisor or anybody in charge because she was looking for a job. He called a lady who came out and spoke to her. Nelson testified that she made application for any position that was open at Macy's at 34th Street, New York City, but she could not fix the time when she did so and did not remember to whom she spoke. When asked if she went to the store's personnel department, her testimony was, "I really don't think I went to the Personnel Department." She then explained the procedure she followed when she visited stores looking for employment: "When I go inside, I always ask for the Information Desk, because I don't know where I'm going. I asked for the Personnel Department . . . and they said that the man was busy at the time, but they would have somebody to help me." A lady from the personnel department came out to talk to her and told her that there were no job openings but made a note of her telephone number and promised to call if they had any jobs. However, she never received a call. She testified that she applied for jobs in gorcery stores in the neighborhood where she lives; she thought she had done that in May. She asserted that she applied at Chemical Bank at 55 Water Street, New York City, but was not sure of the month in which she did so. She asserted that on her visits to the Chemical Bank, "I applied for anything." She followed the same procedure there that she had followed elsewhere: She asked at the information desk whether they knew of any job openings. She received a negative response. she had a conversation with somebody there about typing, but there were no typing jobs open. She did not know the name of the man to whom she spoke.

Nelson registered for unemployment insurance on March 2. She collected unemployment insurance and testified that on her visits to the unemployment insurance office she answered inquiries about her job search. She filled out slips that they gave her on which she indicated places that she had gone looking for work. They sent her to one location, where she had an interview, but she was not hired.

The claimant's testimony is not a model of precision and exactitude. Nevertheless, it sets forth a history of attempts to find employment. Though short on details, it is supported by her success in obtaining unemployment insurance benefits and by the fact that she accepted work when she was offered reinstatement. I conclude that her testimony should be credited despite absence of details that would permit easy verification. The fact that she did not pursue every avenue that a more alert job hunter might have pursued does not mean that she was untruthful with respect to her description of the efforts to find work that she testified she made. The burden of establishing lack of diligence is on the Respondents and doubts must be resolved in favor of the backpay claimant. Accordingly, I find that the claimant is entitled to net backpay in the amount of $3536, as set forth in Appendix A. Allowance has been made for severance pay that she received in the amount of $208.

21. Cornelius Noonan

The backpay specification for Cornelius Noonan claims net backpay of $2448 for an 18-week period extending from the first quarter into the third quarter of 1981. The claimant had no interim earnings. He accepted reinstatement by Interstate and returned to work on July 6. The Respondents assert that his efforts to obtain interim employment were not diligent because he limited his efforts to a search for a job as a security guard whereas he had worked for Marriott as a dishwasher and utilityman. He made no attempt to obtain work as a dishwasher.

A backpay claimant will not be held to have failed to make diligent effort to find interim employment merely because he sought a different type of position than that in which he had been employed when he was wrongfully terminated. He must seek employment, but not necessarily employment in an identical job. Seeking a somewhat different type of job does not disqualify a backpay claimant so long as he does not reject or fail to seek, in addition, employment substantially similar to his former employment. Avon Convalescent Center, 219 NLRB 1210 (1975), modified 549 F.2d 1080 (6th Cir. 1977). An assessment of the reasonableness of his effort requires consideration of his skills and qualifications and his age. Flite Chief, Inc., 258 NLRB 1124 (1981), affd. mem. 696 F.2d 1003 (9th Cir. 1982). Noonan testified that his original field was security and he wanted to return to it, and that among his reasons were the fact that there seemed to be more positions in that field than there appeared to be openings for dishwashers and the fact that security positions pay more than dishwashers' positions. I credit this testimony. There being no evidence that Noonan failed to attempt to obtain employment, he is entitled to backpay. The amount will be reduced by the amount of the severance pay that he received in the amount of $136.

Accordingly, I compute his net backpay in the sum of $2312 as set forth in Appendix A.

22. Octavio Parra

The backpay specification for Octavio Parra called for payment of net backpay in the sum of $1440 for an 8-week period in the first and second quarters running from February 27 to April 26, when Parra suffered a heart attack that incapacitated him and tolled the backpay period. He had already accepted an offer of reinstatement and was due to return to work on April 27.

The serious problem in this instance is presented by the amendment of the specification at the hearing to include such amounts as Parra became liable for as expenses of his medical treatment. Parra is still under treatment and the ultimate total cost cannot presently be known, but at the time of the hearing Parra was indebted for medical expenses in a substantial amount. A portion of his medical expenses was paid by the Marriott Corporation Medical Benefits Plan (the Plan) and by Medicare. The group insurance carrier, however, disclaimed further liability after paying a portion of the initial expenses on the ground that Parra was no longer employed by Marriott at the time he became ill. Whatever amounts the carrier would have paid had Parra been on the Marriott payroll when he suffered his heart attack therefore become a liability of the Respondents in this backpay proceeding.

The Respondents stipulated that the provisions of the Plan would be applicable to Parra if he were an employee of Marriott. The insurance carrier's position that Parra's coverage ended when he was terminated on February 27 is not pertinent in this proceeding except insofar as it makes the amount of the medical expenses that would have been paid under the Plan a direct liability of the Respondents. Although conceding Parra's basic entitlement to backpay, the Respondents nevertheless contended that medical expenses should not be included because proof was lacking that Parra would actually have to pay the medical bills, some of which were 2 years old and, in Respondents' view, "stale" and because Parra was covered by Medicare.

It is well settled that in these circumstances a backpay claimant such as Parra is entitled to be reimbursed for medical payments for which he becomes liable during the backpay period and for all such expenses that accrue thereafter that would have been covered by the medical insurance but for his wrongful termination. With respect to medical expenses, incurring of liability for same by Parra is, for the purposes of these proceedings, the equivalent of having paid them, and creates liability on the part of the employer for their payment by inclusion of such expenses in the backpay award. See Carter's Rental, 250 NLRB 344, 352–353 (1980), and Matlock Truck Body & Rental Corp., 248 NLRB 461, 473–474 (1980). The question of coordinating additional coverages for medical expenses is something that should be worked out later as a matter of mechanics.

Accordingly, the General Counsel's motion at the hearing was granted and the backpay specification was deemed amended to include all sums that would be paid by the Plan to cover Parra's medical expenses already incurred and to be incurred.

The Respondent introduced into evidence a booklet dated January 3, 1981, that summarized the Plan. Though it sets forth that the Plan documents control in the event of any conflict between the provisions of the Plan and the booklet, the Plan documents were not placed in evidence. Accordingly, for the purposes of this proceeding, the terms and conditions stated in the booklet must be deemed controlling insofar as they fix the minimum extent of the liability of the Respondents. Extracts of pertinent provisions of the Plan booklet are made part of this decision as Appendix B for the convenience of the compliance officer, who is, of course, not precluded thereby from having recourse to all other relevant provisions contained in the booklet or to the provisions of the Plan documents themselves.

The evidence in the record, including statements of account, bills, and correspondence from the providers of medical services to Parra, establishes that, as of the time of the hearing Parra was indebted to them for covered medical expenses in the total amount of $10,762.75. This indebtedness was incurred during the fiscal year of Marriott Corporation ending December 31, 1981, and during the fiscal year ending December 31, 1982, a fact that must be taken into consideration in applying the provisions of the Plan relating to yearly deductibles from benefits, because these are governed by Marriott Corporation's fiscal year.

As of June 5, 1983, when the hearing was concluded, the Plan had already paid $1650 to Cabrini Medical Center and a Medicaid allowance in the amount of $5,328.10 had been applied against the St. Vincent's Hospital & Medical Center bill of $5,766.10. Charges still open were as follows:

To Cabrini Medical Center:
Hospital expenses	$9,304.75
X-Ray	440.00
Echocardiogram	200.00
To St. Vincent's Hospital:
Hospital expenses	438.00
Clinic	300.00
Doctors' fees	80.00
	$10,762.75

The medical insurance carrier having disclaimed further liability, further contribution can only be foreseen from governmental coverages, and except as reduced by such coverages and the authorized deductibles, Respondents are liable for payment of the foregoing expenses, together with any additional expenses incurred since the close of the hearing or that accrue in the future and that would have been covered by the Plan.

Parra had no interim earnings. His gross backpay for the first quarter, in the amount of $792 must be reduced by the severance payment that he received in the amount of $180. His gross backpay for the second quarter, computed to the date his illness commenced, amounts to $648. I therefore compute his net backpay, exclusive of medical benefits, in the sum of $1260, as set forth in Appendix A.

The compliance officer will determine whether any deductions must be made from the amount awarded for medical expenses by reason of deductibles or of governmental or other private coverages for such expenses, and the amount thereof. The compliance officer will also have to ascertain whether there have been any additional medical expenses incurred by Parra and, if so, whether and to what extent those would have been covered under the Plan, taking into account the deductibles and the requirement for coordination with governmental coverage for such expenses. Any net sums found owing to Parra should be added to the aforesaid sum of $10,762.75. On the compliance officer's determination of the net amount owing to Parra on all the foregoing, he will effectuate payment of same by the Respondents, jointly and severally. The compliance officer will retain oversight to determine what additional sums if any, become owing to Parra from the Respondents as he continues his treatment and to ensure that payment of same is timely made and that coordination of benefits with governmental and other private coverages is implemented, in accordance with this decision.

23. Donna Stallone

Backpay in the amount of $1320 is alleged to be due to Donna Stallone for the period February 27 to March 30. Respondents dispute her entitlement on the ground that prior to the termination she had given Marriott notice that she was resigning to take another job.

The posture of the case with respect to Stallone is somewhat unusual. She was not called on to testify by the General Counsel but by Respondent Marriott, by whom she is currently employed. She has worked for Marriott since February 1976 and worked in the office at the Continental facility for approximately 3 years. She took a 2-week vacation after it closed, worked 3 weeks for a company in New Jersey, and then returned to work for Marriott. She testified that she had not responded to letters concerning backpay because she did not feel that Marriott owed her anything, for she had given notice to Marriott 2 weeks prior to the closing that she was resigning to take a position with the company in New Jersey and, in addition, had declined an offer of a position at another Marriott unit made by Marriott's district manager on or before February 27.

The General Counsel concedes that if the facts were as testified to by the backpay claimant she would not be entitled to backpay, but argues, without any factual basis whatsoever, that Stallone's testimony was a fabrication advanced by the Respondents to embarrass the General Cousnel by creating the appearance that the General Counsel had failed to make adequate efforts to determine the interim earnings of the claimants. Quite aside from the fact that I find such a suggestion highly implausible, I cannot ignore Stallone's testimony or her demeanor while testifying. No information was elicited on cross-examination that indicated any reason to disbelieve her testimony or to believe that she had deliberately committed perjury for the benefit of the Respondents. She testified explicitly that she gave 2 weeks' notice that she was resigning, that she expressly declined a position with another Marriott unit in which she cold have started work immediately, and that she did so because she was interested in trying out a job in New Jersey. Her testimony was plausible and believable. I am thus compelled to deny backpay as alleged in the specification for this claimant. I do not see anything in this particular situation that suggests that the claimant's own needs should be transcended in order to ensure adequate enforcement of the National Labor Relations Act. The claimant's undisputed testimony indicates she is not eligible for backpay and it would be perversion of the aims of the Act to award backpay in the face of such evidence.

24. Ervin Terry

The backpay specification alleges the sum of $2457 to be owed to Ervin Terry for a 21-week period extending from the first quarter through the third quarter of 1981, from February 27 to July 27. Terry, who had been employed as a food server, testified with respect to his efforts to find interim employment. The Respondents contend that his testimony is altogether incredible and that, therefore, backpay should be denied because he must be found to have made no diligent effort to obtain employment. The General Counsel takes the position that Terry's credibility, if it was impeached, was only impeached with respect to irrelevant collateral matters and that the Respondents did not meet the burden that the law places on them of presenting evidence to prove willful loss of earnings.

I concur in the Respondents' view that a great deal of the testimony of the backpay claimant respecting his efforts to get employment is not credible. That failure of credibility manifestly does not relate to a collateral matter, but to a central issue, whether the backpay claimant did or did not make diligent efforts to find interim employment. The most cursory examination of Terry's testimony raises doubts respecting his credibility strong enough to require rejection of all of his testimony. For example, he testified that over the course of a 5-month period he did not see a single newspaper advertisement in the New York Post or the New York Daily News to which he felt he could respond, though he read both of these newspapers two or three times each week. Another example is the conversation Terry claimed to have had with a friend, while sitting in the friend's automobile. Terry testified that his friend referred him to a store in a shopping mall where he might obtain employment. He went to the store in the shopping mall but was told by someone there that no job openings existed.

What makes the story incredible is that the person at the store who told Terry that there were no job openings was his friend, the same person who, sitting in the car with him, had suggested that he apply for employment at that store. Then again, Terry testified that he attempted to obtain work as a security guard by talking to a friend who was a security guard at the World Trade Center. He could not remember the name of the friend. He made no inquiry at any employment office at the World Trade Center while he was there.

The credibility of Terry's testimony that he applied for a job at a nursing home in Freeport, Long Island, while staying at his uncle's place in that area, was undermined by other testimony by him to the effect that he would not travel to that same area to borrow money, a subject that came up because he claimed that he was unable to look for work because he did not have carfare. He had, of course, received a week's severance pay, so he had some money, and he testified that his Freeport relatives lent him money to help pay his rent. They are the relatives who had referred him to the nursing home in Freeport. He testified that he did not attempt to borrow more money from them because it would have taken money to get out to see them on Long Island. He did not explain why he could not telephone them to ask them for help.

Terry's testimony that he went to an employment agency in March 1981 is suspect because of his complete inability to remember the name of the agency. He testified that that agency and five or six other agencies to which he applied requested their fees in advance, but he was unable to pay the fees. As I have just noted, he was not completely without funds.

Having disclosed his inability to pay fees to advertising agencies, and despite his assertion that he did not have the necessary carfare to hunt for employment in March and April, Terry proceeded to testify that he nevertheless gave an unnamed person $25 as a fee at a construction site in the Borough Hall area of Brooklyn and was instructed by him to report to work the following Monday. It turned out that Terry had been victimized by a fraud, for when he went to the jobsite that person was nowhere to be found. However, while he was there he did not talk to anybody else at the jobsite about possibly working at the construction site and he did not look for any other work in the Borough Hall area. His failure to do so makes it impossible for me to believe this portion of his testimony.

Terry testified that he attempted to obtain a job with a taxi company, but conceded that he did not have the special driver's license needed to operate a taxicab and that he never made any attempt to obtain one.

Terry, along with other former employees, was sent a mailgram by Interstate on June 26, offering reinstatement. It took him a month to respond. He testified that he did not receive it until July 24. His explanation for the delay was wholly unsatisfactory, especially because it appeared that he received mail from the Regional Office of the Board without difficulty.

The General Counsel argues that the backpay claimant's lack of understanding and the fact that he is ill-equipped to complete forms, such as the statement of claim, should not be factors that are utilized to reduce or eliminate his backpay award. The problem that exists in this case, however, is whether the claimant is credible. His whole story is unrealistic, vague, inherently self-contradictory, and unbelievable.

Accordingly, I find the backpay claimant, Ervin Terry, ineligible for backpay.

25. Malcolm Thomas

The specification for Malcolm Thomas alleges net backpay of $2146 owing for the first and second quarters, with an offset for interim earnings in the amount of $399. A further deduction was necessitated by disclosure at the hearing of additional earnings of $108. The claimant obtained his interim employment through an agency specializing in temporary jobs known as the Tip Top Agency. The Respondents contend that Thomas is ineligible for backpay because he limited his efforts to that agency, and that did not constitute a reasonable effort to obtain interim employment.

The circumstances are not unlike those in the case of George Bacote, considered above, in which I have denied backpay. Thomas initially obtained his employment as a dishwasher at the Continental facility through Tip Top, which sent him to Marriott as a temporary worker. He was paid directly by the agency on a daily basis. Marriott hired him as a full-time employee. During the backpay period, he went out on jobs to which Tip Top referred him. Almost every day, at 5 a.m., he presented himself at the office of Tip Top to be sent out for a day's work. This bespeaks a willingness on his part to work when he is put to work, but such willingness is not synonymous with the making of a reasonable effort to find interim employment.

I do not credit the claimant's testimony that he sought assistance in finding work of friends and of the boarders at the rooming house where he lived, and that he checked the New York Post every day for employment opportunities. He testified that he made an application to a messenger service, and I am willing to credit that testimony because it fits in with his pattern of search for only temporary employment. The General Counsel, in fact, conceded that that was the limit of his effort, arguing that Thomas tried to obtain employment solely through the Tip Top Agency because he knew no other method. The General Counsel makes an argument akin to the one he employed in the case of George Bacote, that the claimant must be taken as we find him, and asserts that the restriction of his effort to find employment to the temporary employment agency was reasonable because he was "obviously beaten down by sixty-four years of living [and] knew only one way of surviving—shaping up at a temporary agency." However, shaping up at a temporary agency was not, as the General Counsel argued, the only way he knew how to survive, for having had the experience of working for Marriott on a permanent basis he could have tried to do so again. He obviously did not want to have a permanent job.

Sympathy for a claimant's limitations does not require gullible acceptance of the argument that he made reasonably diligent effort to mitigate the wage loss when his testimony and the evidence indicates the reverse.

Thomas did not file for unemployment insurance benefits. I do not credit his explanation for omitting to do so, which was to the effect that he did not believe he was eligible for it because he had only worked for Marriott for 2 months. He never bothered checking with the Unemployment Insurance Division to find out if he was eligible and made no attempt to utilize the facilities of its placement service to try to find a job.

Thomas did believe he was eligible for social security retirement benefits, and filed for those. He explained that he did so in order to obtain a steady income without having to run to the agency every morning for a relatively uncertain income. (That testimony also undermined the General Counsel's argument that he limited his effort to get work to visits to the agency because that was the only way he knew how.)

When Thomas was offered reinstatement by Interstate, he declined the offer. He testified that the reason he declined the job was because he was discouraged with Marriott, inasmuch as he had been fired after he had worked hard for Marriott. If this were true, his failure to accept reinstatement would not necessarily disqualify him from receiving backpay. However, I find his testimony in this regard unpersuasive and incredible, by itself and in view of his testimony, given subsequently, that he found it too much of a hardship to run to the agency every morning only to be sent out on an occasional basis.

Accordingly, I find that the claimant, Malcolm Thomas, is not eligible for backpay.

26. Mary Towey

It is alleged that the sum of $3697 is owing to Mary Towey as net backpay for the period February 27 to June 29, when she received the mailgram from Interstate offering reinstatement and declined to accept the position. Respondents' objection rests on the fact that though she made a number of employment inquiries, she did not follow them up and she expressed lack of interest in a number of job opportunities that Respondents claim she could have had if she had wanted to work. However, Towey testified as to the reasons why she did not follow up certain apparent job opportunities or why she declined them after obtaining more detailed information about them. Her testimony was specific with respect to each instance. Her reasons appeared to be sound in every case. Thus, she turned down a job that would have provided her with a net income considerably less than what she had earned at Marriott; she declined a position in Manhattan that required night work and travel by subway; she declined a position with a caterer that would have required her to work through the night; and, in a number of instances, she made inquiries of prospective employers only to discover that there were no job openings. Her willingness to work is apparent from her 12-year work history at Continental and her completely credible testimony.

Accordingly, I find Mary Towey entitled to backpay, reduced by the amount of $261 severance pay that she received, and calculate the same in the net amount of $3436 as set forth in Appendix A.

27. Lila Victorio

The backpay specification for Lila Victorio, as amended at the hearing, alleged net backpay owing in the amount of $2484, for the period February 27 to August 7, when, Victorio testified, she obtained a job at Mandalay Caterers on Staten Island. The Respondents contend that her backpay period should be tolled as of sometime prior to July 1, when she ceased to be available for employment. The Respondents asserted that she was offered reinstatement to an equivalent position at the same location with the same hours as her former job.

During and after the time she worked for Marriott, Victorio attended the Parsons School of Design in New York City. She had classes 2 days a week from 3 to 8 p.m. At Continental, she was an executive dining room waitress. She testified that she searched unsuccessfully for similar employment throughout the backpay period, making inquiry of a number of concerns located in Manhattan, Queens, and Staten Island, where she lived. She testified that she also attempted to obtain a position as a layout artist with the Staten Island Advance. However, she could not accept the position because the hours conflicted with her school schedule. She collected unemployment insurance benefits until she commenced work at Mandalay Caterers. She reported to the New York State Placement Service, which referred her to a position with the Queensborough Public Library on one occasion. She did not accept the job because it would have involved 6 hours of traveling each day. When she received the mailgram from Interstate offering reinstatement, she went in for an interview and was offered a position in which the working hours were from 9 a.m to 4 p.m. Her work hours at Continental had been from 10 a.m. to 2:30 p.m. She testified that she explained to Leslie Karen, the Interstate interviewer, that the conflict with her school schedule prevented her from taking the job and also told the interviewer that she was contemplating taking a vacation in Florida, where her parents resided, and that she would not return to New York until September.

Ronald Gerstein testified that he was the one who interviewed Victorio and that he offered her a job with the same hours at Continental that she had previously worked, but that Victorio declined the offer with the explanation that she might not be available until September as she was probably going to Florida for the summer. Gerstein testified that he was left with the impression that she would call him if she changed her mind.

Elaine Hickey had worked with Victorio prior to their termination, and for a time had shared living quarters with Victorio. She testified that while employed at Continental, Victorio had also worked nights at a cafe on Staten Island and that she continued working there after the Continental layoff. I reject Respondents' contention that this affects the merits of her case, either from the standpoint of entitlement or from the standpoint of the amount of backpay owing. The additional job existed prior to the layoff and did not supercede the employment from which she had been barred by the layoff. The earnings from her extra employment are therefore not an offset against any backpay entitlement. However, before the existence of the second job had been disclosed in the hearing, Victorio had testified that she told the Interstate representatives on July 9 that she was immediately available for employment and did not have another job. (Actually, the interview at Interstate occurred on July 1.) Her credibility is thereby brought into question. Other aspects of the evidence raised further doubts about her credibility.

Besides the testimony that Victorio said she was not available for employment during the summer of 1981, the evidence establishes that she did not attend summer school at the Parsons School of Design during that summer. The spring term having ended in mid-May, she was available for the job offered by Gerstein because there was no class schedule with which its hours might conflict. While she was entitled to an offer of employment at hours and pay comparable to those of her former job, there is no requirement that the offer be of a precisely identical job, and the circumstance that she was not in fact attending school destroys her credibility in ascribing reasons for her rejection of the Interstate employment offer and that circumstance also contradicts her stated reason for declining the job at the Staten Island Advance.

On the job application that she filed with Interstate on July 1, she stated flatly that she was not available for work until September 1, 1981. The Respondents argue that this casts doubt on her availability at any period prior to July 1. This is pure speculation, and it would be just as easy to speculate that she made the decision to go to Florida on that very date and had therefore been available and able to work up to July 1. Such speculation is unnecessary. Legitimate doubts about her asserted efforts to obtain interim employment in the preceding months are raised by the other evidence in the record and the contradictions in her own testimony.

On the application filed with Interstate, Victorio indicated that she had a job as of July 6. The Respondents contend that this negates the possibility that her employment with Mandalay Caterers began as late as August 7. She was making this statement as of July 1. While it is possible that her arrangements underwent a change, it would appear that had there been any change she would have notified Interstate if she were interested in obtaining employment.

Falsehoods contained in her written statement respecting her efforts to obtain employment cannot be overlooked. Respondents have pointed out that she listed, as one of the places to which she had applied for employment, the cafe where, according to her roommate, she was actually already working. That written statement also omits any mention of the job applications with the Staten Island Advance and the Queensborough Public Library.

The inconsistencies in Victorio's testimony and her demeanor while testifying convinced me that she was not being truthful about her efforts to obtain interim employment. In this instance, it may reasonably be argued, in the light of all the other circumstances, that her income from her second job and the unemployment insurance benefits that she collected seemingly removed the stress from her period of unemployment and lessened her motivation to seek interim employment. She testified candidly that she contemplated spending the entire summer in Florida, possibly even seeking employment down there. I cannot find on this record that she was available for employment throughout the backpay period at the same hours that she had previously worked, or that she made reasonable efforts to obtain employment in a job calling for her to work similar hours.

Accordingly, I find that Lila Victorio is not eligible for backpay.

28. Leonora Vilabrera

Leonora Vilabrera was allegedly owed $1422 net backpay for the period February 27 to May 5, when she obtained a job. The matter has been tried on the basis of a cutoff date of May 5, with no interim earnings, though she accepted an offer of reinstatement from Interstate and returned to work for Interstate on July 6. There is no data respecting her earnings from May 6 through July 3, her backpay period being deemed to end with May 5.

Besides asserting that gross backpay should be reduced by the amounts of severance pay and vacation pay that Leonora Vilabrera received, the Respondents advance the argument that unemployment insurance benefits that she collected should be deducted from backpay because she rejected what they characterize as suitable employment.

In the first week after the layoff, Vilabrera visited Interstate at the Chase Bank on William Street in downtown Manhattan. She spoke to the manager and told him she was looking for the same type of job that she had had at Continental. There she had worked from 6 a.m. to 2:30 p.m., 5 days a week. He called her a few days later and offered her a part-time job, 4 hours a day. She turned it down because the money was insufficient; in fact, it amounted to less then her unemployment insurance benefits.

The Respondents assert on the basis of this testimony that, because she never inquired as to the pay rate and could not therefore be certain that her earnings would be less than the unemployment insurance benefits, the amount of those benefits should be deducted from gross backpay. This argument fails because I credit her testimony that she assumed that Chase would start her at the minimum hourly wage rate. She was entitled to make that assumption, for that is what had happened when she began work at Marriott. She was receiving approximately $90 per week in unemployment insurance benefits. The job that she was offered involved working half the number of hours of her former job, 20 hours instead of 40. She could reasonably concluded that the job would make her economic position worse instead of better.

Unemployment insurance benefits are not interim earnings and are not normally offset against backpay liability. No reason to apply a different rule has been demonstrated in this case.

The sincerity of the claimant's efforts to find interim employment is manifest from the fact that she found a permanent job and started on it on May 5, substantially reducing the Respondents' backpay liability.

Accordingly, I find that Leonora Vilabrera is entitled to the net backpay a alleged in the specification, reduced by severance pay that she received in the amount of $158. Accordingly, I calculate her net backpay at $1264 as set forth in Appendix A.

29. Simona Vilabrera

Simona Vilabrera is alleged to be owed net backpay in the amount of $3888 for the period February 27 to July 6, when she returned to work on Interstate's offer of reinstatement. The Respondents contend that her testimony respecting efforts to obtain interim employment is not credible. They unquestionably have plenty of ammunition with which to work, but my own appraisal of her overall testimony leads me to accept it as credible.

There are a number of points about Vilabrera's testimony that the Respondents rightly point to as raising questions. After testifying that she did not speak to other Marriott ex-employees prior to testifying at the hearing, she admitted she had discussed the case with some of them. She appeared to be evasive about the manner in which she had obtained a copy of the backpay specification and about the date when she first saw it. First she testified that she saw it posted on a bulletin board; then she testified that she received it in the mail, but was unable to furnish a lucid explanation of how that had come about. She appeared also to have contradicted herself specifically with respect to whether she had discussed her testimony with Rupert Cayenne, another backpay claimant. There was also a contradiction between her testimony and that of Cayenne respecting a conversation they had. She testified that he obtained a job as a chef and told her that there was no position open for her in the place where he was working. He testified that he did not find work until 2 weeks before he was called back by Interstate and that the job he obtained was in a paper factory.

Some of her testimony appeared to me to be improbable, such as her testimony that the General Counsel did not prepare her in any way for her appearance at the hearing in this backpay proceeding. She later modified that testimony.

The items of testimony that I have just cited and Simona Vilabrera's demeanor while testifying convinced me that she was not a completely truthful witness with respect to those matters. However, the troublesome portions of her testimony, to which I have just alluded, were given along with a great deal of creditable testimony, and those portions of her testimony, while vague with respect to some particulars, created a believable picture of reasonably diligent effort to obtain interim employment. Significantly, almost all that testimony was uncontroverted.

Simona Vilabrera testified that she was a second cook. She asked Carol Kramer about another job with Marriott. Though she could not remember Kramer's response, it was apparently not encouraging and Kramer, who testified at the hearing, said nothing that contradicted Simona Vilabrera's testimony. The first week of her unemployment she telephoned the manager of the new operation at Continental at 80 Maiden Lane, New York City, to see if there was any work, and was advised that there were no openings. She followed newspaper ads in the New York Times and the New York Daily News and made telephone calls. She made a long subway trip to investigate a babysitting job, which she turned down because the pay was insufficient. She spoke to other former Marriott employees and to her friends, Cayenne and Ermine Blades, asking for their help in finding a job. At the suggestion of another friend, she put in an application at the new Hyatt Hotel in New York City. At the suggestion of yet another friend, she applied for a job at a hospital on Jamaica Avenue in Queens, New York (she could not recall the name of the hospital but later referred to it as a nursing home). She went to only one employment agency, in April. She paid a $20 fee and was sent out to be interviewed for two nonexistent jobs and, after great difficulty, obtained refund of the fee. She applied to Consolidated Edison.

She applied for, and received, unemployment insurance benefits. Here again, her testimony raised, as well as answered, questions. She asserted that she went out looking for a job two or three times a week. That should have created a substantial job-hunting history at the Unemployment Insurance Division which, even if not directly available, should have left a lot of information in her own memory. She testified that she reported her efforts to find employment to the interviewers at that agency. However, her recollection was that the unemployment insurance interviewers only asked her if she had been looking for work and did not ask where she had looked. The entire conversation would consist of her being asked if she had been looking and her affirmative reply; there was no curiosity on their part as to where she had looked or as to the identity of the firms to which she had made application.

Careful consideration of Simona Vilabrera's testimony indicates to me that most of the problems with it result from her extreme vagueness respecting dates and the substance of conversations. There are, as I have stated, some actual contradictions in her testimony. Nevertheless, vagueness as to details is not synonymous with falsehood, and not all contradictions mean that the witness was lying. For example, the claimant gave additional testimony that I think clarified seeming inconsistencies regarding her conversation with Cayenne and the manner in which she had been prepared for the hearing by the General Counsel. She testified that the General Counsel had told her to try to remember the past and to tell the truth and to remember where she had gone to apply for jobs. That testimony seemed altogether reasonable and truthful. As to her testimony about the conversation with Cayenne, it is to be noted that her testimony that he had a job cooking was actually given after she had stated several times that she was vague about the kind of work he was doing. In response to a question put to her as to whether he had told her he had obtained a job, she first answered simply that he had told her that "he had something," but she did not know what it was, but thought it was in cooking. She did not even know whether he was working full time or part time. Although this may seem surprising, considering that Cayenne and Blades were friends of hers to whom she spoke frequently, it is apparent that her testimony became contradictory as to immaterial details under repeated questioning and an apparent desire on her part to supply answers, rather than as a result of any deliberate attempt to distort the truth.

The claimant's testimony as a whole is imprecise, but not incredible. Almost all of it is uncontroverted. In its important details it was consistent and remained unshaken on cross-examination. She collected unemployment insurance benefits throughout the entire backpay period, and Respondents conceded that the procedure followed by the Unemployment Insurance Division of the New York State Department of Labor is to inquire periodically of recipients of unemployment insurance benefits whether they have made efforts to find employment and to refer them to a State-operated placement bureau to be sent out on job prospects. I do not find that the claimant's credibility regarding the main issue has been at all eroded. I find that she made the efforts to find employment to which she testified and I find that those were reasonably diligent efforts to secure interim employment, and that she is therefore eligible to receive backpay. I note again that in this backpay proceeding, doubts are resolved in favor of the claimant and against the Respondents, and that the burden of showing failure to make reasonable efforts to find interim employment is on the Respondents.

The claimant received a severance payment in the amount of $216. Accordingly, I have calculated her net backpay in the sum of $3672 as set forth in Appendix A.

THE REMEDY

The Respondents' obligations to the backpay claimants will be adequately discharged by their payment to the claimants of the respective amounts set forth in the attached Appendix A, which is based on the amounts set forth in the specification, as amended by the General Counsel and as modified by me in accordance with my findings. Interest, computed in the manner prescribed in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977), and Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962), shall be payable on such amounts, commencing with the last day of each calendar quarter of the backpay period on the amount due and owing for such period, as set forth in Appendix A, and continuing until the date of payment thereof. There shall be deducted from such payments and taxes required to be withheld pursuant to Federal, state, and local laws.

Appendix A sets forth the gross backpay, interim earnings, and severance pay, and net backpay for each claimant whom I have ascertained to be entitled to payment of backpay. No claimant who had interim earnings submitted evidence respecting expenses incurred in connection therewith, and therefore the earnings figures presented represent net earnings.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[2]

It having been determined that the backpay claimant, Octavio Parra, incurred liabilities for medical expenses that, as of July 5, 1983, amounted to $10,762.75, in an illness covered by the Marriott Corporation Medical Benefits Plan (the Plan), and that the said amount is the net amount owing after payment of the sum of $1650 by the Plan and payment of the sum of $5,328.10 by a Medicaid allowance, it is further Ordered:

(a) That the compliance officer ascertain whether any further deductions should be made from the aforesaid sum of $10,762.75 to comply with deductibles provided for in the Plan or to allow for coordination with payments that have been made by reason of coverage under any Federal or state medical insurance programs, and compute the net balance thereof that shall be promptly paid by the Respondents to the backpay claimant, Octavio Parra.

In the event the Respondents choose to conduct such examination and any of the said former employees fail to submit to such examination or cannot be located within the escrow year, the amount of backpay placed in escrow for such employee shall be returned to Respondents. Regarding those employees who appear and submit to examination, the Regional Director shall make a final determination whether such employee had interim earnings or received any other moneys that are deductible from the backpay award of the claimant, such determination to be made in accordance with existing Board precedent. On such determination, the Regional Director shall make such deductions as are appropriate, return the amounts deducted to the Respondents, and pay the net backpay to the claimant. The Regional Director is further directed to report to the Board when these matters have been fully resolved but in no event later than 1 year from the date of the Board's Supplemental Order, the status of these cases at such time.

APPENDIX B

Hospital Room and Board: Plan Benefits pay up to the semi-private room rate for up to 60 days for each necessary hospital confinement. Necessary confinements continuing beyond a 60 day period may be covered by Major Medical Benefits.

> If a participant is in a private room or in the intensive or coronary care unit of a hospital, the Plan will pay a daily rate equal to the hospital's average room and board charge for a semi-private room. If confined in an intensive or coronary care unit, or in a private room because of contagious disease, the difference between the average semi-private room rate and the charge for the private room will be covered by Major Medical Benefits.
> If a participant re-enters the hospital for treatment of the same or related condition within 90 days following the initial discharge, it will be considered the same continuous period of confinement. Otherwise, readmission will be treated as a new confinement.
> . . . .
> Other Hospital and Anesthesia Expenses: For any one hospital confinement period. Basic Plan Benefits cover up to the first $500 in expenses for the following:
> 1. operating room, recovery room, surgical supplies, anesthesia supplies, drugs, dressings, oxygen, and antibiotics:
> 2. diagnostic tests, radiology services, and physical therapy:
> 3. anesthesiologist's services: and
> . . . .
> In most cases, after payment of the yearly deductible, Major Medical Benefits pay 80% of the next $5000 and 100% of almost all other covered expenses incurred during each Plan Year.

The Plan year is the same as the Company's fiscal year, which ends on the Friday closest to December 31.

> The yearly deductible is the first $100 for covered medical expenses not included in Basic Plan Benefits. While it applies separately to each covered family member, the maximum deductible a family must pay is $200.
> With Major Medical Plan Benefits on top of Basic Plan Benefits, the most you would have to pay for any one member of your family each year is $1,100 of covered medical expenses (the $100 deductible, plus 20% of the next $5000). Major Medical Benefits provide up to $1,000,000 in coverage for each participant. Major Medical Benefits for psychiatric care, however, are limited to a lifetime maximum of $5000 per person.

What expenses are covered by Major Medical Plan Benefits?

> Major Medical Plan Benefits provide coverage for the reasonable and customary charges for the following services, supplies and treatment when recommended as medically necessary by a doctor for the care and treatment of a covered illness or injury. (Covered Major Medical expenses do not include charges eligible for or reimbursed by Basic Plan Benefits.)
> Hospital Expenses:
> 1. Hospital room and board expenses, including any excess in the daily room rate for coronary or intensive care units over the average semi-private room rate. Additional charges for a private room are not covered unless required by health regulations due to contagious disease.
> 2. Other hospital and anesthesia expenses over $500 per confinement. (Covered services, supplies and treatment are described under "Other Hospital and Anesthesia Expenses.")

Air Express International Corporation and Freight Drivers, Warehousemen and Helpers Local Union No. 390, an affiliate of International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, AFL-CIO. Case 12-CA-12758

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND CRACRAFT

On December 15, 1987, the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board issued a complaint alleging that the Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act by refusing the Union's request to bargain following the Union's certification in Case 12-RC-6715. (Official notice is taken of the "record" in the representation proceeding as defined in the Board's Rules and Regulations, Secs. 102.68 and 102.69(g); Frontier Hotel, 265 NLRB 343 (1982).) The Respondent filed its answer admitting in part and denying in part the allegations in the complaint.

On January 25, 1988, the General Counsel filed a Motion for Summary Judgment. On January 27 the Board issued an order transferring the proceeding to the Board and a Notice to Show Cause why the motion should not be granted. The Respondent filed an opposition to the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment and cross-motion for revocation of the certification.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

Ruling on Motion for Summary Judgment

The Respondent denies its alleged refusal to bargain,[1] and also attacks the validity of the certification on the basis of its objections to the election in the representation proceeding. Specifically, the Respondent alleges that during the critical period between the filing of the petition and the election, rumors circulated among employees in the unit falsely attributing to Silver, the Respondent's operations manager, statements indicating animus toward persons of Cuban origin (who made up a majority of the unit employees). Thus, according to the credited testimony, Silver was alleged to have said, inter alia, that "these four f— Cubans won't do this to me"; "the f— Cubans were not going to put the Union in there," and even that he "[Silver] was going to terminate all the f— Cubans." The Respondent contends that those rumors, by inflaming ethnic animosities and making the employees believe that Silver would retaliate against them, destroyed the "laboratory conditions" necessary for a valid election.[2]

All representation issues raised by the Respondent were or could have been litigated in the prior representation proceeding. The Respondent does not offer to adduce at a hearing any newly discovered and previously unavailable evidence, nor does it allege any special circumstances that would require the Board to reexamine the decision made in the representation proceeding.

However, the Respondent, citing the Eleventh Circuit's recent decision in M & M Supermarkets v. NLRB,[3] contends that the Board in the representa-

[1] In its answer the Respondent denies that it has information sufficient to admit or deny the allegations of the complaint concerning the filing and service of the charge. The answer further denies that the Union is the exclusive bargaining representative of employees in the unit, that the Union has requested bargaining, and that the Respondent has violated the Act by refusing to bargain.

Concerning the Respondent's qualified denial of the allegations of the complaint relating to the filing and service of the charge, we note that the exhibits accompanying the General Counsel's motion include (1) a copy of the Regional Director's letter to the Respondent, dated November 13, 1987, and marked, "CERTIFIED MAIL—RETURN RECEIPT REQUESTED," stating that the charge in this case has been filed and that a copy of the charge is enclosed; and (2) a copy of a letter from the Respondent's counsel to the Regional Office, dated December 11, 1987 (4 days prior to the issuance of the complaint), stating (inter alia) that "the instant charge is without merit." Although the exhibits contain no return receipt establishing that service of the charge was perfected, neither is there any indication that the charge was not delivered to the Respondent. Moreover, the Respondent does not specifically deny having been served with the charge; it denies having information sufficient to admit or deny either the filing or the service of the charge (or the dates thereof). Although the Respondent may lack first-hand, personal knowledge of the filing of the charge, or of the date of filing, the matter of the service of the charge surely is within its knowledge, and therefore it is not unreasonable to suppose that, if the charge had not been served, the Respondent would have explicitly so stated in its answer or would have pursued this denial further in response to the Motion for Summary Judgment. On the basis of all the foregoing, we conclude that there is no genuine issue of fact concerning the service of the charge.

Concerning the Respondent's denial of having received a request to bargain and having refused to do so, we note that the exhibits appended to the motion include (1) a copy of a certified letter from the Union's counsel to the Respondent, dated October 27, 1987, demanding bargaining; (2) a copy of a letter from the Respondent's counsel to the Union's counsel, dated November 5, 1987, stating that the Respondent "declines" to recognize and bargain with the Union; and (3) counsel for the Respondent's December 11, 1987 letter to the Board Office (discussed above), stating that the Respondent "declines" to recognize and bargain with the Union. The Respondent's answer also admits that the Respondent issued "a document dated November 5, 1987, to which the Board is referred for a true and accurate recitation of its contents." From all the above, we conclude there is no genuine issue of fact that the Union did, indeed, make a demand for bargaining that was refused by the Respondent.

Although the Respondent denies that the Union has been the exclusive representative pursuant to Sec. 9(a) of the unit employees since August 20, 1987, it has admitted the appropriateness of the unit and the issuance and correction of the certification.

In any event, in its opposition to the Motion for Summary Judgment, the Respondent does not rely on any of the above denials, but instead argues only that the election should be set aside because of certain allegedly inflammatory remarks of an ethnic nature made during the critical period before the election. Accordingly, we find that the Respondent's denials raise no material issues of fact warranting a hearing.

tion proceeding erred in failing to apply the standard for evaluating potentially inflammatory statements based on race, as set forth in Sewell Mfg. Co.[4] We disagree, because we are satisfied that the hearing officer, whose report was adopted by the Board in all relevant respects, did apply Sewell to the rumors at issue here. After summarizing the Sewell standard set forth in footnote 4, the hearing officer found that those rumors were based on a statement actually made by Silver;[5] that the Union did not make the statement part of its campaign; that there was no systematic attempt to inject the "racial" issue into the campaign; but that the employees probably had blown the statement out of proportion in the retelling of it. Thus, the hearing officer not only applied the Sewell standard,[6] but also properly found that, under that standard, the rumors imputing ethnic prejudice to Silver did not warrant setting aside the election.[7]

We therefore find that the Respondent has not raised any representation issue that is properly litigable in this unfair labor practice proceeding. See Pittsburgh Plate Glass Co. v. NLRB, 313 U.S. 146, 162 (1941). Accordingly, we grant the Motion for Summary Judgment.

On the entire record, the Board makes the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

The Respondent, a Delaware corporation, engages in the business of air freight forwarding at its facility in Miami, Florida, where in the 12 months preceding the issuance of the complaint, it derived revenues in excess of $50,000 from the transportation of freight and commodities from the State of Florida directly to points outside the State. We find that the Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act and that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Certification

Following the election held May 8, 1986, the Union was certified August 20, 1987, as the collective-bargaining representative of the employees in the following appropriate unit:

> All drivers and warehousemen; excluding all supervisors, office clerical employees, managerial, confidential employees, and guards as defined in the Act.

On October 8, 1987, the Board issued an order correcting the certification by striking the unit just described and substituting the following appropriate unit:

[4] 138 NLRB 66 (1962). In Sewell the Board announced that

> So long, therefore, as a party limits itself to truthfully setting forth another party's position on matters of racial interest and does not deliberately seek to overstress and exacerbate racial feelings by irrelevant, inflammatory appeals, we shall not set aside an election on this ground. However, the burden will be on the party making use of a racial message to establish that it was truthful and germane, and where there is doubt as to whether the total conduct of such party is within the described bounds, the doubt will be resolved against him.

Id. at 71–72 (emphasis in original).

[5] The Respondent contends that the hearing officer held that Silver did not make any anti-Cuban remarks. That contention misstates somewhat the hearing officer's actual findings, which were, in pertinent part:

> It is the finding of the undersigned that Silver did make a statement in effect stating what has been imparted [sic] to him. I do not feel it was borne of malice but merely an attempt by Silver to respond to a question as to who was involved in the organizing drive.[24]
> [24] The thrust of the Employer's argument at the hearing and in its brief was that it would be implausible and illogical for Silver to make an anti-Cuban, bigoted remark, and I agree. I find the intent was not anti-Cuban. In effect, Silver by responding in this manner conveyed to the person who asked the question, that he was aware of who was behind the organizing drive, as identified as Cuban and his displeasure with them for this activity.

(Emphasis added.) It is apparent that the hearing officer found that, irrespective of Silver's attitude toward Cubans, Silver was overheard to make a remark that was interpreted as anti-Cuban.

[6] The hearing officer did set forth the Board's standard for determining whether to invalidate an election because of "third party" conduct, i.e., whether the conduct created a general atmosphere of fear and reprisal, rendering a free choice of representative impossible. See, e.g., Price Bros. Co., 211 NLRB 822, 823 (1974). However, the hearing officer made no finding concerning whether such an atmosphere of fear and reprisal had been created in this case. Instead, he turned to a discussion of Sewell and found the conduct in question here to have been unobjectionable under the Sewell analysis.

[7] We also reject the Respondent's contention that M & M Supermarkets requires that the election in this case be set aside. In M & M Supermarkets, a prounion employee deliberately injected the subject of religion into the campaign by making gratuitous remarks concerning the employer's religion; the court of appeals found those remarks to be so inflammatory as to invalidate the election. Here, by contrast, the employees merely repeated (with varying degrees of accuracy) the claim by Vasquez, an employee of another company, that he had overheard Silver say that he had no problems with Puerto Ricans, and that the only problems he had were with the "f— Cubans" who were trying to cause problems with the union matter in the warehouse. Thus, to the extent ethnic concerns were introduced into the campaign, they were introduced by Silver himself, not by the employees. See Singer Co., 191 NLRB 179, 180 (1971) (declining to set aside election on the basis of inaccurate rumors that the employer's attorney was anti-Spanish, when the rumors arose out of a misunderstanding concerning the attorney's precipitous ejection of a Spanish-language interpreter from the polling area).

In NLRB v. Bancroft Mfg. Co., 516 F.2d 436 (5th Cir. 1975), cert. denied 424 U.S. 914 (1976), a union organizer warned black employees on several occasions that "if the blacks did not stay together and the Union lost the election, all the blacks would be fired." 516 F.2d at 440. The court of appeals found those statements, although untrue, not to be racially inflammatory, or even to constitute attempts to incite racial passions, id. at 442–443, and therefore that they did not invalidate the election. Here, a fortiori, we found not only that no systematic attempt was made to inject ethnic issues into the campaign, but also that rumors about the Respondent's attitudes or intentions concerning Cubans actually originated in a statement by one of the Respondent's own high-ranking managers. The actions of the employees in circulating such rumors do not constitute the kind of gratuitous appeal to ethnic prejudice that Sewell brands as objectionable conduct. See Beatrice Grocery Products, 287 NLRB 302 (1987).

> All warehousemen employed by [Air Express] at its facility located at 2652-2658 N.W. 74th Avenue, Miami, Florida, excluding all other employees including drivers, office clerical employees, professional employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

The Union continues to be the exclusive representative under Section 9(a) of the Act.

B. Refusal to Bargain

Since October 27, 1987, the Union has requested the Respondent to bargain, and since November 5, 1987, the Respondent has refused. We find that this refusal constitutes an unlawful refusal to bargain in violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

By refusing on and after November 5, 1987, to bargain with the Union as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of employees in the appropriate unit, the Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) and Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act, we shall order it to cease and desist, to bargain on request with the Union, and, if an understanding is reached, to embody the understanding in a signed agreement.

To ensure that the employees are accorded the services of their selected bargaining agent for the period provided by law, we shall construe the initial period of the certification as beginning the date the Respondent begins to bargain in good faith with the Union. Mar-Jac Poultry Co., 136 NLRB 785 (1962); Lamar Hotel, 140 NLRB 226, 229 (1962), enfd. 328 F.2d 600 (5th Cir. 1964), cert. denied 379 U.S. 817 (1964); Burnett Construction Co., 149 NLRB 1419, 1421 (1964), enfd. 350 F.2d 57 (10th Cir. 1965).[8]

Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

DECISION ON REVIEW

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On August 14, 1984, the Regional Director for Region 24 administratively determined that the collective-bargaining agreement then in effect between the Employer and the Intervenor, Union Independiente de Trabajadores de Servicios Legales, covering a combined unit of all the Employer's professional and nonprofessional employees, constituted a bar to the conduct of an election herein. Accordingly, she dismissed the instant petition.

Thereafter, in accordance with Section 102.71 of the National Labor Relations Board Rules and Regulations, the Petitioner filed a timely request for review, maintaining, inter alia, that the contract cannot bar its petition to represent only the Employer's professional employees as those professional employees have never had the opportunity to vote for inclusion in a combined unit pursuant to Section 9(b)(1) of the Act.[1]

The Board, by telegraphic order dated November 21, 1984, granted the Petitioner's request for review solely as to this issue and expressly invited the parties to brief the issue on review with particular attention to the policies expressed in Retail Clerks Local 324 (Vincent Drugs), 144 NLRB 1247 (1963), and Pennsylvania Power & Light Co., 122 NLRB 293 (1958), as compared with those expressed in Utah Power & Light Co., 258 NLRB 1059 (1981), and Wells Fargo Corp., 270 NLRB 787 (1984), affd. 755 F.2d 5 (2d Cir. 1985).

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has carefully considered the entire record, including the briefs on review, and has decided to affirm the Regional Director's conclusion that the existing collective-bargaining agreement between the Employer and the Intervenor constitutes a bar to the conduct of an election and, therefore, that the petition must be dismissed.

The basic facts are not in dispute. From 1977 to the date this petition was filed, the Employer and the Intervenor have had successive collective-bargaining agreements that specifically included both professional and nonprofessional employees in a single bargaining unit. The then-current contract, executed on October 14, 1980, expired by its terms on July 1, 1983, but was extended for an additional 3 years by stipulation of the parties. The all-inclusive unit described in the contract was incorporated by reference from the unit originally certified in 1976 by the Puerto Rico Labor Relations Board (Junta de Relaciones del Trabajo de Puerto Rico).[2] It is undisputed that the Puerto Rico labor statutes did not mandate any type of self-determination election before the combined unit was certified, and that none was held.

In finding that the contract barred the election petition, the Regional Director relied on the Board's decision in Pennsylvania Power, supra, in which the petitioner sought to represent a professional unit of engineers and scientists, and the employer sought to include its junior engineers, inasmuch as they also were professional employees who had never voted in a professional unit. The junior engineer classification, however, already was covered by a contract between the employer and another union in a unit that included professional employees. Although conceding the junior engineers were professionals, the Board excluded them from the unit sought on contract-bar grounds.[3]

This policy was reaffirmed in Vincent Drugs, supra, in which the Board distinguished the issue in that case (the validity of an existing contract covering a unit of both professionals and nonprofessionals that had been established by the parties) from the issue presented in Leedom v. Kyne, 358 U.S. 184 (1958) (whether a combined unit of professionals and nonprofessionals could be established initially

[1] Sec. 9(b)(1) provides, in pertinent part, that the Board shall not decide that any unit is appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining ". . . if such unit includes both professional employees and employees who are not professional employees unless a majority of professional employees vote for inclusion in such unit."

To carry out the statutory requirement, the Board has adopted a special type of self-determination procedure known as a Sonotone election, whereby the ballots used for the professional employees ask two questions: (1) whether they desire to be included in a group composed of nonprofessional employees; and (2) their choice with respect to a bargaining representative. See Sonotone Corp., 90 NLRB 1236 (1950). If the majority of professionals vote "yes" on inclusion, their votes are counted with those of the nonprofessionals; if the majority vote "no," their votes are counted separately to determine which labor organization, if any, they want to represent them in a separate unit.

[2] The Board will recognize the validity of a state certification where the election procedure was free of irregularities and reflected the true desires of the employees. See St. Luke's Hospital Center, 221 NLRB 1314, 1315–1316 (1976), enfd. 551 F.2d 476 (2d Cir. 1976). The record in this case does not disclose the circumstances under which the parties became subject to the jurisdiction of the National Labor Relations Act.

[3] 122 NLRB at 294 fn. 2. The Board found no merit in the contention that, because the junior engineers had never exercised their right to vote as professional employees under Sec. 9(b)(1) of the Act, the contract bar rule did not apply. Accord: Westinghouse Electric Corp., 116 NLRB 1545, 1546 (1956); Westinghouse Electric Corp., 112 NLRB 590, 592 (1955), enfd. 236 F.2d 939 (3d Cir. 1956). See also *S.S. White Dental Mfg. by the Board without first affording the professional employees a self-determination election).[4]

In requesting that the parties brief the issue on review, the Board was concerned that Utah Power, supra, and Wells Fargo, supra, may have undermined the application of the contract-bar rule as applied to a mixed professional-nonprofessional unit where a separate professional unit is sought. However, a close reading of those cases has shown that the holding of Pennsylvania Power, supra, and its forerunners has not been so eclipsed.

Utah Power involved the separate and distinct question of what is the appropriate unit in a decertification election where the recognized unit was a mixed one of professionals and nonprofessionals. In decertification elections, the voting unit generally must be coextensive with the certified or recognized unit;[5] however, because the professional employees had never had an opportunity to vote in a self-determination election as authorized by Section 9(b)(1), the Board concluded that an exception to the general rule was warranted and therefore the professionals by themselves could vote on continued representation and it was not necessary that the election be conducted in the existing, all-inclusive unit.

The facts of the instant case parallel Utah Power only insofar as it is the professional employees here who seek to take themselves out of the mixed unit. Thus, while Utah Power would authorize the Board to entertain a decertification petition seeking a unit of only the professional employees, we find nothing in that opinion which suggests that such a petition may be filed at any time, even during the period of a collective-bargaining agreement. Indeed, the Board in Utah Power observed that the petition there "was initiated at an appropriate time,"[6] although it cannot be determined from the decision the status of the contract at the time of the filing. In any event, if the Board in Utah Power intended to remove the contract-bar rule as a impediment in such cases, it surely would have done so in a more forthright manner, particularly in the face of Pennsylvania Power and other authorities.

Similarly, Wells Fargo offers no support for overruling Pennsylvania Power and Vincent Drugs. That case involved an interpretation of Section 9(b)(3), which bars the Board from certifying a mixed unit of guards and nonguard employees, or from certifying a union as the representative of a guard union if the union admits nonguards as members. The Board specifically noted in Wells Fargo that Section 9(b)(1) was inapplicable to that case, and that it would not read into Section 9(b)(3) the various legislative comments directed toward Section 9(b)(1) of the Act.[7] If Wells Fargo has any pertinence to the instant case, it actually buttresses the applicability of the contract-bar doctrine here. In enforcing the Board's conclusion in Wells Fargo that the employer was privileged, following expiration of its collective-bargaining agreement with the mixed guard union, to withdraw recognition, the Second Circuit specifically noted the continuing viability of the Board's decision in Burns Detective Agency,[8] that "[a]n employer who voluntarily recognizes a mixed guard union may not discontinue the relationship during the contract period."[9]

Finding contract-bar principles inapplicable to the present case would be contrary to the Board's general approach toward employers' voluntary recognition of collective-bargaining representatives. In a mixed unit of professional and nonprofessional employees, as with most other units, an employer under the general rules of voluntary recognition need only be satisfied that the union has the majority support of the entire unit.[10] Board law has never intimated that an employer can predicate voluntary recognition only on separate demonstrations of majority support from professionals and nonprofessionals. Moreover, as the Board explained in Vincent Drugs, the legislative history of Section 9(b)(1) does not demonstrate an outright hostility to voluntarily recognized mixed units. Neither Utah Power nor Wells Fargo presented any new evidence to impeach this earlier interpretation.

We point out that in the instant case there were legally recognized opportunities during the window periods in 1980 and again in 1983 in which to file a timely petition. There is no evidence to suggest that the professional employees were precluded from availing themselves of those opportunities. Given this bargaining history, we conclude that it is not unreasonable to defer the exercise of the professional employees' right of self-determination until the end of the then-current contract.

Further, we note that the contract-bar doctrine is but another instance of the Board's striking an accommodation among three competing interests: the freedom of an employer and a union to enter into a collective-bargaining relationship, the stability of bargaining relations once established, and employee freedom of choice—all of which underlie the Act's ultimate goal of fostering industrial peace.[11] Thus, for a limited period of time, employee choice as to union representation is subordinated to the goal of fostering the stability that can come about through a freely established bargaining contract. Accordingly, and inasmuch as Congress, in its enactment of Section 9(b)(1) in 1947, said nothing to restrict the application of the contract-bar doctrine, we conclude that it is applicable in this case, or perhaps more accurately, that this case does not constitute an exception to that established doctrine, and we affirm the Regional Director's dismissal of the petition.

In Vincent Drugs, the specific issue before the Board was whether the union had violated Sec. 8(b)(1)(A) and (2) of the Act by attempting to have a professional employee who had never joined the union discharged through use of the union-security clause in a contract covering a combined unit.

See also Deluxe Metal Furniture Co., 121 NLRB 995 (1958), as modified by Leonard Wholesale Meats, 136 NLRB 1000 (1962) (time for filing petitions). The legislative history of the 1947 Taft-Hartley amendments shows that the amendments authorizing employer and employee representation petitions (Sec. 9(c)(1)(A) and (B)) were not intended to affect the contract-bar rule. The House bill, H.R. 3020, as reported, did not explicitly address the continuing applicability of the contract-bar doctrine, but the bill was attacked on the grounds that it would effectively eliminate the rule and allow the processing of a representation petition at any time. H. Rep. No. 245, 80th Cong. 1st Sess. 88-89 (1947) (minority report), reprinted in 1 Legislative History of the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947, at 376-377 (1959) (Leg. Hist.). Sec. 9(c)(1) in the Senate bill, S. 1126, as reported and passed by the Senate as an amendment to H.R. 3020, referred to the filing of petitions "in accordance with such regulations as may be prescribed by the Board" (1 Leg. Hist. 245), and the Senate report expressly stated that nothing in Sec. 9(c)(1) was intended to affect "the present Board's rules of decisions with respect to dismissal of petitions by reason of . . . an outstanding collective agreement as a bar to an election." S. Rep. No. 105, 80th Cong., 1st Sess. 25 (1947). "In other words," the report explained, "the Board could still dismiss an employee or employer petition if a valid contract were still in effect." Id. It was the Senate language that was finally enacted. (We note, of course, that in 1947 the bar period was only 1 year. It was not until 1962, in General Cable Corp., 139 NLRB 1123 (1962), that the Board extended the bar period to 3 years.)

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On July 29, 1986, Administrative Law Judge James L. Rose issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a brief, the General Counsel filed cross-exceptions and a brief, and the Respondent, the General Counsel, and the Charging Party filed answering briefs.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions, cross-exceptions, and briefs and has decided to affirm certain of the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions and to reverse others, as set forth below.

1. The Respondent operates a television broadcasting station. At the hearing the parties stipulated that about August 30, 1985, the Respondent eliminated unilaterally its production department without bargaining with the Union as bargaining representative of the employees[1] and that the decision to eliminate the department resulted in the layoff of three bargaining unit employees. The judge found that the failure to bargain over this decision violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act. The Respondent contends that the decision to eliminate the production department did not turn on labor costs within the meaning of Otis Elevator Co., 269 NLRB 891 (1984), and, therefore, there was no duty to bargain regarding this matter. We find merit in the Respondent's contention and find that the decision to eliminate the production department was not a mandatory subject of bargaining.

In addition to its broadcasting of television programing and the sale of commercial air time, the Respondent also maintained a production department that produced commercial and public affairs programing. In February 1985 the Respondent's general manager-vice president, Douglas Johnson, met with two of the three employees in the production department, Carl Scott and Robert Schade. According to Scott, Johnson indicated that the Respondent was concerned with the falling revenues of the production department. Johnson produced accounting ledgers to the employees and stated, according to Scott, that in 1984 production income had fallen to $6900 while production salaries had reached $184,000. Johnson pointed out that since 1982 production income had "gone way down" and production salaries had "gone way up." It is undisputed that production income formerly was in the range of $100,000 annually.

Johnson asked Scott and Schade to survey the production rates that production companies and other television stations charged their clients. Johnson also asked the production employees to work more closely with the Respondent's sales department in order to help generate more production income. Scott testified that Johnson advised them that unless the production department generated greater income, continuation of the production department would be in jeopardy.[2] The record shows, and the judge found, that the Respondent thereafter increased its efforts to obtain additional customer use of its production department and to increase commercial production. General Manager Johnson testified in this regard that many of the Respondent's competitors had special effects equipment that the Respondent did not possess, but that it was determined that obtaining such equipment was not economically justified.

The uncontroverted testimony of General Manager Johnson establishes that 6 months after his February 1985 meeting with Scott and Schade, and despite the increased efforts to increase commercial business, production "did not increase one iota." Indeed, the judge found that the production department was not economically viable.[3] On August 30, 1985, the Respondent decided to eliminate the production department and did so without bargaining with the Union. The production department's three employees were terminated.

In Otis Elevator Co., 269 NLRB 891 (1984), the Board held that management decisions that affect the basic direction or nature of the business are excluded from the mandatory bargaining subjects described in Section 8(d). The critical factor, as identified by the Board plurality, is whether the decision turns upon a change in the nature or direction of the business, or turns upon labor costs. Id. at 892. In the instant case, the judge found summarily that "the primary factor appears to have been the production department salaries against revenues"

[1] The parties stipulated that on August 30, 1985, the Union was certified as bargaining representative of all employees of the Respondent directly involved in the production, presentation, and transmission of programs.

[2] The judge concluded erroneously that there was no discussion at this time concerning the possibility of eliminating the production department.

[3] There is no contention that the decision to eliminate the production department was motivated by anything other than valid business reasons. Accordingly, we disavow the judge's comments that the timing of the decision in relation to the employees' designation of the Union as their bargaining representative "suggests discrimination in the Respondent's August 30 decision."

and that the decision, therefore, turned substantially upon labor costs. Thus, the judge found that General Manager Johnson's express reference to salaries in relation to declining income at the February 1985 meeting with employees Scott and Schade established that the predominant reason for elimination of the production department was labor costs. We disagree.

Contrary to the judge, we are unable to find under the circumstances of this case that the Respondent's decision turned upon labor costs simply by virtue of General Manager Johnson's reference to salaries at the February 1985 meeting. Thus, the evidence is clear that the production department had suffered a precipitous decline in revenues from approximately $100,000 to, at most, $6900.[4] General Manager Johnson attempted to increase revenues thereafter through increased sales efforts to no effect. Further, it is uncontradicted that the Respondent's efforts to do so were limited by the absence of certain special effects equipment that it decided was not cost effective to procure. After a 6-month effort, income generated by the production department remained unchanged.

On these facts, we find that the essence of the decision to eliminate the production department was based on the failure of that department to generate revenues sufficient to justify its continued existence; that consequently it did not constitute a mandatory subject of bargaining because it turned on a fundamental change in the direction of its business.[5] Thus, the Respondent was faced with a situation in which a department employing three employees and utilizing equipment at hand generated income that was, beyond question, extremely low and essentially nominal in character. Although Johnson made specific reference at the February 1985 meeting to $184,000 in production department salaries, and perhaps this played a role in triggering an attempt to increase revenues, it does not follow that the decision, therefore, must have "turned upon" labor costs. Inland Steel Container Co., 275 NLRB 929, 937 (1985), enfd. sub nom. Steelworkers Local 2179 v. NLRB, 822 F.2d 559 (5th Cir. 1987). Rather, it appears that production revenues were so low that, in the absence of a substantial increase in income, the department was not economically viable irrespective of salary levels. In this context, the logical import of Johnson's reference to increasing salary levels, in relation to decreasing income, was to demonstrate the plight of the department and to impress on the employees the need to increase revenues. This likelihood is supported by Johnson's contemporaneous instructions to coordinate matters with the Respondent's sales department and by Johnson's comments that, unless the production department generated greater income, its future would be in jeopardy. Accordingly, we shall dismiss that portion of the complaint alleging that the Respondent unlawfully eliminated the production department without bargaining with the Union.

2. The judge also found that even if the decision to eliminate the production department was not a mandatory subject of bargaining, the Respondent still had the obligation to negotiate with the Union concerning the effects of that decision on wages, hours, and employment conditions of bargaining unit employees. The Respondent contends in its exceptions that the complaint did not encompass any allegations that the Respondent failed to bargain over effects, as found by the judge. We find merit in the Respondent's exception.

With regard to the elimination of the production department, the complaint alleged in its entirety that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) when it "unilaterally eliminated the production department, resulting in the lay off of three employees without bargaining with the Charging Party." As contended by the Respondent, the complaint does not allege a separate unlawful refusal to bargain over the effects of the elimination of the department on wages, hours, and employment conditions. More particularly, the allegedly unlawful conduct placed in issue by the General Counsel was the Respondent's failure to bargain over the decision to eliminate the production department, i.e., the unilateral discontinuance of the production department without first bargaining with the Union. Indeed, at the hearing the parties limited the factual issues to be litigated by stipulating that the Respondent took unilateral action without bargaining "over the decision to eliminate the department." Further, neither the General Counsel nor the Union contended at the hearing or in their posthearing briefs that the Respondent had not only failed to bargain over the decision to eliminate the production department but also separately failed to bargain in violation of the Act over the effects of that decision.[6] Accordingly, we agree with the Respondent that the issues litigated did not encompass the effects-bargaining violation found by the judge, and we shall delete those findings from our Order.[7]

[4] Although employee Scott testified that Johnson described 1984 production income as $6900, Johnson testified that it was in the range of $4000–5000.

[5] These findings are warranted under any of the views expressed in Otis Elevator Co., supra.

[6] We also note that although both the General Counsel and the Union filed answering briefs in response to the Respondent's exceptions, neither party took issue with the Respondent's contentions regarding the judge's allegedly erroneous findings as to effects bargaining.

3. By letter dated November 11, 1985, the Union requested certain information from the Respondent pertaining to the following matters: the reasons for the termination of bargaining unit employees Joseph Pzenowagis, Robert Schade, and Carl Scott; accompanying documents referring to that decision; the status of in-house production work; the status of public service broadcasting spots; production service subcontracting; duties of the chief operator; and bargaining unit work being performed by supervisory personnel.

That same day, November 11, 1985, the Union signed the unfair labor practice charge, officially filed on November 12, 1985, alleging that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) by unilaterally changing terms and conditions of employment of bargaining unit employees, assigning quasi-supervisory duties to unit employees, terminating and discriminating against employees, and refusing to provide requested information.

By letter dated December 4, 1985, the Respondent, through Labor Relations Director Shirley Moore, responded to the Union's information request. The letter, noting that the request was filed only 1 day prior to the filing of the unfair labor practice charge, advised the Union that most of the requested information would be provided to the Board in the course of the investigation and that, as a result, the Respondent would not provide the information directly to the Union. By letter of December 6, 1985, the Union demanded that the requested information be supplied directly to the Union. On December 31, 1985, the Regional Director for Region 7 issued the complaint in this case. Thereafter, by letter of January 8, 1986, counsel for the Respondent provided the Union with a copy of its position statement submitted to the Region in connection with the investigation of this case. Counsel for the Respondent indicated in the letter that the Union should advise her in the event that additional questions remained unanswered and that an attempt would be made to provide appropriate responses. The parties stipulated that there was no response to the January 8, 1986 letter. There is no evidence that the Union otherwise sought to bargain over the matters contained in the unfair labor practice charge and in the November 11, 1985 request for information.

The judge found that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) by not providing the requested information. The Respondent excepts to that finding, contending that under the circumstances presented in this case, the Union's request for information was not for the purpose of collective bargaining but was for a purpose related to its unfair labor practice charge. We find merit to this contention and reverse the judge's finding of a violation.

It is axiomatic that a collective-bargaining representative is entitled to information relevant and necessary to the proper discharge of its duties as the collective-bargaining representative. NLRB v. Truitt Mfg. Co., 351 U.S. 149 (1955). In the instant case, however, it appears that the Union elected to pursue resolution of the matters sought in its November 11, 1985 request for information through the Board's unfair labor practice procedures rather than through the collective-bargaining process. Thus, on the same day that it requested information from the Respondent, the Union signed, and by the next day had filed, an unfair labor practice charge raising virtually the identical matters sought in the information request—the unilateral elimination of the production department, the elimination of unit work by unilateral creation of a supervisory position, and the discriminatory termination of employees because of their union activities. Indeed, the unfair labor practice charge alleges that the Respondent unlawfully failed to provide information, pertaining to the very matters contained in the information request made on the same day that the charge was prepared.

Thus, before the Respondent even had knowledge of the request for information, let alone an opportunity to respond, the Union was charging it with violating the Act by failing to provide the requested information. Further, apart from the information request itself, there is no evidence that the Union initiated any contact whatsoever with the Respondent in any bargaining context regarding the matters contained in the information request and the unfair labor practice charge. Thus, it is evident that the Union chose to prosecute these matters through the Board's unfair labor practice procedures rather than to bargain with the Respondent. Its information request, therefore, under the facts of this case, was akin to a discovery device pertinent to its pursuit of the unfair labor practice charge rather than to its duties as collective-bargaining representative. Huck Mfg. Co., 254 NLRB 739, 755 (1981); American Oil Co., 171 NLRB 1180, 1188 (1968). Accordingly, we shall dismiss that portion of the complaint alleging that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) by failing to provide information.[8] [7] We find this case factually distinguishable from the Board's recent decision in Litton Business Systems, 286 NLRB 817 (1987). In that case, the Board found that an employer violated Sec. 8(a)(5) and (1) by refusing to bargain over its decision to lay off unit employees as an effect of its decision to convert its plant machinery to a new process. In Litton, however, in contrast to the instant case, the complaint separately alleged an unlawful failure to bargain over "the decision to lay off employees," and effects bargaining issues were fully litigated. Id. at fn. 7. Further, in Litton the General Counsel did not contend to the Board that the underlying decision to convert the machinery was a mandatory subject of bargaining, thereby framing the issue to be decided, under the facts of that case, as pertaining to the decision to lay off employees. Here, the issue litigated by the General Counsel was whether the unilateral decision to eliminate the department entirely was a mandatory subject of bargaining because it turned on labor costs; and, as noted, neither the General Counsel nor the Union made any specific contention regarding an effects bargaining violation.

4. We agree with the judge that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) by refusing to reinstate employee JoAnn Thompson.[9] In adopting the judge's findings, however, we note, in addition to the judge's analysis of the Respondent's defense,[10] the following with respect to the evidence pertinent to the Respondent's evidentiary burden under Wright Line, 251 NLRB 1083 (1980)—a burden which, like the judge, we find the Respondent has not carried.

Thompson began her employment with the Respondent in 1983. On September 6, 1985, Thompson commenced an approved unpaid pregnancy leave of absence for the birth of her child. For several weeks prior to her leave of absence, she worked in the Respondent's traffic department as a traffic assistant preparing "facility sheets." The facility sheets prepared by Thompson contain titles and segment times for commercials and instruct the station's engineers when commercials are to be aired.

Commercials, however, are often not aired, and during each month the Respondent prepares "preemption forms" that contain information concerning each commercial that was not broadcast. Preemptions may occur in connection with an error in the preparation of facility sheets in the traffic department or they may occur because of broadcast scheduling that does not permit the commercial spot. It is clear, however, that they occur in the regular course of business. It is also clear that the airing of commercials provides the principal source of income for the Respondent, and that when a commercial is not broadcast, i.e., "preempted," the Respondent does not get paid for it.

About November 1, 1985, Thompson sought to return to her traffic assistant position. Her request was denied. The Respondent, through General Manager Douglas Johnson, advised Thompson by letter of November 1, 1985, that she would not be reinstated because her job performance prior to the approval of her leave had been unsatisfactory. Johnson indicated further that Thompson's former position would be eliminated shortly and would be performed automatically by computer.[11]

The Respondent contends that Thompson was not reinstated because of her unsatisfactory job performance in the preparation of facility sheets. More specifically, the Respondent asserts that it lost substantial revenues from Thompson's errors in preparing facility sheets, as a result of which a number of commercials were preempted, and hence no payment was received. Contrary to the Respondent, we find that the Respondent has failed to establish that Thompson would not have been reinstated, for the reason asserted by it, even without her union activities.

At the outset, we note that, as the judge found, the amount of revenue loss caused by the failure to broadcast preempted commercials normally is in the range of approximately $3000 monthly. During Thompson's tenure in writing facility sheets, essentially around August 1985, the revenues lost because of preempted commercials totaled $3630. According to the preemption forms for that period, $2060 was attributed to facility sheets prepared by Thompson and $1570 to other sources. Critically, the Respondent presented no documentary evidence for any other monthly period detailing the usual monthly breakdown of revenue losses contained in its preemption forms, notwithstanding that the Respondent admittedly had in its possession thousands of commercial contracts for a 12-month period, containing numerous preemption forms.[12]

[8] Further, to the extent the November 11, 1985 request pertained to the decision to eliminate the production department, it did not concern a mandatory subject of bargaining and, therefore, the Respondent was not obligated to provide requested information bearing on that decision. UOP Inc., 272 NLRB 999, 1000 (1984); Otis Elevator Co., supra at 894.

In agreeing with his colleagues that the Respondent did not violate Sec. 8(a)(5) and (1) by failing to furnish the requested information, Member Johansen relies on the fact that there had been no refusal to the Union's sole request for the information when it filed its charge alleging such a refusal.

[9] We adopt the judge's findings that the General Counsel met her burden under Wright Line to establish that Thompson's union activities were a motivating factor in the failure to reinstate, noting Thompson's role as a union activist, the Respondent's knowledge of Thompson's role, and the disparate treatment directed toward Thompson in comparison to all other employees who took pregnancy leave, all of whom were reinstated upon application.

[10] In rejecting the Respondent's defense for not reinstating Thompson, the judge concluded "that the Respondent's contention that Thompson was an incompetent employee was a pure fabrication." He deemed the evidence submitted to show her alleged incompetence to be "unpersuasive" and "not credible." Although these conclusions of the judge suggest that he viewed the Respondent's assertions as purely pretextual, he nevertheless appears to have considered the merits of those assertions on their own terms.

[11] The parties stipulated that about November 19, 1985, the Respondent unsuccessfully attempted to use a computer program to automate the "facility function" in the traffic department and that the department has operated subsequently in the same manner as it had prior to August 1985.

[12] The judge noted that the Respondent "brought forth approximately nine boxes of materials representing contracts for about 6 months before and 6 months after the events of this matter which contained many of the preemption sheets." The only preemption sheets introduced into evidence, however, were the sheets placed in Thompson's file during the period she was employed in the traffic department.

More particularly, the record contains no probative documentary evidence concerning relative percentage of revenue losses normally attributable to the errors in the traffic department, as distinguished from scheduling events, or the relative percentage of traffic department errors normally attributable to the employee occupying the position occupied by Thompson during her tenure in the traffic department.[13] Further, the total amount of revenue lost during Thompson's traffic department tenure ($3630) is not disproportionate to the norm ("approximately" $3000), and $1570 of the revenue losses during that period was attributable to other sources. Indeed, even if it is assumed that the total revenue losses during the period Thompson performed as a traffic assistant exceeded the monthly average by $630, that amount conceivably may have been wholly or primarily attributable to disproportionate losses from sources outside the traffic department during that period.

In short, even assuming that revenue losses of $2060 were attributable to Thompson's preparation of facility sheets, the Respondent has not demonstrated that Thompson's job performance exceeded the usual range of preemption losses which the Respondent itself tolerated in the normal course of business.[14] Accordingly, we adopt the judge's finding that the failure to reinstate Thompson violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

5. We agree with the judge that the Respondent coercively interrogated employee Carl Scott in violation of Section 8(a)(1). The record shows that several days before the Board-conducted election in August 1985, pursuant to which the Union was certified as bargaining representative, General Manager and Vice President Douglas Johnson called production department employee Carl Scott into a management office. This meeting was one of a series of meetings conducted by Johnson with individual employees during the week preceding the election. At the outset of the meeting with Scott, Johnson indicated that he did not care one way or the other about the Union and that if it was time for the Union to come in or not, it did not make much difference. Johnson then asked Scott whether he was in favor of the Union. After Scott indicated he was not in favor of the Union, Johnson stated that Scott should not worry about their conversation the previous February regarding the future of the production department. Johnson also stated, in reference to the Union, that "he wanted to squash this thing and squash it big." The judge also found that Johnson told Scott that voting the Union in was akin to a slap in the face to management.[15]

Applying Sunnyvale Medical Center, 277 NLRB 1217 (1985), we find that Johnson's interrogation of Scott under the circumstances reasonably tended to restrain, coerce, or interfere with Section 7 rights. First, we note that the inquiry was made by a high management official, Johnson, who occupied the positions of general manager and vice president and who, the previous February, had informed production employee Scott that the future of the production department was in jeopardy. Thus, at the time of the inquiry, Scott was aware that Johnson essentially was reevaluating the future of Scott's job status. Indeed, Johnson's oblique reference to their February conversation served to emphasize this reality. Second, the inquiry took place in a one-to-one encounter in a management office only days before the representation election, and the nature of the information sought in this encounter concerned Scott's preference in that election. Third, considering the encounter as a whole, the interrogation occurred in the context of Johnson's highly charged expressions of hostility toward the Union. Thus, Johnson indicated to Scott that he wanted to "squash" the Union and "squash it big" and expressed the view that a favorable vote for the Union would be a slap in the face to management. Although at the outset of the encounter Johnson expressed assurances of neutrality regarding the Union, these assurances were directly contradicted by his subsequent comments, and could not be taken at face value. In these circumstances, we agree with the judge that the interrogation violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.[16]

REMEDY

Having concluded that the Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, we shall order the Respondent to cease and desist and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.[17]

---

[13] The traffic department is composed of a traffic manager, a traffic assistant, and another individual whose specific duties are not detailed in the record.

[14] We also note that apart from the absence of probative documentary evidence, the judge found that Traffic Manager Petrykowski's testimony regarding Thompson's job performance was not credible.

[15] In finding that an interrogation regarding Scott's union sympathies took place, it appears that the judge credited elements of both Scott's version of the conversation and elements of Johnson's version. Thus, the judge found that Johnson stated that employees' voting for the Union would be considered a slap in the face of management, which is consistent with Johnson's version, whereas Scott's version is that Johnson indicated that if the employees voted in the Union, "it was just like the employees saying, fuck you, management." Further, Scott testified, as found by the judge, that Johnson asked him whether he was for the Union, whereas Johnson testified that he did not ask Scott what his feelings were with regard to the Union and that Scott voluntarily indicated he was not for the Union. None of the parties filed exceptions to the judge's resolutions of credibility.

[16] We find no merit to the Respondent's contention that the judge erred in not permitting the Respondent's counsel to question Scott regarding whether he subjectively perceived himself to be coerced.

Having concluded that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by unilaterally creating a new supervisory position to include bargaining unit work, without bargaining with the Union,[18] we shall order the Respondent, if the Union so desires, to rescind the position of assistant chief operator. Kendall College, 228 NLRB 1083 (1977).

Having concluded that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by refusing to reinstate employee JoAnn Thompson to her former position, we shall order the Respondent to offer JoAnn Thompson immediate and full reinstatement to her former job or, if that job no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to her seniority or any other rights or privileges previously enjoyed, and make her whole for any loss or earnings and other benefits she may have suffered in accordance with the provisions of F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), with interest to be computed in the manner prescribed in New Horizons for the Retarded.[19]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, WXON-TV, Inc., Southfield, Michigan, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

JAMES L. ROSE, Administrative Law Judge. This matter was tried before me at Detroit, Michigan, on 14 and 15 April 1986, on the General Counsel's complaint that alleged that the Respondent engaged in certain violations of Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act (29 U.S.C. § 151 et seq.)[1]

In brief it is alleged that the Respondent unlawfully interrogated an employee, discriminated against an employee by refusing to reinstate her following a maternity leave of absence, and breached its obligations to bargain in good faith by: unilaterally eliminating the production department (resulting in the layoff of three bargaining unit employees), unilaterally creating a supervisory position and vesting it with bargaining unit duties, unilaterally transferring bargaining unit work to supervisors, and refusing to furnish the Charging Party certain requested information.[2]

The Respondent generally denied that it committed any unfair labor practices and affirmatively contends that JoAnn Foggie Thompson[3] was not reinstated following her maternity leave of absence because of poor work performance. The Respondent contends that whether to eliminate the production department was not a mandatory subject of bargaining, and therefore its decision could be made unilaterally. The Respondent contends that during the course of the investigation of the charges it furnished the information requested by the Charging Party. The Respondent argues there was no change in the bargaining unit work done by supervisors; and finally, the Respondent denies that the interrogation of employees was unlawful.

On the record as a whole, including my observation of the witnesses, briefs, and arguments of counsel, I issue the following

FINDINGS OF FACT AND CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

I. JURISDICTION

The Respondent is a Michigan corporation engaged in the operation of an independent UHF television broadcasting station. In this business, the Respondent annually has gross revenues in excess of $500,000, and broadcasts nationally advertised products the revenue from which exceeds $50,000, utilizes national news services for which it pays in excess of $10,000, and has purchased goods, products, and materials with value in excess of $50,000 directly from points outside the State of Michigan. The Respondent admits, and I find, that it is an employer engaged in interstate commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

National Association of Broadcast Employees and Technicians, AFL-CIO (the Union) is admitted to be, and I find is, a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background Facts

Douglas Johnson is the Respondent's vice president and general manager. A. J. Johnson, his father, is the chairman of the board of directors and president. In February 1985,[4] Douglas Johnson called into his office Carl Scott and Bob Schade, two of the three production department employees, and discussed with them the general lack of productivity in that department. According to Scott's testimony, Johnson said that for 1984 the production department salaries were $184,000 while the department income was $6900. This compared unfavorably with the preceding years, but was consistent with the trend. Revenues for the production department had been going down with the salaries going up.

[1] The charge was filed on 12 November 1985, and the complaint issued on 31 December 1985.

[2] Other allegations of 8(a)(5) violations were alleged in the complaint but either were withdrawn or no evidence was offered concerning them. Thus, the allegations summarized above were the only ones litigated.

[3] This spelling is from her signature on an exhibit. The transcript is in error and is corrected.

[4] All dates are in 1985 unless otherwise indicated.

Notwithstanding these figures, there apparently was no discussion at that time between management and employees concerning the possibility of eliminating the production department. Indeed, the Respondent's sales manager, Sandy Henry, testified that during the spring, the sales department was increased and sales efforts included pitching to potential customers the fact that the Respondent had its own production capability.

Other than these two events, the record is devoid of any evidence concerning the status of the production department from early 1985 until the Respondent determined to eliminate it on 30 August.

Sometime in 1985, the Union began an organizational campaign among the Respondent's employees. Active in this campaign was bargaining unit employee JoAnn Thompson. A representation hearing was held on 7 June at which she appeared as a witness on behalf of the Union. Although it is unclear from the record the disposition of that hearing, an election was in fact held among the Employer's bargaining unit employees[5] in which a majority voted in favor of representation by the Union. Thus, the parties stipulated that on 30 August the Union was certified as the employees' bargaining representative.

On that date, as noted above, the Respondent eliminated its production department and subsequently the three production department employees were terminated—Carl Scott and Robert Schade effective 13 September and Joe Dzenowagis effective 20 September.

Prior to the election, which apparently was sometime in August, Douglas Johnson individually called into his office most, if not all, of the bargaining unit employees and asked them, according to his testimony, about their "concerns." Johnson's discussion with Scott along these lines is alleged to have been violative of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

On 23 September, the Respondent created a new supervisory position of assistant chief operator, which job included supervisory responsibilities as well as duties previously performed by the bargaining unit position of assistant chief operator. It is agreed that the Respondent gave no notice to the Union prior to creating this position.

And in connection with this, Gary King was promoted from the bargaining unit position of assistant chief operator to the supervisory position of chief operator but he continued to perform bargaining unit duties in addition to those supervisory duties of chief operator. The promotion and the continued performance of these duties by King was without notification to or bargaining with the Union.

On 11 November, counsel for the Union wrote Douglas Johnson asking to be furnished certain information with regard to the termination of the production department employees and the promotion of Gary King and another employee. This letter was answered on 4 December by Shirley L. Moore, the Respondent's director of labor relations, who stated that as a result of the Union having filed a charge with the Board, the information requested would be furnished during the course of the investigation and "as a result, we will not be providing the information directly to you."

On 6 December, counsel for the Union replied to that letter stating that the Union demanded the information be furnished directly. On 8 January 1986, counsel for the Respondent sent to the Union a position statement that had been submitted to the Board in connection with the investigation of the instant matter. The Respondent contends that this position statement contains all the information requested by the Union to which it is entitled.

JoAnn Thompson was hired as a film editor in 1983 and worked in that job until July 1985, at which time she was transferred to the traffic department, apparently as a result of reduced work available for film editors. In the traffic department Thompson, along with others, was responsible for writing up "facility sheets." These are instructions to the engineering department concerning the time when certain commercials are to be aired. According to the Respondent, in this work Thompson made a "costly amount of errors," whereas for others with the same training "errors were few."

On 16 August, Thompson wrote a memo to her supervisor stating that "as per company policy" (which she testified, uncontradictedly, she learned from A. J. Johnson) she wished to take pregnancy leave for 90 days beginning with the date of her delivery, which was estimated to be 28 August. She in fact left work on 6 September.

About 1 November she requested her job back effective 4 November but was advised by letter of 1 November from Douglas Johnson that she would not be rehired in the traffic department because "the work you were assigned was not done properly and accurately." He went on to say that the job was going to be computerized, and thus there would be no work for her in that department in any event. He indicated that should a job come open for which she was qualified, she would be considered.[6]

B. Analysis and Concluding Findings

1. Interrogation

Douglas Johnson testified in connection with his interrogation of Carl Scott, as well as the others, "that I was not concerned with how they voted. I wanted to make that perfectly clear at the outset, that I wasn't concerned about their feelings about the union." He went on to testify, however, that he had set up these meetings individually with the employees the week prior to the election in order to discuss "their individual needs and concerns," and "was the primary reason to find out if there were any common elements that in fact were taking place or in fact any individual concerns."

[5] It is alleged and admitted that the appropriate bargaining unit within the meaning of Sec. 9(b) of the Act is:

> All employees employed by WXON-TV, Inc., in Southfield, Michigan, who are directly involved in the production, presentation and transmission of programs, including on-air personnel, technicians, production technicians, maintenance technicians, film editors and the shipping and receiving clerk; but excluding clerical employees, salespersons, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

[6] Although Johnson in his letter refers to Thompson's job as being a "clerical position," which apparently would be one excluded from the bargaining unit, there is no contention that Thompson was not in fact a bargaining unit employee at the time she entered on maternity leave, nor that the position for which she sought reinstatement following her pregnancy is a bargaining unit position.

Johnson further testified he told Scott, "that in fact if they voted in the Union, it could be construed as a slap in the face to management. That is what I said."

According to Scott, Johnson called him into the chief engineer's office and asked if he was "in favor of the union coming in." Scott said, " no." Johnson then told Scott not to worry about what had happened in February (apparently referring to the discussion concerning the production department) and, according to Scott, Johnson said, "He wanted to squash this thing and squash it big."

Although the testimony of Scott and Johnson concerning this event differ in some minor respects, Johnson did not deny Scott's testimony that he said he wanted "to squash this thing and squash it big." That statement, along with Johnson's admission that a vote by employees for the Union would be considered "a slap in the face of management," clearly removes the interrogation from the type approved by the Board in Rossmore House, 269 NLRB 1176 (1984).

The interrogation concerning an employee's union sympathies took place the week prior to an election during which the Company's chief operating officer stated that he wanted to squash the Union and that voting for the Union would be considered a slap in the face of management. Such aggressive comments imply more than innocent inquiry. Johnson's systematic interrogation of employees was not the benign, trivial, or isolated type of interrogation that sometimes the Board has concluded is not unlawful. Here, Johnson in fact interrogated employees in an effort to assure them that their "concerns" were being considered, while at the same time suggesting to them how unhappy management would be were they to vote for the Union. I believe and conclude that Johnson's interrogation of Scott in July 1985 was violative of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

2. Elimination of production department

The Respondent stipulated that it unilaterally terminated the production department on 30 August, and that the three production department employees were discharged. The Respondent admits by stipulation that it did not bargain or attempt to bargain with the Union concerning this matter.

The Respondent argues that its decision to eliminate the production department is not a mandatory subject of bargaining. Inasmuch as the decision involved a change in the course of its business, such was therefore not the type of matter about which it is required to bargain with the Union, citing First National Maintenance Corp. v. NLRB, 452 U.S. 666 (1981), and Otis Elevator Co., 269 NLRB 891 (1984). I disagree.

At the outset it should be noted that whether the Respondent was economically justified in eliminating the production department is not an issue. Indeed, from the scanty facts of record, it appears that the production department was not economically viable and that the Respondent could have its needs better met by outside production. Nevertheless, the question is whether the Respondent's decision to eliminate three bargaining unit jobs was the type of thing about which it was obligated to bargain with the Union.

Although the allegation on this issue involves the Respondent's alleged refusal to bargain in good faith, I note that the decision was made after the employees designated the Union as their bargaining representative, even though the facts concerning the low productivity of the production department had been known for many months. Such suggests discrimination in the Respondent's 30 August decision. But discrimination in this respect was not alleged.

There is scanty evidence concerning the basis of the Respondent's decision. The principal evidence is that the production department's revenues for some time had been less than the production department salaries. Johnson testified that some of the equipment needed for production was not cost justified. Since the primary factor appears to have been the production department salaries against revenues, it is clear that the Respondent's decision from a business standpoint turned substantially on labor costs. Although there may have been other factors involved, on this record I conclude that labor costs were predominating.

In Otis Elevator, the Board, in expanding on the rationale of the Supreme Court in First National Maintenance, stated that under certain circumstances a company's determination to change the course of its business, notwithstanding loss of bargaining unit jobs, was not a mandatory subject of bargaining. The Board noted that the "decision did not turn upon labor costs," though such may have been a factor. Thus, the decision was not one that the company had an obligation under Section 8(a)(5) of the Act to negotiate with the union. Nevertheless, the employer had a duty to bargain over its effects.

And in any event, even if the initial decision to eliminate the production department was not a mandatory subject of bargaining, the Respondent had the clear obligation under the Act to negotiate with the Union concerning the effects of the decision that in this case included the termination of three bargaining unit employees. In no respect did the Respondent negotiate or even tell the Union of its plans to eliminate the production department, nor give the Union an opportunity to negotiate concerning the effects of this decision on wages, hours, and employment conditions of bargaining unit employees. Accordingly, I conclude that by failing to bargain with the Union concerning its decision of 30 August to eliminate the production department and its failure to bargain with the Union over the effects of this decision, the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act. I shall recommend an appropriate remedy.

3. Creating the supervisory position

It is alleged in paragraph 12(c) of the complaint that about 23 September, the Respondent created a new supervisory position (assistant chief operator), the job duties of which included bargaining unit work.

It is further alleged in paragraph 12(e) that about 30 August, the Respondent unilaterally transferred bargaining unit work to supervisory employees.

At the outset of the hearing the parties stipulated:

> Two, on or about September 23, 1985, Respondent created a new supervisory position of Assistant Chief Operator, vesting the job with supervisory responsibilities and with the work previously performed by the bargaining unit position of Assistant Chief Operator without prior notice to or bargaining with the Charging Party.

At that time the assistant chief operator was Gary King. Although the only evidence concerning the allegation of paragraph 12(c) of the complaint is the stipulation, it is clear that the Respondent made Gary King's job as assistant chief operator a supervisory position where before it had been included in the bargaining unit. Presumptively then, and undeniably, following 23 September, King was a supervisor but continued to perform some of the work (if not all the work) that he had performed while a member of the bargaining unit. It is therefore clear that as a result of the Respondent's unilateral action, from and after 23 September the bargaining unit suffered a loss of work.

The "loss of work is a change in the terms and conditions of employment which under Sec. 8(d) of the Act, the employer is obligated to bargain over with the union. Respondent's failure here to bargain over that change thus violates Sec. 8(a)(5)." Lutheran Homes, Inc., 264 NLRB 525 at fn. 2 (1982). Although the Respondent contends that to be a mandatory subject of bargaining such a loss of unit work would have to be "substantial," there is no evidence to rebut the reasonable presumption that in a small bargaining unit such as here, the loss of one job would not be substantial.

Although the record is sparse on this issue, I do conclude that the Respondent's decision to make the assistant chief operator a supervisor had the result of reducing the amount of work available to bargaining unit employees by one job. Such therefore was the type of decision over which the Respondent had a mandatory obligation to bargain. By unilaterally creating the job of assistant chief operator as a supervisory position, the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act and an appropriate remedy will be recommended.

About this time, the chief operator resigned and on 23 September King was promoted to that job. This is alleged in paragraph 12(d) to have been a unilateral act on the part of the Respondent violative of Section 8(a)(5), again under the rationale of Lutheran Homes, supra. The parties stipulated:

> Number four, on or about September 23, 1985, Gary King was promoted from the bargaining unit position of Assistant Chief Operator to the supervisory position of Chief Operator. Following said promotion, King continued to perform his former duties and [sic] in addition the supervisory duties of Chief Operator. This took place without notification to or bargaining with the Union.

It appears the General Counsel has alleged both (a) the assistant chief operator was removed from the bargaining unit and (b) when King was promoted he continued to do the work of assistant chief operator, which had been bargaining unit work. Thus, it appears that the very same work was lost to the bargaining unit twice on the same day.

The two stipulations appear simply to be two ways of stating the same violative conduct engaged in by the Respondent. King, the assistant chief operator, who had been a bargaining unit employee, was taken out of the bargaining unit along with the work he was performing. Even if, as may be the case, on King's promotion Tom Bader was made assistant chief operator, there is still only one violation of the Act. The bargaining unit lost the work of the assistant chief operator. The chief operator was always a supervisor. Though it is possible there was additional loss of work to the bargaining unit, this record does not reflect it.

I conclude that the Respondent did, in fact, violate Section 8(a)(5) of the Act by unilaterally creating a supervisory position and including in the duties of that position work that had previously been done by the bargaining unit.[7]

4. The request for information

It is alleged that by letter of 11 November, referred to above, the Charging Party made a request for information relevant to the performance of its duties as the certified representative of the bargaining unit employees, and that the Respondent's refusal to furnish such information was violative of Section 8(a)(5). The parties stipulated to the general facts involved in this matter. The Respondent, however, takes the position that inasmuch as the Charging Party received this information during the course of this proceeding, specifically in the form of a copy of counsel's position statement to the Board, its obligations under Section 8(a)(5) have been met.

There can be little doubt of the Respondent's general obligation under the Act to furnish the Union information it requests that is relevant to performance of its obligations as the employees' bargaining representative. NLRB v. Acme Industrial Co., 385 U.S. 432 (1967), and NLRB v. Truitt Mfg. Co., 351 U.S. 149 (1956).

The Respondent does not argue this proposition nor does the Respondent contend that the information requested by the Charging Party was not in fact relevant, except as to that relating to closure of the production department. The Respondent contends that it ultimately furnished the information by giving a position statement to the Board, which later made its way to the Union.

The Board has long held that the mere fact that the Union may have obtained the information subsequent to its request does not militate against a finding that the employer violated the Act in not being forthcoming when the information was requested. E.g., K & K Transportation Corp., 254 NLRB 722 (1981). In addition, here the Respondent never in fact furnished the information to the Union. It maintains that the Union came on the information through other sources. Such is clearly not responsive to the Employer's obligations under the Act.

[7] It is alleged in par. 12(b) that the Respondent unilaterally subcontracted bargaining unit work, which paragraph of the complaint was withdrawn. Similarly, it was alleged in par. 12(d) that on 8 November the Respondent unilaterally changed bargaining unit positions from full time to part time thereby reducing bargaining unit work. Neither the General Counsel nor the Charging Party offered any evidence to support this allegation. Accordingly, it will be recommended that pars. 12(b) and (d) be dismissed.

I therefore conclude that by failing to furnish the information outlined in paragraph 12(f) of the complaint in a timely fashion, the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act. An appropriate remedy will be recommended.

5. Refusal to reinstate JoAnn Thompson

As outlined above, JoAnn Thompson was the principal organizer of the union activity and appeared as a witness on behalf of the Union at the representation hearing on 6 June. When the work of the film editing department, of which she was a member, substantially dissipated, she was transferred to the traffic department in July, under the supervision of Kim Petrykowski.

Thompson testified credibly and without contradiction that she talked to Company President A. J. Johnson who told her that she could have a 90-day leave of absence without pay and to communicate this to the office manager, Garnet Bowden (stipulated to be a supervisor). Thompson wrote a memo to this effect and on 6 September left work to have her baby. When she applied for reinstatement in November she was denied. Douglas Johnson took the position, as he set forth in his letter, that she was an incompetent employee in the traffic department and that even if she could do the work, the Respondent intended to computerize that job and thus there would be no work for her.[8]

The evidence of Thompson's alleged incompetence is the testimony of Kim Petrykowski to the effect that during the month that Thompson worked in the traffic department she made more errors than other employees. Petrykowski, however, did testify that errors were made routinely.

As best I can determine, employees in the traffic department write instructions, on a "facility" sheet, to the engineering department as to when to put certain commercials on the air. The Respondent's principal, if not sole, source of income is from the airing of commercials, and if a commercial does not for some reason, the Respondent does not get paid. Commercials that do not make it on the air are considered to have been "preempted." Thus, when a commercial has not been broadcast, a preemption sheet is attached to the commercial contract and where known, the reason for the preemption is stated. The preemption can be the result of an error in the traffic department (which the Respondent contends was the case regarding the preemptions for which Thompson was allegedly responsible) or because the commercial time was used for some other reason such as a speech by the President.

In any event, at the end of each month, the traffic department is furnished all the preemption sheets and for 1 or 2 days Petrykowski will go over these in the presence of all the traffic department employees while they are doing their regular duties, and critique them. Petrykowski calls out to various employees their errors. According to Petrykowski, Thompson was not the only employee who committed errors. Indeed, the Respondent brought forth approximately nine boxes of materials representing contracts for about 6 months before and 6 months after the events in this matter, which contained many preemption sheets. No attempt was made to analyze all the preemptions on all of these contracts, but suffice it that there were many preemptions of commercial spots.

During Thompson's leave, Respondent put in her file 18 preemption sheets, which totaled $3630 of lost revenue. Douglas Johnson testified these preemption sheets cover the month Thompson was employed in the traffic department. Johnson testified that the station's revenue is approximately $700,000 per month.

Of 18 preemption sheets in Thompson's file only 12 have her name. These 12 total revenue losses of $2060. The other six preemption sheets, showing revenue losses of $1570, do not contain any reference to Thompson, nor is there any indication from the testimony of Johnson or Petrykowski as to why these particular sheets were in Thompson's file. It appears, and I believe, that the Respondent placed in Thompson's personnel file all the preemption sheets for the month of July, regardless of whether the Respondent knew or had reason to believe that Thompson was responsible for the fact that the commercial did not run. Further, from Johnson's testimony it is unclear whether the preemption forms really establish revenue-losing mistakes, or if so, who, if anyone, was responsible.

The preemption sheets in Thompson's file simply do not prove, as contended by the Respondent, that she was a poor employee.

Thompson was known by management personnel, including Kim Petrykowski and Douglas Johnson, as an activist on behalf of the Union. The Respondent harbored animus against the Union, as demonstrated by its interrogation of Scott as well as its refusal to bargain with the Union subsequent to the 30 August certification. And Thompson was treated differently from all other employees who took pregnancy leave (the parties stipulated that every other employee who had asked for a leave of absence for pregnancy was in fact reinstated on application). From these facts I conclude that the General Counsel made out a prima facie case of discrimination against JoAnn Thompson.

The burden therefore shifted to the Respondent to demonstrate that it would have refused to rehire Thompson even absent her having engaged in union activity. Wright Line, 251 NLRB 1083 (1980). I conclude that the Respondent failed to meet its burden. Indeed, I conclude that the Respondent's contention that Thompson was an incompetent employee was a pure fabrication. The alleged evidence of incompetence was not only unpersuasive but is not credible. The testimony of Petrykowski suggests that Thompson committed no more errors than other employees in the traffic department, if she in fact committed any errors. It is impossible to tell from the preemption forms whether in fact the spots did not run as a result of an error or for some other reason. In any event, it is clear that in the regular course of business commercial spots are preempted. Johnson testified that the amount of revenue loss averages in the range of $3000 a month, or about the amount totaled on the preemption sheets that were attached to Thompson's file. The point is, preemption is common and is not in and of itself an employment error. There is no persuasive evidence that Thompson committed any more employment errors than others and absent such, I find that Petrykowski's testimony and her self-serving memo to Johnson incredible.

[8] At the time, the Respondent intended to computerize the work Thompson and others had done in the traffic department but was unable to do so. Since at least mid-November the work has been performed as it was prior to Thompson's leaving in September.

I believe that the Respondent refused to rehire the principal known activist on behalf of the Union following her pregnancy leave because of her union activity and because the employees had voted to select the Union as their bargaining representative. Accordingly, I conclude that by failing to reinstate JoAnn Thompson on her request, effective 4 November, the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) of the Act, and I shall recommend an appropriate remedy.

III. THE EFFECT OF THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES ON COMMERCE

The unfair labor practices found above, occurring in connection with the Respondent's business, have a close, intimate, and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States, and tend to lead to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce and the free flow of commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having concluded that the Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I shall recommend that it cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act, including offering immediate and full reinstatement to Carl Scott, Robert Schade, Joseph Dzenowagis, and JoAnn Thompson to their former jobs or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions of employment without loss of seniority, wages, or other rights and benefits and make them whole for any losses they may have suffered in accordance with the provisions of F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), with interest as provided for in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977). See generally Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962). Backpay for Scott and Schade is to commence 13 September, Dzenowagis 20 September, and Thompson 4 November.

E. I. DuPont de Nemours and Walter J. Slaughter. Case 4-CA-9821

June 30, 1988

SECOND SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION AND ORDER

By Chairman Stephens and Members Johansen, Babson, and Cracraft

I. PROCEDURAL HISTORY

On July 20, 1982, the National Labor Relations Board issued a Decision and Order in the above-entitled proceeding adopting the judge's finding that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act by discharging employee Walter J. Slaughter for refusing to submit to an investigatory interview without the presence of a fellow employee.[1] Thereafter, the Respondent filed a petition for review of the Board's Decision and Order, and the Board filed a cross-application for enforcement with the United States Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit. On December 29, 1983, a panel majority of the court enforced in full the Board's Order.[2] On February 1, 1984, the Respondent filed a motion for panel rehearing and rehearing en banc, and on February 17, 1984, the Board moved the court to vacate its decision and remand the matter to the Board for further consideration. Thereafter, on May 14, 1984, the Court granted panel rehearing, vacated its opinion at 724 F.2d 1061, and remanded the case to the Board for reconsideration.[3]

The Board thereafter invited the parties to file statements of position. The Board considered the record and the statement of position filed by each party, and on March 22, 1985, issued a Supplemental Decision and Order reversing the administrative law judge and finding that the Respondent did not violate Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by discharging Slaughter.[4] In reversing the administrative law judge, the Board relied on Sears, Roebuck & Co., 274 NLRB 230 (1985), which held that the Act compels a finding that unrepresented employees are not entitled to the presence of a coemployee during an investigatory interview. Thereafter, the Charging Party filed a petition for review of the Board's Supplemental Decision and Order with the United States Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit. On June 27, 1986, the court remanded the case on the grounds that the Board erroneously assumed that the Act mandated its interpretation.[5] Consequently, the court directed the Board to consider whether it would be a permissible interpretation of the Act to conclude that unrepresented employees are not entitled to the presence of a coemployee during an investigatory interview.

On October 1, 1986, the Board notified the parties that it had accepted the remand from the court of appeals and invited the parties to submit statements of position regarding the remand issues. Thereafter, all parties filed statements of position.

II. THE CREDITED EVIDENCE

The record shows that on November 17, 1978,[6] Walter Slaughter, an employee who was on probation for extensive absenteeism, posted an NLRB notice to employees in the Respondent's canteen.[7] Thomas Farley, the Respondent's supervisor of operations and services, saw Slaughter post the notice and told him to take it down because it had not been approved for posting pursuant to company policy. Slaughter refused to remove the notice and left the canteen area to begin work for the day.

Throughout the course of the morning, Farley contacted Slaughter on several occasions to discuss the posting incident. On each occasion Slaughter stated that he would not discuss union business without a third party present. Slaughter solicited two employees who agreed to act as witnesses for him; however, Farley declined to meet in the presence of the coemployees. After lunch, Farley offered Slaughter another opportunity to meet with him and, at that time, advised Slaughter that his act of insubordination was jeopardizing his job. Slaughter continued to refuse to meet with Farley. Slaughter was then escorted off the property and subsequently discharged. The Respondent's work force is not represented by a collective-bargaining agent.

III. DISCUSSION

We agree with the judge that Slaughter was discharged solely for his refusal to meet with the Respondent to discuss the posting incident unless a coemployee was present to serve as a witness. Consequently, the only question before us is whether, in a nonunion setting, an employer violates Section 8(a)(1) by discharging an employee for refusing to submit to an interview without the presence of a fellow employee.

289 NLRB No. 81

In NLRB v. J. Weingarten, 420 U.S. 251 (1975), the Supreme Court affirmed, as a permissible construction of the Act, the Board's finding that Section 7 embodies a statutory right for an employee to refuse to submit, without union representation, to an interview by employer representatives that he or she reasonably fears may result in discipline. It therefore upheld the Board's conclusion that an employer violates Section 8(a)(1) of the Act when it denies an employee that right by seeking to compel his or her attendance at such an interview without the presence of a requested union representative. The Court noted that in recognizing such a right the Board had departed from its earlier precedents; but the court expressed the view that the Board was free to reexamine past constructions of the Act, as it is in the nature of administrative decision-making to proceed through a gradual process, based on "cumulative experience" and "trial and error" in construing and applying the Act. Weingarten, supra, 420 U.S. at 265–266, quoting NLRB v. Seven-Up Co., 344 U.S. 344, 349 (1953).

That process has continued since the decision in Weingarten. Thus, in Materials Research Corp., 262 NLRB 1010 (1982), the Board extended what had come to be known as "the Weingarten right" to employees in nonunion settings. In Sears, Roebuck & Co., 274 NLRB 230 (1985), the Board reexamined the question, overruled Materials Research, and held that the Act compelled the conclusion that the right could not be thus extended. 274 NLRB at 230 fn. 5. As noted above, under the terms of the court of appeals' remand in this case, we are revisiting the question again on the premise, which we adopt, that the holding in Materials Research represented a permissible construction of the Act, but not the only permissible construction.[8]

In undertaking the present reexamination, we are mindful of the Supreme Court's observation in Weingarten that our decisions in this area involve us in the difficult task of "reconciling conflicting interests of labor and management." Id. at 267. In Weingarten, the Court concluded that the Board had struck "a fair and reasoned balance" between those interests. Id. We in no way retreat from the balance struck there, but for the reasons stated below, we believe that in a workplace in which employees are not represented by a union, we are more assured of striking a "fair and reasoned balance" between the conflicting interests by not imposing the constraints on investigatory interviews that recognition of "the Weingarten right" entails. Therefore, while recognizing that the statute might be amenable to other interpretations, we decline to return to the rule of Materials Research, and we hold that an employee in a nonunionized workplace does not possess a right under Section 7 to insist on the presence of a fellow employee in an investigatory interview by the employer's representatives, even if the employee reasonably believes that the interview may lead to discipline.

As the Supreme Court's reference to the balancing of interests suggests, this is not an issue that can be resolved by resort to plain language. A literal reading of Section 7 might indeed suggest that it bestows on nonunion employees the right in question here, because an employee who insists on the presence of another employee when facing the employer in a matter that may lead to discipline thereby attempts to engage in concerted activities for "mutual aid or protection," insofar as there is an implicit promise that the employee enlisting support would offer his own support were the other facing such an interview. See Weingarten, supra, 420 U.S. at 261, citing NLRB v. Peter Cailler Kohler Swiss Chocolates Co., 130 F.2d 503, 505–506 (2d Cir. 1942); Slaughter v. NLRB, 794 F.2d 120, 123 (3d Cir. 1986). But this is not necessarily the end of the analysis. For example, an employee who solicits his fellow employees in support of a union during working time is literally engaged in concerted activity for mutual aid or protection, but that does not establish that he enjoys a statutory right to engage in such activity without interference by the employer. Rather, the Board has balanced employers' interests in maintaining "discipline in their establishments" against employees' interests in engaging in the activities covered by the broad language of Section 7, and it has thereby arrived at an appropriate rule governing in-plant solicitations. Republic Aviation Corp. v. NLRB, 324 U.S. 793, 797–798 (1945).[9]

In determining the proper balance in the present case, we must first outline the contours of the Weingarten right as originally set out by the Board in Quality Mfg. Co., 195 NLRB 197 (1972), and Mobil Oil Corp., 196 NLRB 1052 (1972). This was the right as it was understood by the Supreme Court in Weingarten. The right arises only when the employee requests the presence of a union representative at the interview and when the employee reasonably believes that the interview may lead to discipline. Weingarten, supra, 420 U.S. at 257. Furthermore it does not foreclose the employer from deciding not to conduct the interview at all and simply taking disciplinary action without hearing the employee's explanations. Similarly, the employee may waive the right to the presence of the union representative at the interview. Finally, if the employer does go forward with the interview with the requested employee representative present, the employer has no obligation to bargain with that representative. Id. at 258–259.

[8] In so concluding, we overrule the Board's finding in Sears Roebuck, supra, that the Act compels a finding that unrepresented employees are not entitled to the presence of a fellow employee during an investigatory interview.

[9] Member Cracraft does not rely on the analogy to no-solicitation rules.

A review of the reasons specified by the Court in Weingarten as supporting the balance struck by the Board between the competing interests in that case reveals several interests favoring recognition of the right that are either not present or are less compelling in the nonunion setting. First, the Court noted that a union representative present at an investigatory interview might be able to safeguard "not only the particular employee's interest, but also the interests of the entire bargaining unit by exercising vigilance to make certain that the employer does not initiate or continue a practice of imposing punishment unjustly." 420 U.S. at 260–261 .[10] The Court placed this assistance to employees in the larger context of the basic purpose of the Act to redress "the perceived imbalance of economic power between labor and management." Id. at 262.

The Court also saw the presence of a union representative as serving the interest of the employer as well. Thus, it observed that a "knowledgeable union representative could assist the employer by eliciting favorable facts" that an inarticulate employee might be too fearful or otherwise unable to mention, thereby "sav[ing] the employer production time by getting to the bottom of the incident occasioning the interview." Id. at 263. In this regard, the Court viewed the "presence of the union steward . . . as a factor conducive to the avoidance of formal grievances through the medium of discussion and persuasion conducted at the threshold of an impending grievance." Id. at 262 fn. 7, quoting Caterpillar Tractor Co., 44 Lab. Arb. 647, 651 (1965). Finally, the Court noted that permitting union representation at an investigatory interview was "in full harmony with actual industrial practice," noting both the inclusion of provisions in many "important collective-bargaining agreements" that grant "employees rights of union representation at investigatory interviews" and the existence of "arbitral authority" recognizing such a right. Id. at 267.

Examining the foregoing considerations in a nonunion setting, we conclude that many of the useful objectives listed by the Court either are much less likely to be achieved or are irrelevant. Thus, in a nonunion setting there is no guarantee that the interests of the employees as a group would be safeguarded by the presence of a fellow employee at an investigatory interview. Unlike a union steward (or his or her proxy), a fellow employee in a nonunionized work force has no obligation to represent the interests of the entire bargaining unit.[11] Furthermore, an employee in a nonunion work force would be much less able than a union representative to "exercis[e] vigilance to make certain that the employer does not initiate or continue a practice of imposing punishment unjustly,"[12] as it is unlikely that such an employee would have the benefit of a framework similar to that typically established in a collective-bargaining agreement in which acts amounting to misconduct and means of dealing with them are defined. Nor would an employee in a nonunion setting be likely to have access to information as to how other employees had been dealt with in similar circumstances; whereas a union representative would typically be entitled to information from which it could be determined whether the employer was maintaining consistency and fairness in discipline.

Regarding the Court's conclusion that a "knowledgeable union representative could assist the employer by eliciting favorable facts, and save the employer production time by getting to the bottom of the incident occasioning the interview"[13]—

[10] Although, as noted above, an employer has no bargaining obligation in a purely investigatory interview, the presence of a union representative might be very important were the employer to seek to compel the employee whose conduct is under investigation to submit to investigatory procedures that are inconsistent with established conditions of employment, e.g., use of a polygraph or other testing procedure prohibited or limited by the collective-bargaining agreement.

[11] The Board has, in the past, found that an employer violated Sec. 8(a)(1) by denying to a represented employee the presence of a fellow employee who was not a union representative at an investigatory interview. See Chromalloy American Corp., 263 NLRB 244 (1982); Illinois Bell Telephone Co., 251 NLRB 932 (1980), modified 674 F.2d 618 (7th Cir. 1982). In Illinois Bell, supra at 934, however, the Board specifically relied on the lack of availability of a designated union representative at the time of the interview; the union steward's instruction to the employee several days before the interview that if called into an investigatory interview she could select any union member as her union representative; management's failure to attempt to locate a steward or offer to delay the interview after telling the employee that it would talk to her with her union steward but no one else; and the lack of evidence that the parties had negotiated in their collective-bargaining agreement a provision that would waive an employee's right to request a representative other than a union representative. In Chromalloy American Corp., the Board majority relied on similar circumstances in finding that an employer violated Sec. 8(a)(1) by denying an employee the presence of a fellow employee during an investigatory interview. We note that in these circumstances, as the fellow employee is substituting for an absent union representive, the employee representative still has the responsibility of protecting the interests of the entire bargaining unit.

In light of the Board's qualifying statements, we do not read Illinois Bell and its progeny to support the position that an employee in a nonunion work force has the right to the presence of a fellow employee during an investigatory interview.

[12] Weingarten, 420 U.S. at 260–261.

while such assistance might be rendered on some occasions by fellow employees, there is a smaller likelihood that this will be so. As former Member Hunter pointed out in his partial dissent in Materials Research Corp., supra, 262 NLRB at 1021:

> [T]he employer in the nonunion situation is likely to find itself confronted by a "representative" who has few or even an absence of the skills or responsibilities that one would expect from a union steward. It must therefore deal with a person who has no experience in dealing with these situations and who, out of probable friendship for the interviewee, may be involved emotionally in the interview.

See also Slaughter v. NLRB, 794 F.2d 120, 124 fn. 3 (3d Cir. 1986). In short, a union steward—who, in addition to being familiar with the applicable collective-bargaining agreement and the underlying law of the shop, may also have been specially trained by his or her union in assisting employees at an investigatory interview and in helping to defuse potentially disruptive encounters—might well be able to help elicit facts and save "production time" as a result. It is unlikely that an employee in a nonunion setting would possess similar skills, and thus unlikely that his presence would save "production time."[14]

It is of course obvious that the value of representation at an investigatory interview as a means of heading off formal grievances has virtually no application in the nonunion setting. Even though an employer has no bargaining obligation at such interviews, a union steward might propose solutions that would avoid further conflict over the matter in question and his early involvement in the situation might enable him to discourage the employee from filing a frivolous grievance. In the nonunion workplace there typically is no enforceable grievance procedure through which the employee could seek further recourse and thus no question arises of discouraging the filing of grievances, frivolous or otherwise.

Finally, although most of the discussion in Weingarten and its progeny focuses on the benefits of representation when an employer actually goes forward with an investigatory interview (and the employee has decided not to waive the Weingarten right), it is well to consider also the consequences of an employer's decision not to conduct such an interview. If an employer with union-represented employees decides to forego an interview rather than conduct it with an employee representative present, the employee whose conduct was to be investigated will lose the chance to tell his or her side of the story at that interview; but if discipline ensues, he can (assuming relevant time limitations are met) have his defense presented thereafter in whatever framework for resolving grievances has been established within the collective-bargaining relationship. There is no such assurance for the employee in the nonunion setting. To the extent that recognition of a nonunion Weingarten right induces employees to insist on a condition that may in turn induce employers simply to cancel investigatory interviews (unless the employee waives his Weingarten right), there is a serious question whether extending the right to nonunion employees may not work as much to their disavantage as to their advantage.

In short, there is no denying that an employee in a workplace without union representation might welcome the support of a fellow employee at an interview he or she fears will lead to discipline and no denying that, in some circumstances, the presence of such a person might aid the employee or both the employee and the employer. But, for the reasons already stated, the interests in assuring such representation under Section 7 are less numerous and less weighty than the interests apparent in the union setting. Taking into account the more questionable value of such a right in the nonunion setting, we find that the interests of both labor and management are better served by declining to extend this right into that forum. In so holding, we also take into account the nonunion employers' interests in conducting investigations in accordance with their own established practices and procedures and in maintaining efficiency of operation.[15]

We believe this conclusion to be fully consistent with the Supreme Court's decision in Weingarten. It is not only that, as shown, the separate factors on which the Court rested its decision translate poorly into a case involving a nonunion workplace. It is that the terms of the Court's discourse throughout, and the framework in which it analyzed the relevant interests, presuppose union representation.[16] Thus, while nothing in Weingarten

[14] As the administrative law judge in Materials Research noted concerning employee Hockman's request for the presence of a fellow employee at his interview with his department supervisor, not only was it unlikely that such an employee would be an "experienced representative who [could] save production time"; "his own time on the [plant] floor would be lost." 262 NLRB at 1026.

[15] Our finding that an employee in the nonunion setting does not enjoy the right to insist on the presence of a fellow employee at an investigatory interview should not be read as implying that an employee enjoys no protected right simply to ask for the presence of a fellow employee at such an interview. The mere act of making such a request in no way impairs the employer interests involved here and thus we would not need to strike the balance as we have done on the facts presented in this case.

[16] In Chairman Stephens' view, this is not surprising. Although the right at issue was clearly identified as a Sec. 7 right protected through the prohibitions of Sec. 8(a)(1), its historical roots were in the values proinexorably precludes us from extending the right, we are confident that in carrying out our responsibility here—defined by the Court as achieving a "fair and reasoned" balance between the conflicting interests of labor and management—we best effectuate the purposes of the Act by limiting the right of representation in investigatory interviews to employees in unionized workplaces who request the presence of a union representative. Cf. Meyers Industries, 281 NLRB 882, 883 (1986), affd. sub nom. Prill v. NLRB, 835 F.2d 1481 (D.C. Cir. 1987). Accordingly, we reaffirm our prior dismissal of the complaint.

tected by Sec. 8(a)(5). See Materials Research, supra, 262 NLRB at 1017–1018 (former Chairman Van de Water, concurring and dissenting). In Chairman Stephens' view, the reasoning of both the Board and the Court in Weingarten in part echoed the rationale of the 8(a)(5) precedents.

Local 32B-32J, Service Employees International Union, AFL-CIO and Edwin Rodriquez. Case 2-CB-11879

June 30, 1988

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND CRACRAFT

On December 15, 1987, Administrative Law Judge Joel P. Biblowitz issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed cross-exceptions and a reply brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions as modified and to adopt the recommended Order.

In agreeing with the judge's finding that the Respondent violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) and (2) of the Act by failing to give Rodriquez proper and adequate notice of his dues delinquency and by causing Brown, Harris, Stevens, Inc. to discharge him, we rely on the judge's finding that the Respondent did not correctly notify Rodriquez of the amount of his dues arrearage. Thus, the Respondent's notice, which incorrectly stated the number of months for which Rodriquez owed back dues did not meet the Respondent's "minimum obligation [of] giving . . . a statement of the precise amount and months for which dues were owed." Teamsters Local 122 (August A. Busch), 203 NLRB 1041, 1042 (1973).

We also note that the Respondent's calculation of total dues owed is questionable even apart from the 1-month discrepancy. It appears that the Respondent operated under a presumption that Rodriquez had authorized a dues checkoff as evidenced by the fact that the dues reports that the Respondent sent the Employer each month listing the employees on whose behalf the Employer should submit dues included Rodriquez. Furthermore, the Employer's copies of these reports offered into evidence contained handwritten figures that Otto Helprin, assistant vice president for J. Clarence Davies Realty Co., Inc.,[1] testified represented the amount of the check submitted to the Respondent for dues. While no canceled checks were offered substantiating the amount tendered by the Employer to the Respondent, the handwritten figures on the dues reports suggest that the amount tendered to the Respondent covered Rodriquez' dues. With regard to some months, this was further substantiated by Rodriquez' paystubs indicating that deductions for union dues (UN) had been made. Despite the Respondent's continuing submission of dues reports that included Rodriquez among those for whom two successive employers were responsible for forwarding dues, and despite the absence of any evidence that the Respondent ever accused the employers of improperly withholding checked-off dues, the Respondent's accounting of the total dues owed by Rodriquez generally continued to increase each month.[2]

The timing of the Respondent's actions also indicate less than careful attention to its dues-collection processes. Rodriquez was notified by letter July 7, 1986, that he was delinquent in the payment of his dues for an 11-month period. This letter further stated that if Rodriquez did not reinstate himself in good standing with the Respondent within 15 days from the date of the letter, the Respondent would ask for his discharge from employment. But no further action was taken until 4 months later when the Respondent notified Brown, Harris, Stevens, Inc., that it was requesting that Rodriquez be terminated for his lack of good standing as a result of his nonpayment of dues and a reinstatement fee. Moreover, although Rodriquez made a $115 payment to the Respondent in response to the Respondent's July 7, 1986 letter, the Respondent apparently never recalculated Rodriquez' dues delinquency in light of this payment and never notified Rodriquez in any fashion of the amount still owed.

There is no evidence that Rodriquez was deliberately evading his union-security obligations or attempting to be a "free rider."[3] We do not minimize the significance of dues delinquencies such as those with which Rodriquez was charged; and we recognize the right of unions to cause the discharge of employees who fail to comply with their obligations under lawful union-security clauses. But causing an employee to be fired is a serious act, and a union that seeks to do so should accept its responsibility for maintaining clear and accurate records of the employee's dues-payment status and giving clear notice of the precise amount owed. The evi-

[1] J. Clarence Davies Realty Co., Inc. was the managing agent for the building in which Rodriquez worked from mid- to late-1984 to about July 1, 1986.

[2] We are aware of the judge's discrediting of Rodriquez' testimony that he had executed a checkoff authorization, and we do not disturb that credibility finding. Our point concerns the conflicts in the Respondent's own records that, at the very least, suggest that the Respondent should have inquired of the employers why checks for dues payments did not cover Rodriquez, if in fact they did not.

[3] See Teamsters Local 630 (Ralph's Grocery), 209 NLRB 117 (1974).

dence here shows that the Respondent fell short of that responsibility.

Therefore, we find that the Respondent violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) and (2) by failing to give Rodriquez proper and adequate notice of his dues delinquency and by causing Brown, Harris, Stevens, Inc., to discharge him.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, Local 32B-32J, Service Employees International Union, AFL-CIO, New York, New York, its officers, agents, and representatives, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

Gwynne A. Wilcox, Esq., for the General Counsel.
Ira A. Sturm, Esq. (Manning, Raab, Dealey & Sturm), for the Respondent.

DECISION

Statement of the Case

Joel P. Biblowitz, Administrative Law Judge. This case was heard by me on 26 October 1987[1] in New York, New York. The complaint and notice of hearing, which issued on 30 June and was based on an unfair labor practice charge and an amended charge filed on 3 March and 16 March by Edwin Rodriguez, alleges that Local 32B-32J, Service Employees International Union, AFL-CIO (Respondent) violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) and (2) of the Act by requesting and causing the discharge of Rodriguez, notwithstanding that its request of Rodriguez for the payment of back dues owed was flawed.

On the entire record, including my observation of the witnesses and the briefs received, I make the following

Findings of Fact

I. JURISDICTION

There being no dispute, I find that Brown, Harris, Stevens, Inc., is engaged in the business of managing residential apartment buildings and is an employer within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act, and that Respondent is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. FACTS AND ANALYSIS

Rodriguez was employed at a condominium apartment building (the building) located at 55 East 86th Street in the City and State of New York for about 6 years until about 1 March. While there, he was employed as a porter, acting superintendent, and handyman. Respondent is the collective-bargaining representative of the employees in these job classifications at the building, which is covered by a multiemployer collective-bargaining agreement containing a union-security clause requiring membership in Respondent after the 30th day of employment as a condition of employment. The contract also states, inter alia:

> 5. Upon receipt by the Employer of a letter from the Union's Secretary-Treasurer requesting any employee's discharge because he has not met the requirements of this Article, unless the Employer questions the propriety of so doing, he shall be discharged within fifteen (15) days of said notice if prior thereto he does not take proper steps to meet said requirements.

When Rodriguez was first employed at the building, the managing agent (his employer) was Solomon Equities, Inc. (Solomon); about mid- to late-1984 J. Clarence Davies Realty Co., Inc. (Davies), became the managing agent for the building. About 1 July 1986 Brown, Harris & Stevens, Inc. (Brown Harris), became the managing agent for the building and has been the managing agent at all times relevant here. Rodriguez testified that while he was employed by Solomon he had to go to Respondent's office to pay his dues; when Davies and Brown Harris were managing agents for the building he executed dues checkoff authorizations and his dues were automatically deducted from his wages and sent to the Respondent.[2]

By letter dated 7 July 1986, Respondent wrote to Rodriguez:

> Dear Sir:
>
> Our records show that you are delinquent in your dues for the period July 1985 thru June 1986.
> Please be advised that, in accordance with Local 32B-32J's Constitution and Bylaws, your monthly dues are one and one-half (1-1/2) times your regular hourly wage rate, PLUS THREE DOLLARS $3.00, WITH A MINIMUM OF $14.00 PER MONTH AND A MAXIMUM OF $19.74 per MONTH.
>
> Local 32B-32J's Constitution and Bylaws further provides:
> > "Members who fall in arrears three months in dues or other financial obligations are automatically suspended as members of the Local."
> Therefore you are hereby advised that you have been suspended as a member of Local 32B-32J and that in the event of your failure to reinstate yourself in good standing in the Union within 15 days from the date of this letter, the Union will, in acorodance with the terms of the collective bargaining agreement with your employer, demand your discharge from your employment.
>
> Reinstatement requires the payment of a reinstatement fee of $34.48, which is the equivalent of two (2) times your regular monthly dues of $17.24 per month, as established by Local 32B-32J's Joint

---

[1] Unless indicated otherwise, all dates referred to are for the year 1987.

[2] Otto Helprin, an assistant vice president for Davies, testified that Davies does check off dues and transmit the dues to Respondent. He did not testify whether Rodriguez executed a dues-checkoff authorization.

> Executive Board on July 31, 1980 pursuant to the provisions of Article XI, Section 4 of the Union's Constitution and Bylaws, plus all dues in arrears as described above and the current month's dues.
> In order to make payment, please appear at the Dues Department of Local 32B-32J, 1 East 35th Street, New York, N.Y.

Rodriguez testified that he never received this letter through the mail; rather, while he was at work his delegate, John Donnelly, gave him a letter and told him that he owed dues to Respondent and he should straighten it out before he got into trouble. He could recollect nothing else about the letter Donnelly gave him other than the fact that it was dated July 1986. He then went to Respondent's office (where he had previously gone to pay his dues while employed by Solomon); he gave the clerk $115 in cash and was told that he still owed approximately $185 for a fine: ". . . when you're late on the union dues, they give you a fine." There are some differences in Rodriguez' testimony regarding what the clerk told him after he paid the $115. On direct examination he testified that she said: "She'll take care of those fines for me, and then I went back to work." On cross-examination he testified that the clerk told him: "I'll see what I can do for you," and "she would take care of it." Rodriguez gave two affidavits to the Board in this matter. The earlier one states: "The cashier told me that the union would try to work something to cancel the fine, which totalled the majority of the difference between the $300 and the $115." The second affidavit states that the cashier said that she would see what she could do about canceling the fine. As to both, Rodriguez testified that what the cashier told him was "something like that."

By letter dated 11 November 1986, Respondent wrote to Brown Harris regarding Rodriguez:

> Please be advised that the above mentioned employee is no longer a member of Local 32B-32J in good standing due to the non-payment OF DUES AND REINSTATEMENT FEE.
> Therefore, in accordance with our agreement, we are requesting that he (she) be terminated immediately and replaced by another person whose employment will be in compliance with the agreement between the parties.

Sometime in December 1986 a resident of the building told Rodriguez that she heard that he was having trouble with his dues and that he should take care of it. At that time he went to Respondent's office and spoke to Feliciano, a delegate, because Donnelly was not available. Feliciano told him that he owed $300 and Rodriguez said that was impossible. Feliciano then called Lars Johansen, Brown Harris' district manager, but was told that he was on vacation and would not be returning until mid-January. Rodriguez asked if he could speak to someone higher at Respondent, and he spoke to Sampson, Respondent's district head in the area. Rodriguez told Sampson that there was a mistake—"I don't owe—that kind of money to the union. No way." Sampson said that, "you owe union dues," and that Brown Harris did not want him back at the building and so there was nothing he could do for him. Rodriguez then went to the Brown Harris office to attempt to straighten out the situation (before Johansen returned) but he was told that Johansen was the only person who could take care of the matter.

On 20 January, Rodriguez went to Johansen's office, pursuant to his request. At that time, Johansen gave him the following letter, dated 20 January:

> Dear Mr. Rodriguez:
> Please be advised that we have been instructed by the Union, Local 32B/J, to terminate your employment as Handyman, at 55 East 86th Street Condominum, for failure to pay your union dues.
> Furthermore, in evaluating your job performance and your mechanical skills and knowledge, we have found them to be far less than satisfactory.
> Finally, it has come to our attention, that on a couple of occasions, you have been seen leaving the building before the end of your shift.
> The termination will be effective March 1, 1987.

Rodriguez told Johansen that he thought he had done a great job at the building; he had been acting superintendent, at one time, and once received a $300 Christmas bonus. Johansen told him that he is a nice guy, but is not a qualified handyman. Rodriguez asked him to use him as a doorman or a porter at the building. Johansen said that they had enough porters at the building and "I don't think I can have you in that building," but that he would attempt to get him a job at another building if he desired. Rodriguez said that he did not want to work at another building. Rodriguez' last day of employment at the building was 1 March; on 28 April, at his request, Brown Harris gave him the following letter, signed by Johansen:

> To Whom It May Concern:
> Please be advised that Mr. Eddie Rodriguez, was employed as Handyman, at 55 East 86th Street, New York, for seven years.
> The reason for his departure was a personality conflict with another employee. His last day of work was March 1, 1987.

Sometime after 1 March, Rodriguez went to Respondent's office and spoke to Sampson and told him that he wanted his job back. Sampson called Johansen and asked him to put Rodriguez back to work at the building. After his conversation with Johansen, Sampson told Rodriguez that Johansen would not rehire him at the building because he felt that he was not a good handyman, but that he was willing to give him a job at a different building. Rodriguez refused this offer. By letter dated 13 July, Respondent wrote to Johansen stating that it "has no objection to the employment of Edwin Rodriguez and requests that Rodriguez be reinstated." By letter dated 15 July, Johansen wrote to Respondent that he is "pleased to hear" that the Respondent has withdrawn its complaint against Rodriguez and has no objection to his being employed again, but: "Presently we do not have any openings for Mr. Rodriguez, but will contact him the moment a suitable position becomes available."

As regards the contents of the 20 January and 28 April letters, and Rodriguez' 20 January conversation with Johansen, Rodriguez testified that he was never informed of any complaints aobut his work, nor did he ever receive a warning or suspension while employed at the building. He does not recall the superintendent talking to him about not being on the job when he was supposed to be there—"I'm always on my job." He testified that he does not know of any situation when the superintendent was looking for him and could not find him, and that he had no problems with the superintendent or his fellow employees. There were occasions when the superintendent asked him to do something a second time because he was not satisfied with the way it was done initially. When Johansen gave him the 20 January letter, he never questioned Johansen about the letter's references to his less than satisfactory mechanical skills and his occasional absence from the building.

Rodriguez testified that during the period of his employment at the building while Davies and Brown Harris were managing agents his dues were deducted from his pay and transmitted to the Respondent; "it was Solomon that was the one that I might have goofed up a little bit." He testified that he could not recall for how long a period he was delinquent while employed by Solomon, but "it couldn't be over a year."

Received into evidence were monthly dues reports for the building's employees for the period August 1985 through June 1986. These reports are prepared by Respondent (based on information supplied by the employer) to show what each employee owed, transmitted to the employer (in this case Davies), who then (supposedly) sent a check to Respondent covering the amounts (or at least, the current amounts) owed by the employees. The General Counsel introduced these documents through Helprin, who was not very familiar with them, and presented no supporting documents, like the canceled checks, for each of the months. These reports show the following for Rodriguez:[3]

Date	Arrears	Reinstatement Fee Due	Current Month Dues	Total Dues
8/85	$ 99.68	$27.48	$15.49	$142.65
9/85	115.17	27.48	15.49	158.14
10/85	130.66	27.48	15.49	173.63

4/86	161.64	31.48	15.74	208.86
6/86	178.13	32.48	16.24	226.85

Similar statements for Brown Harris for the months August 1986 through January were received. They state the following:

Date	Arrears	Reinstatement Fee Due	Current Month Dues	Total Dues
8/86	$179.63	$30.98	$17.24	$227.85
9/86	196.87	30.98	17.24	245.09
10/86	- 0 -	30.98	17.24	262.33
11/86	231.35	30.98	17.24	279.57
12/86	248.59	30.98	17.24	296.81
1/87	265.83	30.98	17.24	314.05

Another document received into evidence was Rodriguez' employee ledger card (from Davies), which states that in April and May 1986, $15.74 was deducted from his pay and in June 1986 $16.24 was deducted from his pay for "UN." It also states that for "year to date" (the end of June), $77.45 had been deducted from his pay for "Union." In addition, Rodriguez was able to locate some of his past pay stubs; the ones that show dues deduction are as follows:

Week Ending	Amount Deducted[4]
11/13/85	$15.49
12/18/85	15.49
2/17/86	15.49
3/3/86	15.49
3/17/86	15.49
4/21/86	15.74
5/12/86	15.74
6/23/86	16.24
11/3/86	17.24
2/2/87	17.24
3/2/87	17.24

A computer printout of Respondent, dated 10 April, that Respondent transmitted to the Board in its investigation of this matter, showing Rodriguez' union dues payments, and the months for which they were credited, shows the following:

Dues Credited To	Amount	Date Paid
1/85	$13.74	24 September 1985
2/85	13.74	5 November 1985
3/85	13.74	6 March 1986
4/85	13.99	6 March 1986
5/85	14.49	27 March 1986
6/85	14.49	6 May 1986
7/85	15.49	27 June 1986

No further payments are recorded.

The initial determination to be made here is the cause of Rodriguez' discharge on 1 March. The General Counsel alleges that Rodriguez was discharged because of Respondent's letter of 11 November 1986 to Brown Harris demanding his discharge for nonpayment of dues and reinstatement fee. Respondent, while admitting that it sent the 7 July 1986 letter to Rodriguez, and the 11 November 1986 letter to Brown Harris, defends that Rodriguez was fired for reasons unrelated to these letters. The difficulty with this argument is that no witnesses were produced to support it. The only support for this argument are the "furthermore" and "finally" paragraphs in the 20 January letter, the accompanying conversation with Johansen, the 28 April letter and the postdischarge conversation between Sampson and Johansen, which question his ability as a handyman and that "on a couple of occasions" he was seen leaving the building prior to the end of his shift. The 28 April letter refers solely to a "personality conflict with another employee." Although these alleged complaints might otherwise be valid causes for a discharge, there is no evidence, whatsoever, to support these allegations. Rodriguez testified that he had never been warned about the quality of his work and, in fact, had been acting superintendent of the building, and no evidence was adduced to contradict this testimony. The fact that Rodriguez' shortcomings were first mentioned 2 months after Respondent requested Brown Harris to fire him convinces me that this was an afterthought and was used as a pretext for the true reasons for the discharge—the Respondent's letter. I, therefore, find that the General Counsel has sustained her initial burden under Wright Line, 251 NLRB 1083 (1980), which I find controlling in 8(b)(2) cases as well as 8(a)(1) and (3) cases. Soft Drink Employees (Chattanooga Coca Cola), 264 NLRB 24 (1982); Laborers Local 282 (Austin Co.), 271 NLRB 878 (1984). I also find that Respondent has not sustained its burden of establishing that Rodriguez would have been discharged even absent its 11 November 1986 letter. In his 6 years of employment at the building he had never been criticized for his attendance, work, or relationship with his fellow employees. It was not until 2 months after this letter that Respondent first informed Rodriguez of these problems. As stated, supra, I find these alleged complaints were a pretext, and cannot support Respondent's burden.

[3] Reports for the months of February and May 1986 were not included.

[4] A check of the figure on these paystubs establishes that these amounts were actually deducted from his pay. No proof was offered to establish that these amounts were actually transmitted to Respondent. Additionally, the conflict between these figures and the "year to date" deduction of $77.45 from his employee ledger card, supra, was never explained.

The ultimate question, therefore, is whether Respondent, in its 7 July 1986 letter to Rodriguez, and its 11 November 1986 letter to Brown Harris requesting Rodriguez' termination, complied with the Board's rules in this regard. In Teamsters Local 13 (Mobile Concrete), 268 NLRB 930 (1984), and Helmsley-Spear, Inc., 275 NLRB 262 (1985), the Board set forth a "minimum level of conduct" (Mobile Concrete, supra at 931) that unions must comply with when they notify a member of his dues delinquency. This includes reasonable notice of the delinquency, including a statement of the precise amount and month for which dues were owed, and explanation of the method used in computing such amount, the precise amount of any reinstatement fee that may be required and notice of the possible consequences of nonpayment. By its letter to Rodriguez of 7 July 1986, Respondent set forth how his monthly dues are arrived at, the provision of Respondent's constitution and bylaws regarding delinquency, notice of what Respondent's reinstatement fee is and what Rodriguez had to do to avoid Respondent notifying his employer of his delinquency: pay the reinstatement fee, "plus all dues in arrears as described above and the current month's dues." This letter therefore informed Rodriguez of the months for which he was allegedly delinquent, how the monthly dues are arrived at, and the amount of the reinstatement fee. Although the letter did not contain a total amount due to Respondent, this was not necessary as it could have been arrived at easily enough with the facts and figures provided. The letter also informed Rodriguez of the consequences of nonpayment. The only question is whether Respondent was correct in identifying July 1985 through June 1986 as the delinquent months; if it was not, Respondent has violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) and (2) of the Act.

A review of the testimony and exhibits leads to some answers and considerable confusion. The principal confusion arises from the fact that the uncontradicted testimony establishes that Davies and Brown Harris each checked off its employees' dues and transmitted it to Respondent. Yet the monthly dues reports from Respondent for Davies and Brown Harris show that Rodriguez' arrears and total dues owed increased a majority of the time during the period August 1985 through January. This may be explained by the fact that Rodriguez did not execute a dues-checkoff authorization, although he testified that he did so; however, no documentary evidence was adduced to support this. A further complication, but more readily explainable, is the fact that while certain exhibits establish that dues were deducted from Rodriguez' pay, other exhibits state that his dues were not paid for that same period. For example, his employee ledger card and his paystubs from Davies state that dues were deducted from his pay for the payroll periods ending 13 November and 18 December 1985, 17 February, 3 and 17 March, 21 April, 12 May, and 23 June 1986, while his paystubs from Brown Harris state that union dues were deducted from his pay for the payroll periods ending 3 November 1986, 2 February, and 2 March. Yet the computer printout of Respondent on Rodriquez' dues history states that the last payment received by Respondent for Rodriguez was on 27 June 1986 and was credited to July 1985 dues. This appears to explain the lack of correlation of dues paid and months credited; apparently, no matter when Respondent received the dues, they credited the amount received to the oldest delinquent month. It does not explain why this printout (prepared 10 April for the Board's use) shows no dues payments for Rodriguez after June 1986, when his paystubs from Brown Harris show three subsequent deductions, one of which was prior to Respondent's 11 November letter to Brown Harris requesting Rodriguez' termination. Also unexplained is why, of Respondent's reports transmitted to Davies and Brown Harris (the ones in evidence through January), a majority do not reflect the 11 occasions, supra, where Davies and Brown Harris' records establish that dues were deducted from Rodriguez' pay.

Two points are clear, however. Even according to Respondent's records, dues were paid for July 1985 (deducted by Davies on 23 June 1986 and received by Respondent on 27 June 1986) and that, at the minimum, Respondent's 7 July 1986 letter was therefore incorrect in including that month as delinquent. The brief of counsel for Respondent, while acknowledging this error, argues:

> Technically, it would appear, therefore, that Rodriguez' letter of delinquency had one month extra listed as arrears. However, by the time the letter was received by Rodriguez, he became obligated to pay the July 1986 dues, which were not paid; and, hence, although by calendar calculations the latter was off, in terms of the actual dollars owed, the letter was absolutely correct.

This argument is not persuasive. The cases cited, supra, state that one requirement of a proper delinquency notice is that it include "a statement of the precise amount and months for which dues were owed." Respondent's 7 July 1986 letter did not do so correctly and therefore its causation of Rodriguez' discharge violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) and (2) of the Act. Three additional deductions from his pay, made by Brown Harris, occurred substantially after the 7 July 1986 letter and too late to affect Respondent's 11 November letter to Brown Harris, so it will not be considered here.

Although I have found that Respondent violated the Act, I am constrained to say that I have little sympathy for Rodriguez. Unions cannot live by its members' fervor alone, rather their dues payments are more important in paying the salaries of officers who negotiate contracts and handle grievances on behalf of their members and the salaries of office employees, who service the members and keep track of their fringe benefits. Rodriguez was substantially delinquent in his dues payments and was therefore not carrying his share of this burden. Although he testified that he executed a dues-checkoff authorization, I do not credit this testimony as the General Counsel never introduced such an authorization into evidence and, if he had authorized Davies and Brown Harris to check off his dues, he would not have fallen so far behind in his dues payments. I find it more likely that he paid his dues at Respondent's office when he felt so inclined, which appears to have been rarely. Be that as it may, the Board law on the subject is clear, and as Respondent inadvertently included July 1985 as a delinquent month in its 7 July 1986 letter to Rodriguez, his subsequent discharge violated the Act.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Brown, Harris, Stevens, Inc. is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. Respondent is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By failing to give Rodriguez proper and adequate notice of his dues delinquency, and by causing Brown, Harris to discharge him, Respondent violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) and (2) of the Act.

REMEDY

Having found that Respondent violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) and (2) of the Act, I recommend that it be ordered to cease and desist from engaging in such activity. While normally I would recommend that Respondent be ordered to notify Brown, Harris that it has no objection to the reinstatement and employment of Rodriguez, Respondent has already done this in its 13 July letter. I also recommend that Respondent be ordered to make Rodriguez whole for any loss he suffered as a result of Respondent's actions. I leave for the backpay hearing determinations on the effect of Respondent's post 1 March actions on behalf of Rodriguez and his refusal to accept employment at another building. The amount of backpay shall be computed in the manner set forth in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), with interest as provided in New Horizons for the Retarded.[5]

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[6]

ORDER

DECISION AND ORDER

By Members Johansen, Babson, and Cracraft

On October 21, 1987, Administrative Law Judge Frederick C. Herzog issued the attached decision. The Respondent and the General Counsel filed exceptions and supporting briefs.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions[2] and to adopt the recommended Order.[3]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, Industrial Supply Co., Inc., Plymouth and St. Paul, Minnesota, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

Robert E. Omberg, Esq. and James L. Fox, Esq., for the General Counsel.

Douglas P. Seaton, Esq. (Popham, Haik, Schnobrich, Kaufman & Doty, Ltd.), of Minneapolis, Minnesota, for the Respondent.

289 NLRB No. 84

DECISION

Statement of the Case

Frederick C. Herzog, Administrative Law Judge. This case was heard before me in Minneapolis, Minnesota, on 13 and 14 August 1987 and is based on a charge filed by Carol G. Stickney (Stickney), an individual, about 14 May 1987 alleging generally that Industrial Supply Company, Inc. (Respondent) committed certain violations of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act). About 24 June 1987 the Regional Director for Region 18 of the National Labor Relations Board (the Board) issued a complaint and notice of hearing alleging violations of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act. Respondent thereafter filed a timely answer to the allegations contained within the complaint.

All parties appeared at the hearing through counsel, and were given full opportunity to participate, to introduce relevant evidence, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, to argue orally, and to file briefs. Based on the record, my consideration of the briefs filed by counsel for the General Counsel and counsel for Respondent, and my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, I make the following

I. BUSINESS OF RESPONDENT

The parties agree, and I find, that Respondent is a Minnesota corporation with its principal place of business in Plymouth, Minnesota, and a branch office in St. Paul, Minnesota; that Respondent has been engaged in the distribution of bearings and power transmission components; that during the past calendar year Respondent in the course and conduct of its business operations purchased and received at its Plymouth facility products, goods, and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from points outside the State of Minnesota; that during the past calendar year Respondent in the course and conduct of its business operations sold and shipped from its Plymouth facility products, goods, and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly to customers outside the State of Minnesota; and that Respondent is now, and has been at all times material, an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION

The parties agree, and I find, that Warehousemen, Drivers and Helpers Union Local No. 359, affiliated with International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, AFL–CIO (the Union) is now, and has been at all times material, a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Contentions of the Parties

Counsel for the General Counsel contends that Respondent retaliated against Stickney's refusal to withdraw a grievance filed by her by imposing such new and onerous working conditions on her as to cause her constructive discharge. Respondent contends that whatever changes were made in Stickney's working conditions were not motivated by discriminatory or retaliatory intent, and were instead the valid result of changed circumstances in its business.

---

[1] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[2] We find it unnecessary to find an additional, repetitive violation of Sec. 8(a)(1) based on the statements made by the Respondent's president Koch at the state unemployment compensation hearing. Such a finding would be cumulative and would not affect the Order.

[3] For the reasons set forth by the judge, employment positions at the Respondent's Plymouth, Minnesota facility are not substantially equivalent to discriminatee Carol Stickney's former office clerical position at the Respondent's St. Paul, Minnesota facility. Accord: Professional Porter Co., 275 NLRB 12, 18 (1985). Furthermore, the Respondent has failed to prove in this proceeding that it would have eliminated Stickney's former position at any time in the absence of her statutorily protected grievance activity. Consequently, to the extent necessary to effectuate Stickney's remedial reinstatement right, the Respondent will be required to recreate her former position at its St. Paul facility. See Larry Barnes Chevrolet Co., 174 NLRB 818, 822 (1969). We deny the request that the remedial order include a visitatorial clause. See Cherokee Marine Terminal, 287 NLRB 1080 (1988).

As a subsidiary issue, counsel for the General Counsel also contends that Respondent twice sought to coerce Stickney, first by threatening to terminate Stickney's position unless she dropped or withdrew the grievance referred to above, and later by stating to her that the reason why her position had been eliminated was because of her refusal to drop or withdraw the grievance. Respondent's answer denies that any such coercion occurred, but none of Respondent's witnesses testified concerning these matters and they are not mentioned in the brief of Respondent's counsel.

B. The Facts

Respondent's business of distributing bearings and power transmission components is headquartered at Plymouth, Minnesota, where it employs approximately 26 employees. It maintains branch offices in St. Paul, Minnesota, and Sioux Falls, South Dakota. Approximately seven employees work at the St. Paul facility.

Respondent and the Union are currently parties to a 3-year collective-bargaining agreement, due to expire in November 1987. The agreement, which covers a unit of clerical employees at the Plymouth and St. Paul facilities, contains a provision for grievance and arbitration. Stickney, at the relevant time of January 1987, was the only employee at Respondent's St. Paul facility covered by the agreement.

Stickney worked for Respondent from 1975 until January 1987. Throughout that time she worked in the St. Paul facility performing general office clerical work, including filing, typing, filling in for the salesman (city desk man), and working on computers. Her immediate supervisor was Keith Stutz, the office manager, and, in turn, was also responsible to Bob Engler, the St. Paul branch manager, as well as Paul Koch, Respondent's president. Respondent admits that throughout her employment she was an excellent employee and has never given cause for discipline. On the other hand, it is admitted by counsel for the General Counsel that Respondent has no history of unfair labor practices and has never otherwise evidenced union animus.

Throughout her employment until 1983 Stickney worked on a full-time, 40-hour-per-week basis. Thereafter, until the time of the incident alleged in the complaint, she worked on a part-time, 24-hour-per-week basis. This change came about when Respondent proposed to her that, in order to avoid the possibility that Respondent might be forced to lay off another employee who occupied the position of "city desk man," she no longer works on Monday or Friday, and instead works 8-hour days, Tuesday through Thursday. Stickney agreed. Stickney credibly testified that at the time Koch assured her that she would lose no benefits, including her vacation time, if she accepted this change. She conceded, however, that she had no recollection that Koch made any reference, one way or another, to the question of whether her vacation entitlement would be prorated to account for her new part-time status. Koch had no recollection of the conversation at all.

The collective-bargaining agreement between the Union and Respondent provides that employees are to receive 3 weeks' vacation after having served with Respondent for a period of 10 years. In apparent reliance thereon Stickney took, and was paid for without any questions being raised by Respondent, 10 days of vacation in 1984, and (having completed her 10th year of service) 15 days in 1985 and 1986.

Counsel for the General Counsel concedes that sometime during 1986 Koch talked to Stickney about a possible transfer from St. Paul to Plymouth. Stickney's recollection was that the conversation took place in April or May. Koch testified that it occurred in August or September; Respondent's brief simply notes that it occurred sometime during the summer of 1986. Thus, whether it be in the spring or the summer, it appears that all parties agree that the conversation took place roughly 4 to 6 months preceding the events of January 1987.

According to Stickney, Koch initiated the conversation by inquiring as to Stickney's thoughts concerning the possibility of reverting to full-time work, i.e., working a 40-hour week in 5 days. Stickney was initially receptive to the idea, but quickly and adamently expressed her opposition on being told by Koch that the new full-time position would be located in the Plymouth facility. Stickney credibly testified that she initially told Koch that she had no way of getting to Plymouth and explained to him that she did not drive a car or have a car, but was transported to and from work by her husband whose own route to and from work took him within a few blocks of the St. Paul facility. Stickney further testified that she told Koch that she would make inquiries into Minnesota, Ride-Share, which is evidently a volunteer or public organization that attempts to arrange for carpools to be formed. Stickney also said that she told Koch that she would check into the possibility of public transportation, such as the bus system. She promised to get back to him if suitable arrangements could be made. Stickney was adamant in her testimony to the effect that she expressly told Koch that there was no way that she could accept such a transfer absent resolution of her transportation difficulties.

Koch did not deny Stickney's testimony on any of these points. However, he did go on to testify that he explained, contrary to Stickney's recollection, that her job in St. Paul was being phased out and was to be abolished shortly. According to Koch, he did not insist that she give him an immediate answer, and he did not tell her of any specific date when her job was to be ended. He testified that he told her that the elimination of her job was "imminent."

Branch Manager Engler admitted that he had not been briefed by Koch concerning the possibility that Stickney's job in his branch would be eliminated. Thus, on Stickney's remarking to him following her conversation with Koch that "it looks like they are going to terminate my job," he felt justified in assuring her, as he did, that there was no reason to be very concerned about it. Stickney testified that she made no such statement to Engler, or even to Stutz. As she recalled it, she merely responded to questions from both Engler and Stutz when they expressed curiosity to her about the subject matter of her meeting with Koch; she went on to say that she wished they could explain it to her and than she asked Engler if he knew what Koch meant.

It is undisputed that in 1985 Respondent determined to modify its operation by installing more computer technology, pointing toward the goal of improving efficiency and coordination. The computer terminals installed were operated by service representatives, who performed the functions formerly performed by Stickney. Similarly undisputed is the fact that installation of the computers and their usage resulted in a lessened need by the Respondent for clerical assistance in billing and inventory control.

Also undisputed is the fact that Respondent began to experience financial difficulties that threatened to decrease its profitability during the fiscal year ending 31 March 1986. An internal review by Respondent's officials was undertaken to identify areas where costs could be cut. According to evidence supplied by Respondent, its Sioux Falls facility was identified as its greatest financial drain, but the effects of a general lack of growth were being felt throughout all the facilities of Respondent. Respondent's internal review ultimately led to the recommendation from its officials that seven positions be eliminated by Respondent, two of them being in the St. Paul facility where Stickney worked. These officials were in agreement that Stickney's position was one of those that could have been eliminated; the record is silent concerning just how many of the positions in the St. Paul facility beside Stickney's were also considered subject to possible elimination, if any. Similarly, the record is silent as to details of Respondent's determination concerning these recommendations, showing, for example, just when such recommendations were made, the precise recommendations made, which jobs were considered and affected by such recommendations, the timeliness or even deadlines when such recommendations were to be effected, and the economic benefits to be realized or the financial difficulties to be avoided in the event such recommendations were carried out.

In November 1986 Respondent learned of the impending loss of one of its major contracts, a contract previously handled from the St. Paul facility. However, despite the eventual loss of the contract, Respondent has continued to do business with the company that had previously awarded it the contract and, in approximately the same amount, as Koch explained, the "new" company had not yet "gotten on stream." Moreover, Stickney testified without rebuttal that Engler and Stutz both told her coincident with the time Respondent learned that it was not going to receive the contract referred to above that the St. Paul facility would be expected in the future to do its own invoicing and billing, thereby increasing the workload for her. She testified credibly that they told her that this would possibly necessitate her return to full-time status. Indeed, so Stickney testified, again without rebuttal, Engler told her that he would like to see her begin doing purchasing work in order to take some of the workload off the city desk man.

Thus, notwithstanding Koch's statements to her, Stickney continued to work in her usual part-time job, with no changes being made for several months following her conversation wih Koch until 15 January 1987.

On that date, however, she received a paycheck that she noted was extraordinarily small compared with its usual amount. A note from Respondent's controller, Rol, accompanied the paycheck, explaining that she had used, and been paid for, 15 days vacation during 1986 and that, according to Koch, she should have been paid for only 9 days due to the fact that, as a part-time employee, she worked only 3 days per week and, therefore, should have received only 60 percent of the contractually provided 15 days of vacation per year. Thus, pay for 6 days was deducted from her paycheck in order to reimburse Respondent for days previously paid her in error. Stickney's inquiries addressed to Stutz and Rol led her to speak to Koch.

According to Koch, he told Stickney that she had been getting benefits she had not been entitled to, but that Stickney responded by telling him that it was her understanding that she was entitled to full-time benefits pursuant to the discussion and understandings she had had at the time she was converted to the status of part-time employee. It is undisputed that neither Koch nor Stickney changed their positions with respect to this dispute during that conversation.

The next day, 16 January 1987, Stickney filed a grievance seeking to secure pay for the 6 days. According to Rol, when told that Stickney's claim accorded with procedures followed during the previous year, 1985, Koch responded that, regardless of what had happened in the past, he had no intention of paying full-time vacation benefits for part-time work.

On 22 January 1987, Koch telephoned Stickney. He apologized for the manner in which the deduction had been taken from her paycheck without warning or discussion. Stickney testified that Koch told her that she should drop her grievance, but she refused, unless she was paid for the time that had been deducted. Stickney recalled Koch telling her, and Koch never denied that he told her, that he would eliminate her job in St. Paul if she did not drop her grievance, and that only by dropping the grievance would she be allowed to continue to work, absent her acceptance of the transfer to the Plymouth facility. Stickney testified that she reminded Koch that she had no means of transportation to Plymouth, a fact that Koch admitted she stated to him. Nonetheless, Stickney testified and Koch did not deny that Koch then told her that in light of her refusal to drop her grievance that she no longer had a job in St. Paul and that, if she wished to continue to work, she would have to do so by coming to the Plymouth facility. Koch admittedly told Stickney that the grievance was not proper, that it would be costly to Respondent, that he thought that the grievance was unfounded, and that despite his claim that Stickney's receipt of full-time vacation benefits had been unfair, no one had ever complained to him about it. Koch admitted that he made no statement to Stickney during that conversation concerning the elimination of her position in St. Paul, and the resultant transfer to Plymouth, until after Stickney informed him that she refused to withdraw the grievance.[1]

On 19 March 1987 Koch testified at an unemployment compensation hearing in which Stickney was the claimant. He was asked about his conversation with Stickney of 22 January, and the inquiry was put to him about whether he had then told Stickney that he did not intend to pay to arbitrate a grievance such as hers. He responded that he had made that statement. He was then asked whether he told her that if she did not drop the grievance he was going to have to eliminate her position. His response was, "Uh, I guess I did, yeah." Then, when asked if it was not true that on that very same day, 6 days after Stickney had filed her grievance, Koch eliminated Stickney's position, Koch responded, "Uh huh, as I say, it brought it to a head. There's no secret about it."

Questioned along similar lines during the course of this trial, Koch admitted that Stickney's filing of the grievance moved the decision to terminate her St. Paul position "to a head," and that it was "the pre-empting factor." Koch admitted that, notwithstanding the evidence concerning the business justifications resulting from the internal analyses conducted by Respondent during the previous fall, and notwithstanding his own assertion to Koch sometime during the previous summer that her transfer in status to a full-time employee was "imminent," it was not until the conversation of 22 January (and then only following her refusal to withdraw her grievance) that Stickney was told that a definite decision had been made to terminate her position, and that she would have to transfer if she were to remain in the employ of Respondent.

Following her telephone conversation of 22 January with Koch, Stickney advised Engler and Stutz that she had lost her job in St. Paul. She telephoned Stutz on both Saturday and Sunday of that weekend telling him that she did not know what she was going to do. Stutz responded that he had talked to Rol and learned that there was no work for her as yet in Plymouth and that she could therefore come back to St. Paul for the following week. She did so, and performed her normal work during that week. Engler told her, in parting, that he would speak to Koch and let Stickney know what was going to happen.

Engler contacted Stickney the following Monday and told her Koch stood by his previously announced decision.

Stickney undertook an investigation to determine whether it would be possible for her to solve her transportation difficulties. As she testified, it was not possible for her husband to take her in the direction and over the distance that working at the new facility would require. She also learned that public transportation would have involved some 3 hours per day to go to and return from work by bus. (Even at that, the bus would have picked her up in her suburb, driven her to downtown Minneapolis, she would have awaited a transfer at that point, and then taken another bus out into the suburb of Plymouth.) Stickney also investigated the possibility of ridesharing, or of securing transportation from relatives.

It is undisputed that Stickney, though the possessor of a driver's license, has driving skills that might best be described as primitive, and certainly not sufficient to undertake a lengthy commute across a major portion of a metropolitan area. Nor is it disputed that Respondent, through Stutz, Engler, and Koch, had been long aware of Stickney's inability to drive herself to work, and/or were informed of her inability months before her conversation with Koch of 22 January.

Last, Koch testified that even had there been no dispute regarding the vacation grievance filed by Stickney, her job would have been eliminated no later than 1 March 1987. Such an opinion, however, was not voiced in either of the affidavits previously supplied by him to the General Counsel (one of which was prepared by Respondent's counsel). Neither was it contained within his testimony at the unemployment compensation hearing. And, as noted earlier, no records, memoranda, recommendations, or other financial data was brought forward by Respondent to corroborate the testimony of Koch, or any other of Respondent's witnesses, concerning the necessity for and timing of any actions taken concerning Stickney's position of employment, notwithstanding the inference that I draw from their collective testimony that such records and memoranda concerning financial distress, and proposed means of resolution, are generally maintained by employers. No explanation for the absence of such records was offered and no claim has been advanced that such records do not exist or were unavailable for trial.

Stickney has not worked for Respondent since 29 January 1987, the date when her position in the St. Paul facility of Respondent was terminated. She has consistently declined to accept the transfer to Plymouth, on the basis that she would have to depend on public transportation and that such transportation would impose on her too greatly.

C. Analysis and Conclusions

Based on my observance of her demeanor I find Stickney credible. She testified in a forthright and candid fashion, resisting several opportunities offered her to enlarge on or magnify her recital of the injustice, as she perceived it, of her Employer's position. Thus, I deem her to be a truthful person, whose testimony is reliable. My conclusion is especially valid as to instances where she was recounting events in a generalized way, as opposed to various instances where precision or detail was sought. As a result, I have determined to generally credit her testimony over that of Koch in areas where there is conflict.

I reach this conclusion not because I regard Koch as a person given to deliberate falsity. Instead, I viewed him as a person motivated by such determination, possibly rising to the level of stubbornness, that he found himself easily able to brush aside or ignore inconsistencies within his own position.

[1] I purposefully foreshortened the recitation of facts concerning the merits of the grievance, inasmuch as the issue of whether Stickney's grievance did or did not have merit is not an issue to be determined by me in this case. Here, it suffices to say that Respondent has not asserted that there was no arguable merit to Stickney's grievance, or that it was filed maliciously or with intent to harrass.

In any event, my determination of the relative credibility of witnesses in this case need not rest on the admittedly inexact art of weighing their testimonial demeanor. I explain below.

It is an unfair labor practice for an employer to threaten an employee with retaliation because the employee has elected to file a grievance. Such threats are deemed violative of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act because of their tendency to negate the assurances of certain rights enjoyed by employees, as set forth in Section 7 of the Act. Among any litany of such rights must be included the right of employees to file grievances in efforts to resolve disputes arising under collective-bargaining agreements. Indeed, in any hierarchical ranking, the right to grieve must surely be near the top of any list. See, for example, Stor-Rite Metal Products, 283 NLRB 856, 858 (1987); Dresser Industries, 281 NLRB 132, 135 (1986); Commercial Cartage Co., 273 NLRB 637, 647 (1984). See also NLRB v. City Disposal Systems, 465 U.S. 822 (1984), citing with approval Interboro Contractors, 157 NLRB 1295 (1966), enfd. 388 F.2d 495 (2d Cir. 1967).

Applying the principles of these authorities, I find and conclude that Koch violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act both on 22 January 1987 when he told Stickney that he would eliminate her position and require her to transfer to the Plymouth facility unless she dropped her grievance, and also by his statement made in her presence at the 19 March 1987 state unemployment compensation hearing. I reach the conclusion that Koch made these statements based on the credible testimony of Stickney, and my review of the transcript of the sworn testimony taken from Koch at the unemployment compensation hearing. I note that neither statement was contradicted or denied by Koch during the course of the trial, and that, indeed, Koch essentially repeated the statement of 19 March during the course of this trial.[2]

Turning to the issue of whether Respondent constructively discharged Stickney, I first note that it is the counsel for the General Counsel's burden in such cases to prove two elements: (1) the burdens imposed on the employee must cause, and be intended to cause, a change in his or her working conditions so difficult or unpleasant as to force him or her to resign; and (2) it must be shown that those burdens were imposed because of the employee's union activities. Reno Hilton, 282 NLRB 819, 836 fn. 39 (1987), which recently cited with approval the Board's long held rule from Crystal Princeton Refining Co., 222 NLRB 1068, 1069 (1976).

The second element is positively established by merely reciting the sworn testimony of Respondent's president, Koch. It was he who directly and immediately stated, "Uh, I guess I did, yeah," and "Uh huh. As I say, it brought it to a head. There's no secret about it," in response to questions concerning whether he told Stickney that if she refused to withdraw her grievance her position would be eliminated.

I cannot, and I do not, accept Respondent's contentions and arguments to the effect that Stickney's position was eliminated because of necessary or desired changes in Respondent's personnel needs or financial well-being. My reasons for finding such evidence unpersuasive will be discussed below, when treating of Respondent's burden of proof.

I also determine that, in abolishing Stickney's position and placing her in a position of being able to retain her employment with Respondent only by means of accepting a transfer to another facility some miles away, counsel for the General Counsel has satisfied all the requirements of the first element of a prima facie case of constructive discharge.

First of all, such a transfer would obviously constitute a burden of some sort. According to Stickney's credited testimony, she was able to reach her place of employment at St. Paul with a daily travel time of approximately 40 minutes (20 minutes each way), being driven by her husband. She had followed this procedure for a number of years and evidently it had worked very well, in light of Respondent's admission that she was regarded as an excellent employee (leading me to infer that she had no problems with absence or tardiness). Taking into account Stickney's credited testimony to the effect that, despite her holding a driver's license (primarily as a means of identification) her knowledge of, and skills at, operating a motor vehicle are so elemental and limited as, in my opinion, to label them as primitive, at best. Thus, it is clear that, in order for Stickney to drive herself to work, she would had to find some means of learning to drive and, having done so, would have also been compelled to purchase a motor vehicle to do that driving, because she also credibly testified that she owned no vehicle and that her husband required the family car to go to work himself. I also consider her credited testimony to the effect that she unsuccessfully checked into various means of transportation, including Minnesota Ride-Share, or securing rides from friends or relatives. These having failed, Stickney would have been required to spend approximately 3 hours per day in transit by means by bus.

Taking all this into account, I find and conclude that the change in her job status, imposed by Koch on 22 January, may legitimately be described as "a burden" on her employment status. I base this on both the required changes in reliability and comfort in her normal, past method of transportation, and also the net difference of approximately 2 hours and 20 minutes per day to spend in transit to and from the place of employment.

[2] Peculiarly, counsel for the General Counsel quibbles with my ruling at trial in which I declined to allow him to place into evidence only a portion of the transcript of the unemployment compensation hearing. Instead, I required that the entire transcript be placed in evidence. Notwithstanding the authorities cited by counsel for the General Counsel on this issue, I regard my ruling as having been well within the areas of discretion afforded me in conducting a trial. Far from seriously burdening the record, or resulting in counsel for the General Counsel's prejudice, I raise the hypothetical question as to how counsel for the General Counsel might have hoped to prove that Stickney overheard (and was thereby interfered with, restrained, or coerced by) Koch's statements during the course of his testimony at the unemployment compensation hearing, had the entire transcript, showing her appearance and presence there, not been included in the record. I am unaware of any presumption that would have warranted a conclusion that Stickney had been subjected to a threatening statement in the absence of evidence to indicate that she was present and overheard it.

I expressly disavow any intent to find here that an employer is obliged under the Act to provide employment only on terms found comfortable and convenient by employees. My holding here is limited strictly to a situation in which I find that the employer imposed a change in working conditions precisely because the employee engaged in protected activities, knowing full well that the change would cause a burden on the employee, and with the express intent or hope that it would do so, and lead to the employee's resignation or serve as sufficient warning to deter the employee, or other employees, from thereafter engaging in activities protected under the Act. Certainly no employer is obliged to take an employee's commuting time into consideration when making decisions as to how to regulate its own business. But this general rule changes when it is shown, as it is here, by means of Stickney's credited testimony, and the admissions made by Koch, that Respondent's supervisors, including Koch personally, had been previously informed for months, if not years, of Stickney's inability to operate a motor vehicle.

Thus, taking into account Koch's admissions as to his motivation, and also taking into account his presumed general knowledge of the public transportation situation in the Twin Cities metropolitan area, I find and conclude that in abolishing her position and conditioning her further employment on accepting a transfer to the Plymouth facility, Koch intended to cause a burdensome change in Stickney's working conditions sufficiently difficult or unpleasant as to compel Stickney to resign. Compare Kroger Co., 228 NLRB 149, 150 fn. 11, 152 fn. 19 (1977); Olympic Limousine Service, 278 NLRB 932, 939 (1986), and cases cited herein. The question is not whether the employee has been faced with a choice so aggravated as to be deemed egregious, but rather whether the employee was faced with any such substantial choice at all for reasons proscribed by the Act. John Dory Boat Works, 229 NLRB 844, 850–851 (1977).

Under all the circumstances of this case I find and conclude that counsel for the General Counsel has established a strong prima facie case in support of the allegations set forth in the complaint in all particulars.

D. Respondent's Arguments in Rebuttal and Mitigation

In NLRB v. Transportation Management Corp., 462 U.S. 393 (1983), the Supreme Court reaffirmed the test ennuciated by the Board in Wright Line, 251 NLRB 1083 (1980), enfd. 662 F.2d 899 (1st Cir. 1981), cert. denied 455 U.S. 989 (1982), for determining whether an employee was discharged because of the exercise of Section 7 rights. Under Wright Line counsel for the General Counsel under Section 10(c) of the Act, has the burden of establishing the prima facie case that the employee's protected conduct was a substantial or motivating factor in the employee's discharge or other adverse action taken by the employer. But, once counsel for the General Counsel has satisfied this burden, as I have found that he has done above, an employer may still avoid liability under the Act by proving by a preponderance of the evidence an affirmative defense that it would have taken the same action even if the unlawful motivation had not existed.[3]

Counsel for Respondent argues vigorously that the evidence in this case satisfies its obligation under the Wright Line test. He further argues that, even if Wright Line has not been satisfied, the unrebutted testimony of Koch serves to demonstrate that Stickney's position would have been eliminated no later than March 1987 and, as a result, any order imposed on Respondent calling for backpay should extend no further than March 1987. Respondent's arguments are premised on the testimony of Koch, and other officials of Respondent, which showed (to my satisfaction I add) that sometime during 1986 Respondent undertook a review of its operations and that recommendations were made within Respondent's organization regarding improvements. Based on the evidence I neither could nor would reach the conclusion that no recommendation was made with respect to, among other things, the status of Stickney's position. Nor would I make any finding to the effect that Stickney's position would not have been terminated at some point relatively early in 1987.

Additionally, Respondent relies on evidence, recited earlier, to the effect that some months prior to 22 January 1987, Stickney was advised that the termination of her position was imminent, and that her transfer would be required. And, Respondent asserts that the evidence with respect to a dimunition in business clearly points toward dire financial prospects for Respondent.

However, I am not persuaded by any of these arguments, or the underlying evidence, that the change in Stickney's status would have occurred when it did, or in the manner that it did, had it not been for her engagement in protected activities and refusal to desist therefrom. Koch admits that her refusal to desist "brought it to a head." How am I then to conclude exactly when it would have been "brought to a head" had she been more compliant? How am I to tell what meaning Koch assigned to the word "imminent" when he used it months preceding 22 January 1987? And, how am I to factor in the credited testimony that Stickney's supervisors provided her with reassurances when she expressed her worry to them about her tenure sometime in the summer of 1986? It is my opinion and my conclusion that, just as I have acknowledged my unwillingness and inability to reach the conclusion that Stickney's job was secure, I am similarly unable to say that the evidence supports Respondent's contentions with respect to just when her job would have been terminated, if at all.

My inability to find that this record supports any such conclusions is hardened by my recollection that, despite my repeated inquiries concerning the existence and substance of business records tending to support Respondent's claims of business justification, Respondent never produced one bit of documentation underlying its rationale for the alleged business justification, or the financial data supporting the premises of any such rationale. Months after allegedly being presented with a picture of a dire and bleak financial future by virtue of the loss of a major contract, the evidence in this case demonstrates Respondent still doing business at approximately the same rate with that same contractor. I can only conclude that the acuity with which Respondent viewed its financial straits depended on the willingness of employees, or their refusal, to give up rights granted them under the Act. Further, whether viewed on 22 January or sometime in March 1987, Respondent's financial straits are inadequately demonstrated by what I regard to be as vague and self-serving testimony by Respondent's officials. This is doubly so when it is recalled that Respondent's officials were at pains to describe the care and businesslike nature of their analysis of Respondent's overall operations carried out in 1986, and that Respondent, though blameless, was presented with the prospect of lost revenues by virtue of losing an account in 1986. Yet, as I have stated, no records, no memoranda, no data, and no accountings were produced by Respondent to support its position and testimony. I find this failure to fully warrant the inference, that I draw, that the reason why such documentation was not produced was that its contents would have proven unfavorable to Respondent's case. Textron, Inc., 199 NLRB 131, 134 (1972); Custom Wood Interiors, 248 NLRB 187 (1980); American Lumber Sales, 229 NLRB 414, 421 (1977). The obvious rationale underlying these cases is one that accords with common sense and experience, i.e., that if one asserts a fact to be true, and further asserts that documentation exists that would, if produced, corroborate one's assertion of that fact, and further, no explanation is offered of the failure to produce such documentation, and in fact, that documentation is not produced, the inference seems clear that the documentation either would not have supported the claim or would have supported the opposite point of view.

[3] The Board's adherence to this test was recently demonstrated in Joseph De Rario, DMD, P.A., 283 NLRB 592 (1987).

Accordingly, I reject as unproven, at this point in the case,[4] Respondent's contention regarding its affirmative defense or its arguments in mitigation of the backpay obligation.

Accordingly, I find and conclude that Respondent constructively discharged Stickney on 29 January 1987, thereby violating Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by constructively discharging its employee, Carol Stickney, about 29 January 1987 because she had engaged in union activities protected by the Act.

4. Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by threatening an employee with the termination of her position of employment if she failed or refused to cease engaging in activity protected by Section 7 of the Act, i.e., withdrawing her pending grievance; and Respondent further violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by imparting to an employee that her position had been abolished and that her continued employment with Respondent was contingent on her accepting a transfer to another facility, because she had engaged in the protected union activity of filing a grievance and refusing to withdraw it.

5. The above unfair labor practices have an effect on commerce as defined in the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Carol Stickney was unlawfully constructively discharged, it shall be ordered that she be offered immediate reinstatement to her former position, displacing, if necessary, any replacement, or, if not available, to a substantially equivalent position, without loss of seniority and other privileges. It shall be further ordered that Carol Stickney be made whole for lost earnings resulting from the discrimination against her by payment of a sum of money equal to that she would have earned from the date of her constructive discharge to the date of a bona fide offer of reinstatement, less net interim earnings during that period. Backpay shall be computed in the manner prescribed by F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), with interest to be computed within the manner prescribed in New Horizons for the Retarded.[5]

It shall be further ordered that the Respondent be ordered to expunge from its records any references to the constructive discharge or transfer mentioned above and to provide Carol Stickney written notice of such expunction, and inform her that the Respondent's unlawful conduct will not be used as a basis for further personnel actions against her.[6]

On the basis of these findings of fact[7] and conclusions of law, and the entire record in this proceeding, I issue the following recommended[8]

ORDER

The Respondent, Industrial Supply Company, Inc., Plymouth and St. Paul, Minnesota, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Threatening employees that their positions of employment will be terminated if they continue to engage in protected union activities, such as filing and pursuing a grievance under the collective-bargaining agreement.

---

[4] Respondent's contentions may well be more fully explored during the compliance stage of this proceeding. While this is Respondent's right, I trust and expect that, given my findings regarding Respondent's motives, those viewing such evidence will do so with a healthy amount of skepticism.

[5] 283 NLRB 1173 (1987). Interest will be computed at the "short-term Federal rate" for the underpayment of taxes as set out in the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621.

[6] See Sterling Sugars, 261 NLRB 472 (1982).

[7] As it is clear from the context of the findings made above, I leave, as I believe I must, the questions of if or when Stickney's backpay would have been tolled to compliance proceedings to ensue.

[8] All outstanding motions inconsistent with this recommended Order are denied. If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

(b) Imparting to employees that the reason that any such employee's position has been abolished is because they failed and refused to cease engaging in protected, union activities, such as filing and pursuing a grievance under the collective-bargaining agreement.

(c) Reassigning, transferring, changing the work schedule or hours, discharging, laying off, or otherwise discriminating against employees with respect to their employment, in order to discourage their membership in or support for the Union.

(d) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Consistent with the terms and the provisions of the remedy section of this decision, offer to Carol Stickney immediate, full, and unconditional reinstatement to her former job in its St. Paul facility, or, if that job no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position in its St. Paul facility, without prejudice to her seniority or any other rights or privileges previously enjoyed, and make her whole for any loss of earnings or other benefits that she suffered as a result of the discrimination practiced against her, and remove from its files any references to the unlawful abolition of her position, transfer, and constructive discharge, and notify her in writing that it has done so, and that it will not use those, or like or related, unlawful actions against her in any way.

(b) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records, financial data, and memoranda necessary or helpful to determine the amount of backpay due to Carol Stickney under this Order.

(c) Post at its facilities in St. Paul and Plymouth, Minnesota, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[9] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 18, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(d) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD

An Agency of the United States Government

After a trial at which all parties had the chance to introduce evidence and arguments, the National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act in January 1987 when we abolished the job previously held by employee Carol Stickney at our St. Paul, Minnesota facility and conditioned her further employment with us upon her accepting a transfer to our Plymonth, Minnesota facility, all because she had filed a grievance pursuant to her rights under the collective-bargaining agreement with the Union and had failed and refused to withdraw that grievance. It has also been found that we violated the law when we stated to Carol Stickney that her position would be terminated if she refused to withdraw the grievance, and thereafter, by telling her that the reason her position had been terminated was because she had failed to and refused to withdraw the grievance. In order to remedy these violations, the Board has ordered us to post this notice and to live up to it.

Section 7 of the Act gives employees these rights.

To organize

To form, join, or assist any union

To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice

To act together for other mutual aid or protection

To choose not to engage in any of these protected concerted activities.

WE WILL NOT reassign, transfer, abolish the employment position of, discharge or otherwise discriminate against employees, for joining, supporting, or assisting Warehousemen, Drivers and Helpers Union Local No. 359, affiliated with International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, or any other labor organization.

WE WILL NOT threaten employees that management will take, or has taken, any such discriminatory steps against employees.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL offer Carol Stickney immediate and full reinstatement to her former job in our St. Paul, Minnesota facility without any prejudice to her seniority or other rights and privileges previously enjoyed, and WE WILL make her whole, with interest, for any loss of earnings or other benefits that she suffered when we constructively discharged her on 29 January 1987.

---

[9] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

WE WILL remove from our files any references to the unlawful actions and constructive discharge we took against Stickney and WE WILL notify her in writing that we have done so, and that those actions will not in any way be used against her in the future.

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS JOHANSEN, BABSON, AND CRACRAFT

On March 27, 1986, the Board issued a Decision and Order in this proceeding[1] finding that the Respondent had violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by discharging two employees, Charles H. Boyle Jr. and Jerry Reners, when they refused to work on July 22, 1982. The United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit vacated the Board's Order and remanded the case to the Board for proceedings consistent with the court's opinion.[2] The Board accepted the court's remand and notified the parties that they could file statements of position. The General Counsel and the Respondent filed statements.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

We have reviewed the case and the parties' statements of position and, accepting the court's opinion as the law of the case, have decided to dismiss the complaint.

The complaint in the case alleged that certain employees of the Respondent "ceased work concertedly and engaged in a strike by refusing to perform physically dangerous work" and that the Respondent discharged them for engaging in that "protected, concerted activity."

The judge found that the only issue litigated in the case was whether the employees were discharged as a result of refusing to work because of their concern about safety conditions. He found that their reason for refusing to work did not stem from safety concerns and that no violation had been proved.

The Board disagreed with the judge and found that the Respondent violated the Act when it discharged the employees because they concertedly refused to work to protest the requirement that they climb utility poles while they were wet. The Board found that protesting over this employment condition was protected whether the protest was based on the employees' concern over safety, their personal comfort, or their supervisor's attitude. The Board viewed the complaint as broadly putting in issue whether the discharge of the employees for concertedly refusing to work violated the Act, and decided that the complaint encompassed the violation found. The Board further concluded that even under a narrower construction of the complaint, the finding of a violation was warranted because the parties had fully litigated the employees' reasons for refusing to work and the circumstances of the refusal and the discharges.

The court rejected the Board's decision and the Board's assessment as to the issues raised by the complaint. Relying in part on the fact that the General Counsel had not raised the alternative theory that the employees were discharged for concertedly refusing to work to protest "uncomfortable" working conditions until the General Counsel filed exceptions to the administrative law judge's decision, the court held that the violation found received fair notice of the alternative theory of a violation, and that the issue had not been fully and fairly litigated.

We conclude that the court's decision, which is the law of the case, precludes the Board from finding a violation on any theory except that the Respondent discharged employees for a concerted protest based on safety concerns.[3] As the evidence in the case does not establish that the protest was based on safety concerns, we shall dismiss the complaint.

ORDER

The complaint is dismissed.

[3] The court concluded that the General Counsel had not timely raised the alternative theory relied on by the Board. Accepting this finding as the law of the case, we do not find it appropriate to reopen the record to permit further litigation of the case on this alternative theory.

Haley & Haley, Inc. and Oceanway Transport, Inc. and International Woodworkers of America, Local 3-140, AFL-CIO. Case 36-CA-4967

June 30, 1988

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On December 13, 1985, Administrative Law Judge Gerald A. Wacknov issued the attached decision. The General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order.

1. The complaint alleges that Respondent Haley & Haley, Inc., and Respondent Oceanway Transport, Inc., are alter egos and that they violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) by transferring employees and equipment from Haley & Haley to Oceanway in order to perform log-hauling work. The judge recommended that the complaint be dismissed, but for the reasons given below we conclude that the Respondents' conduct violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1).

The central facts are not in dispute and are largely established by uncontradicted testimony. Haley & Haley is a family corporation engaged exclusively in the business of hauling logs. The Union has represented Haley & Haley's employees for many years, and the parties' most recent collective-bargaining agreement was effective from June 1, 1983, until June 1, 1986. Loren Haley (Loren) is Haley & Haley's president, his son Larry Haley (Larry) is its vice president, Duane Vergeer is its secretary, and Charles Ritchey is its treasurer. The parties stipulated that Loren owns 276 shares of Haley & Haley's stock, that Larry owns 191 shares, that Larry's wife Lucretia Haley (Lucretia) owns 4 shares, that Larry's sons Lee Haley (Lee) and Paul Haley (Paul) each own 2 shares, that family members Larry L. Haley and Jean L. Haley each own 2 shares, and that Duane Vergeer owns 1 share.[2] Until Haley & Haley ceased hauling logs on May 7, 1985,[3] Larry served as its manager and operated the Company on a day-to-day basis. In his absence, Supervisor Gary Sichting was responsible for daily operations. Loren is "semiretired," according to both Larry and Loren.

Oceanway is a wholly owned subsidiary of Haley & Haley and at the time of the hearing Oceanway operated both a log-hauling department and a "lowboy" department, which hauled general commodities, including heavy equipment.[4] Larry is the president of Oceanway, Loren is its secretary-treasurer, and Lucretia is a director.

Larry and Loren are also the officers of L & L Repair Incorporated, a corporation which performs repair work almost exclusively for Haley & Haley and Oceanway.[5] Until some time in 1985, Haley & Haley, Oceanway, and L & L Repair all operated on the same premises in Mapleton, Oregon. At the time of the hearing all three companies had relocated to Reedsport, Oregon.[6]

In 1984 and 1985, the logging industry in Oregon was experiencing serious economic difficulties, and in response to these difficulties Haley & Haley purchased Oceanway on March 30, 1984. Larry Loren and Lucretia negotiated the purchase. Larry testified that the purchase was necessary "[b]ecause I could see down the road by reading papers, and talking to people and watching TV, that the logging industry was going downhill." Oceanway was dormant at the time, and Larry testified that Haley & Haley purchased Oceanway in order to acquire its permit to haul general commodities other than logs. In June 1984 Oceanway acquired one lowboy truck from another company and began hauling such general commodities. In August 1984 Larry applied for and obtained a log-hauling permit for Oceanway, and he testified that he did so "for the future, I thought we might need it." Oceanway did not begin hauling logs until February 17.

Haley & Haley operated 21 log-hauling trucks, and until early in 1985 it had derived approximately 97 percent of its business from Champion Paper Company (Champion) and International Paper Company (International). Its remaining business was divided among several smaller companies. In

The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[2] Vergeer is the only shareholder who is not a member of the Haley family. The parties also stipulated that since July 24, 1985, there may have been some small stock transfers to the children of some of the shareholders.

[3] Unless otherwise specified, all dates refer to 1985.

[4] A lowboy truck hauls items other than logs. At the time of the hearing, Oceanway operated three lowboy trucks.

[5] L & L Repair is not a respondent in this proceeding.

[6] Larry testified that L & L Repair also has a facility in Oakridge, Oregon.

289 NLRB No. 87

late 1984 or early 1985, Champion announced that it intended to terminate its operations, and International curtailed its operations and announced its intention to reduce the rates that it paid for log-hauling services.[7] On April 12 Champion did terminate its operations, and on May 21 International's lower rates went into effect.

The financial difficulties of Champion and International had a serious impact on Haley & Haley. Larry testified that before April 12 Haley & Haley engaged in "very little" log hauling for International, and that after April 12 it no longer hauled for Champion. During this time, according to Larry, "we worked a few trucks" for small independent logging companies, or "gypos." Larry testified, however, that Haley & Haley was unable to "come out" with a profit because of its high contractual wage rates and the low rates paid by the gypos for log-hauling services.[8] In these circumstances, Larry recognized that Oceanway could "get more business" than Haley & Haley and that "we would sell our trucks to Oceanway."

On February 17 Haley & Haley sold 5 of its 21 log-hauling trucks to Oceanway,[9] and Oceanway immediately activated its log-hauling operation. Employees of L & L Repair removed Haley & Haley's name from the trucks and repainted Oceanway's name in its place. Larry testified, in reference to Oceanway, that "we" subsequently purchased two log-hauling trucks from Haley & Haley in March, one in April, eight in May, and the four remaining trucks on August 8.[10]

When the first trucks were sold on February 17, several of Haley & Haley's drivers withdrew from the Union and went to work for Oceanway.[11] Larry testified that "Oceanway wasn't supposed to be hiring Haley & Haley drivers. They belonged to the Union." However, he also testified that those Haley & Haley drivers who did go to work for Oceanway "were supposed to get a withdrawal from the Union." The Respondent's attorney, Duane Vergeer, stated at the hearing that some Haley & Haley drivers went to work for Oceanway, "but not until after they withdrew from the Union." Vergeer also stated that unless Haley & Haley's drivers "withdrew from the Union, they wouldn't have been working for Oceanway, because Oceanway is a non-Union concern."[12] Eleven of Haley & Haley's drivers eventually went to work for Oceanway, and eight were still employed by Oceanway at the time of the hearing.

Larry testified that he is not involved in the daily operation of Oceanway, although there is evidence that he is engaged to some extent in performing dispatching duties.[13] According to Larry's testimony, Lee and Paul operate Oceanway's log-hauling department, are responsible for hiring decisions in that department, and in fact "hired themselves" when Oceanway began hauling logs.[14] Larry also testified that an individual named Charles Carlow operates Oceanway's lowboy department and is responsible for its hiring decisions. Larry further stated that he initially hired Carlow in June 1984, that neither Lee nor Paul had had any previous management experience before going to work for Oceanway, and that Lee, Paul, and Carlow are all truckdrivers who regularly drive for Oceanway when work is available.[15] According to Larry, "that's all Oceanway has, is truck drivers," and he also asserted that Oceanway "[can't] afford to have people sitting in the office." Larry further testified that Lee, Paul, and Carlow ask him questions about operating the business, but do not necessarily follow his advice.

[7] Haley & Haley's labor relations consultant, Gossard, testified that it was "common knowledge" that Champion was terminating its operations and that International's operations had been curtailed. Gossard indicated that prior to April 1985, he had discussed "several times" with the Haleys the financial situation of Champion and International. The Union's business representative, Letts, testified that in late 1984 there were "feelings out in the industry" that the large wood operators would either go out of business or seek to modify their contract.

[8] According to Larry, the gypos paid only $23 to $24 an hour for log-hauling services. By contrast, International formerly had paid approximately $39.60 an hour for such services. Haley & Haley's contractual wage and benefit rates totaled approximately $18 an hour and according to Larry, Haley & Haley was using approximately 100 gallons of diesel fuel a day.

[9] A sixth log-hauling truck was sold to Oceanway at the same time, but was converted to a lowboy truck.

[10] The Respondent's accountant, Charles Ritchy, testified that the trucks were sold on notes written from Oceanway to Haley & Haley, with an interest rate of 10.5 percent. According to Ritchey each note was written with a 1-year due date. Oceanway does not make individual monthly payments on each note, and the method of payment has changed over time. At first Oceanway made payments on the notes to Haley & Haley, apparently from an "intercompany account," which each company maintained to pay its debts to the other. On 8 August, when the final four trucks were sold, Oceanway instead began to assume some of Haley & Haley's obligations when the latter was no longer able to make payments on its own notes to its bank. Ritchey testified that this procedure constituted "automatic payment from Oceanway to Haley & Haley."

[11] Larry testified that Leland Gronnel, Lee, and Paul had been union members while driving for Haley & Haley. Those three, and two other individuals who apparently had not previously worked for Haley & Haley, were the first five log-hauling drivers hired by Oceanway.

[12] The complaint does not contain an 8(a)(3) allegation regarding with the hiring of these employees, or regarding any of the Respondent's other conduct.

[13] Robert Hensley, a driver for Haley & Haley, testified that Haley & Haley and Oceanway used the same radio frequency, and that he heard Larry engaging in radio dispatches of Oceanway drivers in approximately March 1985 and on and off over a period of months. Although Hensley indicated that anyone in the office could answer the radio, he also testified that he heard Larry relay messages and tell Oceanway drivers which log-hauling assignments to perform, where to pick up fuel, where to have a flat tire fixed, and where other trucks were located. Hensley further testified that "if you listened to the conversation, you could pretty well figure out who was in command." Larry testified that he did relay messages over the radio.

[14] Larry testified that Oceanway's log-hauling department was initially operated by Leland Gronnel and Paul, but that Lee replaced Gronnel when the latter quit.

[15] Lee, Paul, and Charles Carlow did not testify at the hearing.

As noted above, Oceanway activated its log-hauling operation when the first five trucks were sold on February 17, and Larry testified that Oceanway's business grew "gradually." According to Larry, Oceanway began to haul logs for employers "in different parts of the state that Haley & Haley ha[d] never been in." In addition, Oceanway began to engage in substantial log hauling for International at some point during 1985, although the record does not disclose the precise date. Larry testified that as of the day of the hearing, Oceanway operated five trucks out of International's facility at Gardiner, Oregon, and four trucks out of another International facility at Vaughn, Oregon.

There is no evidence that the Respondents notified the Union or requested bargaining prior to the events of February 17. However, as more fully explained in the judge's decision, the parties did engage in bargaining at a later point. Briefly, the Union's business representative, Letts, sent Haley & Haley a letter on March 13 that asserted that the removal of the trucks violated their contract. Haley & Haley's first approach to the Union came in April, when its labor relations consultant, Gossard, told Letts that wage reductions were necessary. On April 20 Larry sent the Union a letter asserting that "substantial changes" would be needed to enable Haley & Haley to compete for International's business. The letter further asserted that "[u]nless something happens soon, we will be forced to sell off more of our trucks or even consider going out of business."

On May 7, Haley & Haley ceased hauling logs, although its operations were not completely terminated. Rather, according to Larry, Haley & Haley simply parked its four remaining trucks while trying to find jobs that would permit it to pay its contractual wage rates. After May 7, the parties bargained on several occasions, but were unable to agree on a wage-reduction package. On May 28, the Union made a written request for certain information, but at a meeting on May 30, according to the credited testimony, Letts told Larry and Loren that the information need not be furnished until a meeting could be arranged with the Union's regional representative, Hubble. At the same meeting Letts also told Loren "not to worry" about the information request. For reasons not disclosed by the record, a meeting with Hubble was never arranged, and Haley & Haley did not provide the requested information. Following additional unsuccessful bargaining, as stated by Larry, "we just went ahead and sold" Haley & Haley's four remaining trucks to Oceanway on August 8, after concluding that "we couldn't get . . . anything out of Mr. Letts."

The judge found that Haley & Haley did not establish Oceanway as a "disguised corporation." He also found that no unit work was transfered outside the bargaining unit because the work that Oceanway obtained as a nonunion entity could not have been obtained by Haley & Haley because of the latter's contractual obligation to pay a higher wage rate. He then found that Haley & Haley had bargained in good faith to impasse with the Union. Relying on Milwaukee Spring Division, 268 NLRB 601 (1984), affd. 765 F.2d 175 (D.C. Cir. 1985), the judge concluded that Haley & Haley did not violate the Act by causing Oceanway to engage in log hauling.[16]

We find it appropriate to analyze this case under alter ego principles and not, as the judge essentially did, under the principles established in Milwaukee Spring and Otis Elevator Co., 269 NLRB 891 (1984).[17] In Milwaukee Spring, the Board found that an economically motivated relocation of unit work is not a midterm contractual modification in the absence of a specific contractual provision restricting such a relocation. In Otis Elevator the Board considered management decisions having "a substantial impact on the continued availability of employment," as described by the Supreme Court in First National Maintenance Corp. v. NLRB, 452 U.S. 666 (1981).

The Respondents' conduct here is not the type of conduct that the Board considered in Otis Elevator and Milwaukee Spring. In those cases the management decisions at issue were based on economic considerations and were not the result of a proscribed motive.[18] Indeed, the Board plurality in Otis Elevator was careful to distinguish economically motivated decisions from situations in which an employer utilizes "alter ego or other sham devices . . . to disguise a unilateral reduction in labor costs in an operation over which the employer maintain[s] surreptitious control."[19] In light of all

[16] The complaint also alleges that the Respondents violated Sec. 8(a)(5) and (1) by failing to comply with the Union's written information request, discussed above. The judge concluded that the Respondents' failure to furnish the information did not violate the Act. We agree with the judge in view of the credited testimony that Letts told Loren "not to worry" about the information, and that Letts stated that the information need not be provided until a meeting was held with the Union's regional representative, Hubble. As noted above, that meeting never took place for reasons that the record does not disclose.

[17] The judge did not cite Otis Elevator, but that decision is relevant to the manner in which he analyzed the case.

[18] We also note that in First National Maintenance Corp. v. NLRB, the Supreme Court "illustrate[d] the limits" of its holding by observing, inter alia, that the union did not claim that the employer's decision had been motivated by union animus. 452 U.S. at 687.

the evidence analyzed below, including evidence establishing a proscribed motive, we conclude that Haley & Haley and Oceanway are alter egos and that it is not appropriate to analyze their conduct under the principles set forth in Otis Elevator, Milwaukee Spring, and First National Maintenance Corp. v. NLRB.[20] In Otis Elevator cases, the issue is whether there is a duty to bargain over the decision to transfer work out of a unit; in alter ego cases, the issue is whether the work is effectively still in the unit because the allegedly new employer is the same as the former employer.

In Advance Electric, 268 NLRB 1001, 1002 (1984), the Board stated that it will find alter ego status where two employers have "'substantially identical' management, business purpose, operation, equipment, customers, and supervision, as well as ownership." The Board also stated that among the other factors that must be considered is "whether the purpose behind the creation of the alleged alter ego was legitimate or whether, instead, its purpose was to evade responsibilities under the Act."[21]

At the outset we find that Haley & Haley and Oceanway share substantially identical ownership. Loren and Larry together own 467 of the approximately 480 outstanding shares of Haley & Haley, and 12 of the remaining 13 outstanding shares are owned by members of the Haley family. Haley & Haley purchased the stock of Oceanway and is its only stockholder. Where, as here, the stock of two companies is concentrated in members of the same family, the Board has found ownership to be "substantially identical," for purposes of determining alter ego status.[22]

We also find that Haley & Haley and Oceanway share substantially identical management. Loren is the president of Haley & Haley and the secretary-treasurer of Oceanway. Larry is the vice president of Haley & Haley and the president of Oceanway. Charles Ritchey is the treasurer of Haley & Haley and the accountant for both companies. Lucretia owns four shares of Haley & Haley and is a director of Oceanway.

In finding that Haley & Haley and Oceanway have substantially identical management, we particularly note that Larry was the dominant force in establishing the direction of both companies. In this connection, we find that Larry was the central figure in the decision-making process, which culminated in the sale of the trucks, the single decision that most affected the direction of the two companies. In support of this finding, we note the absence of evidence that any other management official from either company played a significant role in the decision to sell the trucks, and we also note that Larry's own testimony demonstrates his control over the decision-making process. Thus, Larry testified that in August 1984 he applied for and obtained Oceanway's log-hauling permit "for the future [because] I thought we might need it." When the financial difficulties of Champion and International became severe, Haley & Haley "worked a few trucks" for the gypos, the small independent companies. However, "we couldn't come out" with a profit because of Haley & Haley's high contractual wages and the low rates that it received from the gypos. Faced with these difficulties, Larry recognized that Oceanway could "get more business" than Haley & Haley, and that "we could sell our trucks to Oceanway." The first five trucks were sold on February 17 and, in reference to Oceanway, Larry testified that "we" added two trucks in March, one in April, and eight in May.[23] Oceanway's business grew "gradually" after its log-hauling operation was activated, and after May 7 "we just parked" the remaining four Haley & Haley trucks until profitable work could be found. On August 8, "we just went ahead and sold them to Oceanway" after concluding that "we couldn't get . . . anything out of Mr. Letts." Larry's extensive testimony, when coupled with the lack of evidence that other management officials participated in the decision-making process, clearly establishes that Larry was the central figure for both companies in the decision to transfer the trucks.

Larry also played a major role in Haley & Haley's purchase of Oceanway, another decision that greatly affected the direction of both companies. Oceanway was a dormant corporation in March 1984 when Larry, in conjunction with Loren and Lucretia, negotiated the purchase of Oceanway's stock. The purpose of the acquisition, according to Larry, was to obtain Oceanway's permit to haul general commodities, "[b]ecause I could see the road . . . that the logging industry was going downhill . . . ." In June 1984 Oceanway began hauling general commodities, including heavy equipment, with one driver hired by Larry. Larry's own testimony therefore establishes that he played a major role in the acquisition of Oceanway.[24]

[20] We agree that the situation here is distinguishable from that in Otis under any of the views expressed in that case.

[23] Larry's testimony illustrates the close connection between the two companies and his role as the central figure in the decision. He first testified, in reference to Haley & Haley, that "we" sold "our" trucks to Oceanway. He then testified, in reference to Oceanway, that "we" added a number of trucks over a period of months.

We accord little weight to Larry's general testimony that he is not involved in Oceanway's daily operation,[25] that Lee and Paul operate its log-hauling department, and that Charles Carlow operates its lowboy department. The evidence discloses that Larry spends a significant amount of time engaging in dispatching duties for Oceanway. Further, Lee and Paul, who purportedly are two of Oceanway's managers, did not even begin working for Oceanway until it began hauling logs on February 17; before that they had driven trucks for Haley & Haley. Besides their late involvement in the management of Oceanway and their lack of management experience, Lee and Paul, along with Carlow, continued to perform as truckdrivers, regularly driving for Oceanway when work was available. Indeed, Larry testified that "that's all Oceanway has, is truck drivers," and he also noted that Oceanway "[can't] afford to have people sitting in the office." Consequently, we find that Lee, Paul, and Carlow spend most of their time performing "hands-on" work.[26] In Advance Electric, supra at 1003, the Board was not persuaded that an individual played a significant managerial or supervisory role in light of the fact that he was primarily engaged in "hands-on" work. Similarly, we see little reason to give weight to Larry's conclusional testimony that Lee, Paul, and Carlow operate Oceanway, in view of his concession that they regularly perform "hands-on" work.

Nor is our finding that the two companies share substantially identical management affected by Larry's general testimony that he does not participate in Oceanway's hiring process; that Lee and Paul make the hiring decisions for Oceanway's log-hauling department; and that Carlow makes such decision for its lowboy department. First, it was Larry who hired Carlow in June 1984 to drive what was then Oceanway's only lowboy truck. Further, Larry's testimony that Lee, Paul, and Gronnel "hired themselves" when Oceanway began hauling logs in February 1984, falls of its own weight. Larry did not explain the process by which they "hired themselves," or how that could have occurred without his participation, as it was he who made the decision to activate Oceanway's log-hauling operation. It also is clear that, regardless of the hiring role played by Lee and Paul, Larry apparently set one of the conditions—no union members—by which the hiring of drivers in Oceanway's log-hauling department would be governed.[27] Thus, he testified in reference to the drivers in the log-hauling department: "Oceanway wasn't supposed to be hiring Haley & Haley drivers. They belonged to the Union." Regarding those Haley & Haley drivers who were hired by Oceanway, Larry testified that, "they were supposed to get a withdrawal from the Union."

Even if Larry had less influence in the daily operation and hiring process of Oceanway than he did regardingthat of Haley & Haley, we are convinced that that weight of the evidence supports a finding that Haley & Haley and Oceanway have substantially identical management.[28] First, the evidence establishes that he does maintain some role in Oceanway's daily operation and hiring process. More importantly, the record firmly establishes that Larry was a major force behind Haley & Haley's acquisition of Oceanway, and that he was the central force behind the decision to activate Oceanway's log-hauling operation and to phase out Haley & Haley's operation.

We also find that Haley & Haley and Oceanway share a substantially identical business purpose and mode of operation. Both companies have been engaged in the hauling of logs, and by August 1984 each had obtained a permit to haul logs throughout the State of Oregon. Both companies operated out of the same location in Mapleton, and sometime in [24] The role of other officials in the decision to purchase Oceanway is not clear. Larry testified that he negotiated the purchase with Loren and Lucretia, and Charles Ritchey testified that Larry and Loren had discussed with him "in broad terms" the possibility of "branching out from log trucking." However, Lucretia did not testify at all, Loren did not testify concerning the purchase of Oceanway, and Ritchey did not indicate the extent of his participation in the discussions leading to the decision.

---

[25] There is no question concerning his status as Haley & Haley's manager and operating head.

[26] The Union introduced into evidence a document prepared by Lucretia and Larry pursuant to a subpoena by the Union. The document lists the individuals who perform various duties for Oceanway and Haley & Haley. It indicates that Lee, Paul, Carlow and, until he quit, Gronnel, have been responsible for handling discipline and employee complaints at Oceanway. However, the record does not establish the number of employees, if any, who have been disciplined or who have registered complaints, and it does not establish whether these responsibilities consume any significant amount of these individuals' time. The same document also states that these individuals perform dispatching duties for Oceanway, but the record also does not establish what percentage of their time is occupied by these duties. Moreover, as noted above, the record demonstrates that Larry performs dispatching duties for Oceanway. Consequently, we find that the conclusional statements contained in the document do not tend to establish that Oceanway's management is different from Haley & Haley's.

[27] Regarding the lowboy department, Larry testified that Carlow hires the drivers, but the record establishes that the lowboy department operates only three trucks.

[28] We find that the record does not permit a conclusion whether the two companies share substantially identical immediate supervision, or even whether they draw a distinction between high level management and immediate supervision. Thus, Larry was Haley & Haley's vice president and was responsible for its daily operation. With the exception of Gary Sichting, who operated the Company in Larry's absence, Haley & Haley had no other supervisors. In addition, it is not entirely clear who exercises managerial and supervisory authority for Oceanway. Lee, Paul, and Carlow assertedly are responsible for daily operations, but they spend most of their time driving trucks. However, we note that supervision is merely one factor among many to be considered

1985 both relocated to Reedsport. The repair work for both companies has been performed by L & L Repair, which is owned by the Haleys and which also relocated from Mapleton to Reedsport.[29]

Our finding that the two companies share a substantially identical business purpose is not affected by the fact that Haley & Haley was engaged exclusively in the business of hauling logs, while Oceanway hauled both logs and general commodities such as heavy equipment. Oceanway operated only one lowboy truck for hauling heavy equipment from June 1984 until February. In February it purchased a second truck for that purpose and subsequently it purchased a third. However, between February 17 and August 8 it acquired 20 log-hauling trucks from Haley & Haley. Consequently, we think it clear that after February 17, Oceanway was engaged predominantly in the hauling of logs. In similar circumstances in Advance Electric, supra at 1002, the Board concluded that two enterprises had a substantially identical business purpose, and we reach the same conclusion here.

The record also establishes that Haley & Haley and Oceanway share a substantially identical customer base. As noted above, International had been one of Haley & Haley's major customers for several years. Although the record does not disclose the precise date, Oceanway also began to engage in substantial log hauling for International at some point during 1985. As of the day of the hearing, according to Larry, Oceanway operated five trucks out of one of International's facilities and four trucks out of another of its facilities.

Haley & Haley's other major customer, Champion, had experienced serious financial difficulties over an extended period of time and finally terminated its operations on April 12. In our view, a finding that Haley & Haley and Oceanway shared a substantially identical customer base is not precluded by the circumstance that Champion terminated its operations before Oceanway had any realistic opportunity to seek its business.

It is true that Haley & Haley performed much less work for gypos, the small independent businesses that paid a lower rate than the large companies for log-hauling services, than did Oceanway.[30] Noting this fact, the judge found that Oceanway was able to obtain this work because, as a nonunion company, its costs were less than Haley & Haley's, and for that reason, the work obtained by Oceanway was not work that Haley & Haley otherwise would have obtained. We, however, do not view this circumstance as precluding a finding that the two companies share a substantially identical customer base. As discussed infra, we find that Haley & Haley sold its equipment and transferred its employees to Oceanway for the proscribed purpose of evading its responsibility under the Act to adhere to its collective-bargaining agreement with the Union. Therefore, Oceanway obtained this work only after Haley & Haley chose to evade its collective-bargaining agreement rather than seek the concessions that might have enabled it to compete for the work. We shall not alter our conclusion that the two companies share a substantially identical customer base merely because Haley & Haley succeeded in achieving the outcome that its unlawfully motivated conduct was designed to achieve.

The record also clearly establishes that Haley & Haley and Oceanway have used substantially identical equipment. Haley & Haley sold all its trucks to Oceanway, and the trucks were merely repainted with Oceanway's name.[31] To operate this equipment, Oceanway employed 11 of Haley & Haley's drivers, 8 of whom it still employs.

Also relevant to the alter ego issue is the motive underlying the sale of the trucks and the activation of Oceanway's log-hauling operation. The record establishes that since at least March 1984 Larry had been aware that the logging industry was "going downhill." In August 1984 he obtained a log-hauling permit for Oceanway "for the [future] because I thought we might need it." Subsequently he learned that one of Haley & Haley's two primary customers intended to terminate its operations, and that the other intended substantially to lower the rate it would pay for log-hauling services. Haley & Haley's attempt to haul logs for the gypos proved unprofitable because of its contractual wage obligations and the low rate paid by the gypos.

Confronted with these circumstances, Larry chose to ignore Haley & Haley's obligations under the collective-bargaining agreement. Having previously laid the groundwork by obtaining Oceanway's log-hauling permit, he decided simply to sell

[29] As noted above, L & L Repair also operates a facility in Oakridge, Oregon.

[30] Forrest Egli, a driver for Haley & Haley, testified that Oceanway hauled for gypos when it commenced operations, and Larry testified that Oceanway hauled for companies "in different parts of the state that Haley & Haley ha[d] never been in."

[31] A similar circumstance existed in Advance Electric, supra at 1003.

In Advance Electric the Board also noted that the transfer of equipment from one enterprise to another was not marked by such business formalities as contracts or bills of sale. In this proceeding Haley & Haley and Oceanway did execute bills of sale, but we see no significance to this distinction because we still would not characterize the sale as an arm's-length transaction. Larry, as the president of Oceanway and the primary manager of Haley & Haley, was the dominant figure in the decision to sell the trucks. There is no evidence that any negotiations over price took place, and the extent to which cash changed hands is unclear. Ritchey testified that some payments were made, but that on August 8 Oceanway simply assumed Haley & Haley's obligations when the latter could no longer make payments on its own debts.

Haley & Haley's trucks to Oceanway and operate the latter without the burden of a union contract. The record leaves no doubt that Larry intended to operate Oceanway as a nonunion enterprise. Larry testified that "Oceanway wasn't supposed to be hiring Haley & Haley drivers. They belonged to the Union." According to Larry, those Haley & Haley drivers who did go to work for Oceanway "were supposed to get a withdrawal from the Union." In addition, the Respondent's attorney stated at the hearing that some Haley & Haley drivers went to work for Oceanway, "but not until after they withdrew from the Union . . . . Unless they withdrew from the Union, they wouldn't have been working for Oceanway, because Oceanway is a non-union concern."

We find in these circumstances that Larry activated Oceanway's log-hauling operation for the purpose of enabling Haley & Haley to evade its responsibility under the Act to honor its collective-bargaining agreement with the Union. As we found in Advance Electric, supra at 1004, such a motive supports an alter ego finding.[32]

Because of the above analysis, we find that Respondent Oceanway is the alter ego of Respondent Haley & Haley. We also find that the Respondents violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) by transferring equipment and employees from Haley & Haley to Oceanway to perform log-hauling work, for the purpose of avoiding their statutory responsibility to adhere to their collective-bargaining agreement with the Union.[33] We further find that Respondent Oceanway and Respondent Haley & Haley are bound to the collective-bargaining agreement between Respondent Haley & Haley and the Union, and that the Respondents violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) by refusing to honor and apply that collective-bargaining agreement.[34]

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent Haley & Haley, Inc. and Respondent Oceanway Transport, Inc. are employers engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. International Woodworkers of America, Local 3-140, AFL–CIO is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. Respondent Oceanway Transport, Inc. is, for the purpose of this proceeding, the alter ego of Respondent Haley & Haley, Inc.

4. All employees of Haley & Haley, Inc., and of its alter ego Oceanway Transport, Inc., excluding office clerical employees, professional employees, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act, constitute a unit appropriate for collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act.

5. At all times material, the Union has been the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the employees in the appropriate unit within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act.

6. By transferring equipment and employees from Respondent Haley & Haley, Inc. to Respondent Oceanway Transport, Inc., to perform log-hauling work to avoid their statutory responsibility to adhere to their collective-bargaining agreement with the Union; and by refusing to honor and apply that collective-bargaining agreement, the Respondents have violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

7. The unfair labor practices are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

8. The Respondents otherwise have not violated the Act as alleged in the complaint.

THE REMEDY

Having found that the Respondents have violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1), we shall order them to cease and desist and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

We have found that the Respondent Oceanway Transport, Inc. and the Respondent Haley & Haley, Inc. are alter egos. We have also found that they transferred equipment and employees from Respondent Haley & Haley, Inc. to Respondent [32] We are not persuaded that Haley & Haley's belated offer to bargain precludes a finding that it acted with a proscribed motive. Even if Haley & Haley had engaged in timely bargaining to impasse for concessions, it still would not have been privileged to create an alter ego for the purpose of evading its collective-bargaining agreement. The creation of an alter ego is not the type of management decision analyzed in Otis Elevator, where, for example, an employer may implement a decision to relocate unit work after it has bargained in good faith to impasse if the contract does not restrict the relocation.

Moreover, we note that Haley & Haley did not engage in timely bargaining. It began to implement its decision on February 17 without notifying or bargaining with the Union, and it did not contact the Union for several weeks following the Union's March 13 protest of the sale of the trucks. It was not until April that Haley & Haley expressed any willingness to bargain, when Gossard advised Letts that wage reductions were necessary. At that time, Haley & Haley's decision already had been substantially implemented. In addition, Haley & Haley's April 28 bargaining request was coupled with a reminder that some trucks already had been sold and a threat that more would be sold unless concessions were forthcoming. Only 9 days later Haley & Haley ceased hauling logs.

[33] See G & M Lath & Plaster Co., 252 NLRB 969, 979–980 (1980).

[34] As noted above, we have found it appropriate to analyze this case under alter ego principles and not under the principles set forth in Otis Elevator, supra, and Milwaukee Spring, supra. We emphasize again that one factor that distinguishes this case from Otis Elevator is the Respondents' unlawful motive. The Board in Otis Elevator expressly noted that there was no allegation that the employer had acted for antiunion reasons. 269 NLRB at 892 fn. 4. In addition, as indicated above, the Supreme Court in First National Maintenance noted the absence of any claim that the employer's decision had been motivated by union animus. 452 U.S. at 687. Similarly, in Milwaukee Spring the Board noted the parties' stipulation that the employer's decision was not the result of union animus. 268 NLRB at 601.

Oceanway Transport, Inc., to perform log-hauling work to avoid their statutory responsibility to adhere to their collective-bargaining agreement. We have also found that they refused to abide by that collective-bargaining agreement. Having made these findings, we shall order the Respondents to honor the collective-bargaining agreement and apply it to their employees, and to make their employees whole, with interest,[35] for any losses they may have suffered because of the Respondents' failure to honor and apply the collective-bargaining agreement. In addition, we shall order the Respondents to make whole their employees by making payments to the various trust funds established by the collective-bargaining agreement,[36] and by reimbursing employees for any expenses ensuing from the Respondents' unlawful failure to make such required payments, as provided in Kraft Plumbing & Heating, 252 NLRB 891 fn. 1 (1980), enfd. 661 F.2d 940 (9th Cir. 1981).[37]

(a) Transferring equipment and employees from Respondent Haley & Haley, Inc. to Respondent Oceanway Transport, Inc., to perform log-hauling work to avoid their statutory responsibility to adhere to their collective-bargaining agreement with International Woodworkers of America, Local 3-140, AFL–CIO.

(b) Refusing to honor and apply their collective-bargaining agreement with the Union described above. The unit is:

(c) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Honor and apply the collective-bargaining agreement with the Union described above.

(b) Make whole the bargaining unit employees and reimburse the funds established by the collective-bargaining agreement, with interest, for any losses suffered as a result of the Respondents' failure to honor and apply the collective-bargaining agreement, in the manner described in the remedy section of this decision.

Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondents to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(e) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT transfer equipment from Haley & Haley, Inc. to Oceanway Transport, Inc., to perform log-hauling work to avoid our statutory responsibility to adhere to our collective-bargaining agreement with International Woodworkers of America, Local 3-140, AFL-CIO.

[35] See Ogle Protection Service, 183 NLRB 682 (1970).

[36] Because the provisions of employee benefit fund agreements are variable and complex, the Board does not provide for interest at a fixed rate on fund payments due as part of a "make-whole" remedy. We therefore leave to further proceedings the question of how much interest the Respondents must pay into the benefit fund to satisfy our "make-whole" remedy. These additional amounts may be determined, depending on the circumstances of each case, by reference to provisions in the documents governing the fund at issue and, when there are no governing provisions, to evidence of any loss directly attributable to the unlawful action, which might include the loss of return on investment of the portion of funds and withheld additional administrative costs, but not collateral losses. See Merryweather Optical Co., 240 NLRB 1213, 1216 fn. 7 (1979).

[37] See also Advance Electric, supra at 1005.

[38] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

WE WILL NOT refuse to honor and apply our collective-bargaining agreement with the Union described above.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL honor and apply our collective-bargaining agreement with the Union described above.

> The unit consists of all employees of Haley & Haley, Inc., and its alter ego Oceanway Transport, Inc., excluding office clerical employees, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act.

WE WILL, in the manner prescribed by the National Labor Relations Board, make whole our bargaining unit employees and reimburse the funds established by the collective-bargaining agreement, with interest, for any losses suffered as a result of our failure to honor and apply our collective-bargaining agreement.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

GERALD A. WACKNOV, Administrative Law Judge. Pursuant to notice, a hearing with respect to this matter was held before me in Eugene, Oregon, on 1 October 1985. The initial charge was filed on 13 June 1985 by International Woodworkers of America, Local 3-140, AFL-CIO (the Union). An amended charge was filed by the Union on 31 July 1985.

Thereafter, on 31 July 1985, the Regional Director for Region 19 of the National Labor Relations Board (the Board) issued a complaint and notice of hearing alleging a violation by Haley & Haley, Inc. and Oceanway Transport, Inc. (Respondents) of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act).

The parties were afforded a full opportunity to be heard, to call, examine and cross-examine witnesses, and to introduce relevant evidence. Since the close of the hearing, briefs have been received from the General Counsel, counsel for the Respondent, and counsel for the Union.

On the entire record,[1] and based on my observation of the witnesses and consideration of the briefs submitted, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent Haley & Haley, Inc. is an Oregon corporation with an office and place of business located in Mapleton, Oregon, where it is engaged in the business of contract log hauling. In the course and conduct of its business operations, Haley & Haley, Inc. has provided services valued in excess of $50,000 annually to customers, including International Paper Company and Champion Paper Company, which enterprises were directly engaged in interstate commerce.

On the basis of the foregoing, I find that Haley & Haley, Inc. is, and has been at all times material, an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

It is admitted that the Union is, and has been at all times material, a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Issues

The principal issue raised by the pleadings is whether Haley & Haley, Inc. and Oceanway Transport, Inc., a corporation wholly owned by Haley & Haley, have violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act by unilaterally transferring equipment and employees outside the bargaining unit, and by failing and refusing to abide by the provisions of a current collective-bargaining agreement.

B. The Facts

Haley & Haley, Inc. (Haley), a family corporation engaged in the log-hauling business, has maintained a collective-bargaining relationship with the Union for many years. The current collective-bargaining agreement extends from 1 June 1983 to 1 June 1986. Haley had two principal customers that accounted for approximately 97 percent of its business, each customer providing nearly half of Haley's business over the years. One of these customers was Champion Paper Company, which terminated its operations in January or February 1985. About the same time the other customer, International Paper Company, changed its method of compensating log-hauling contractors and announced that it intended to significantly reduce the fees it was willing to pay for this service.[2] Haley was economically unable to haul logs at the new rate. Moreover, because of the established contractual wage rate, Haley was unable to haul for "gypos," small independent nonunion companies, at a profit. As a result, Haley ceased hauling operations on 7 May 1985.

[1] Errors in the transcript have been noted and corrected.

[2] Prior to this time, the Union's contract with International Paper provided that log-hauling work be contracted to union haulers, thus ensuring that Haley would retain the work.

Haley purchased Oceanway Transport, Inc. (Oceanway) on 30 March 1984. In June 1984 Oceanway commenced operations as a hauler of heavy equipment. It had no log-hauling permit until August 1984, and did not commence hauling logs until about 17 February 1985, when it purchased four log-hauling trucks from Haley. The names on these trucks were changed at Haley's premises to reflect that they were being operated by Oceanway. Thereafter the trucks were driven by the same drivers who had previously driven them for Haley. The drivers withdrew from the Union prior to their employment with Oceanway.

On 13 March 1985 the Union sent the following letter to Haley:

> It has come to the attention of this Local Union, I.W.A. 3-140, that you have moved several logging trucks out of the bargaining unit.
> This is in violation of our joint working agreement. Any truck drivers within the bargaining unit hauling for any company, or gypo, are to remain in Local 3-140's jurisdiction.

In April 1985 Jack Gossard, a labor relations consultant, spoke with Charles Letts, union business representative, concerning Haley's economic circumstances. Gossard advised Letts that contractual wage reductions were necessary. Letts indicated that discussions on this subject would be fruitless until the International Paper negotiations, which were then being conducted, had been finalized.

Larry Haley, vice president of Haley & Haley, Inc., sent a letter to the Union, dated 28 April 1985, as follows:

> We want to confirm and repeat recent requests to you from Jack Gossard and myself, for further discussions on how Haley & Haley can continue in business and compete for I-P's trucking business.
> If what we hear indirectly from I-P is true, then we are going to have to have substantial changes in order to compete for the I-P hauling. As I told you the last time I saw you, Haley & Haley cannot come close to competing for the hauling for other companies anywhere in this area.
> Unless something happens soon, we will be forced to sell off more of our trucks or even consider going out of business.
> We will appreciate hearing from you as soon as possible.

Thereafter, apparently being advised during a phone conversation between Gossard and Letts that the request for a meeting should be sent to the Union's regional council, Haley sent the following letter to the counsel on 6 May 1985:

> We are attaching a copy of a letter sent to IWA Local 3-140. We have been advised that our request for a meeting should be addressed to the Regional Council.

> We will expect to hear from you soon.

On 18 May 1985, Larry Haley advised Union Representative Letts that Haley had been given a deadline by International Paper and would have to advise that Company by 21 May 1985 whether it would provide hauling at the newly established rate, which was significantly lower than the then-prevailing contract rate. Haley told Letts that the contract wage and benefit package would need to be reduced, and proposed a $10.50-an-hour package. Letts said he would get back to him over the weekend after holding a union meeting among the drivers for the purpose of voting on Haley's proposal. The union meeting was held, apparently on 18 May 1985, and the drivers refused to accept the package offered by Haley.

A meeting between the parties was held on 21 May 1985. The Union was advised that Haley, in order to survive, was going to need a reduced wage and fringe benefit package of around $10.50 an hour due to the new rates that International Paper was willing to pay for hauling. Letts, according to Gossard, stated that he had been negotiating with International Paper and knew what it would take to make Haley competitive. Letts' position was that the Union remained either unable or unwilling to grant any wage concessions.

On 22 May 1985 Letts wrote the Company the following letter:

> It has come to the attention of Local 3-140 that Haley & Haley Trucking has transferred logging trucks to a company under the name of Ocean Way [sic] of Mapleton, Oregon. We strongly believe this is a move to circumvent our joint working agreement and deprive the I.W.A. crew of wages and benefits due under the agreement.

> Please advise as to your availability of time and place.

A meeting was held on 28 May. Larry Haley pressed the Union for a response to its wage concession proposal, and advised that Haley was in danger of going out of business. Gossard testified that he gave the Union a breakdown on the hourly costs of what it would take to operate profitably, and the Union was told there was no way Haley could continue in business under the current contract labor costs. Loren Haley, Respondent's president, said the Company was absolutely firm on its proposal. During the course of the meeting the Union's attorney asked for certain specific information, including the names of the stockholders of Haley and Oceanway; how many trucks Haley retained; how many trucks Oceanway operated; and Haley's projected costs. Haley's representatives answered these questions, and there is no contention that Haley refused to divulge whatever information the Union requested about either corporation. Letts said he was aware of much of the information, and recognized that Haley was probably in a loss position. The Union made no request for Haley's books and records to verify its economic position.

During the meeting, Letts stated that Haley's proposed wage package was not sufficient. However, he made no counteroffer or indicated that the Union would be receptive to another offer. The Union's attorney said the Union would not discuss the problem further until those trucks that had been sold to Oceanway were transferred back to Haley. At the end of the meeting a written request for information was handed the Company. The three-page request is extensive, listing some 20 separate items of information, some of which call for detailed reports on the operation of each log truck. The information was to be produced by 10 June 1985.

Larry Haley testified that there was not a total shutdown on 7 May 1985, the day Haley ceased its hauling operations. Rather, the Company parked the trucks while attempting to find hauling jobs at a rate that would enable it to pay the contractual wage rate to the drivers. Four trucks were kept until 8 August 1985 when Haley concluded that there would be no concessions from the Union.

Loren and Larry Haley met with Letts on 30 May 1985. The Union was unwilling to grant any wage concessions and made no counterproposals. Rather, Letts said he had no authority to grant any wage concessions. Letts said, according to Larry Haley, that the information requested at the earlier meeting did not need to be furnished until a subsequent meeting attended by another union representative, Hubble, could be held. Loren Haley testified that he advised Letts that it would probably take about 2 weeks to put the information together, and Letts, according to Loren Haley, said not to worry about it. Letts testified that he did not remember anyone mentioning the request for information at the 30 May meeting, but acknowledges that the Union was in no hurry for the information, and would have utilized it for bargaining purposes until such time as Union Representative Hubble was available to negotiate. The meeting with Hubble, however, was never held.

Another meeting occurred on 11 June. No progress was made, as the parties continued to maintain their prior positions.

C. Analysis and Conclusions

Oceanway is wholly owned by Haley and there is no dispute that the Haley family owns and controls both corporations. Clearly, if Haley has violated the Act as alleged, by unlawfully transferring unit work to Oceanway, both corporations would be jointly liable for participating in such unlawful activity.

It is clear that 97 percent of Haley's business has been with only two customers, each of which did about an equal amount of business with Haley. One of these customers, Champion Paper Company, totally discontinued its business operations. The other, International Paper Company, which was having severe financial difficulties and had been negotiating with the Union for concessions, had sharply curtailed its operations. This further reduced Haley's log-hauling work and resulted in a substantial number of idle vehicles and employees. Moreover, International Paper advised Haley that as of 21 May 1985, it would sharply reduce the hourly fees it would pay for log hauling and would contract out the work to the lowest bidders. Further, the record indicates that prior to 21 May there was not much hauling work contracted out by International Paper, and that Haley obtained whatever work was available and economically feasible during this period.

There is no dispute as to the economic hardship on the business operations of Haley due to the foregoing circumstances. That Haley needed midterm concessions from the Union is beyond dispute, and no evidence was presented that its wage and benefit proposal to the Union, although substantially less than the then-current contract rate, was unrealistic, advanced in bad faith, or was designed to ensure that it would be unacceptable to the Union. Indeed, it is significant that although union representatives were clearly and repeatedly advised of Haley's financial condition, no request was made to see the books or records of that corporation to verify Haley's representations in this regard.

The parties engaged in substantial negotiations during which Haley, which had been given a deadline by International Paper, desperately attempted to negotiate reduced contract wage rate, which would enable it to continue hauling logs for that customer. The Union, however, although it did not refuse to discuss the matter, simply had no authority to modify the contractual wage and fringe benefit terms.

Counsel for the General Counsel and the Union maintain that no impasse in negotiations could have been reached since certain unit work was transferred to Oceanway in February, prior to any negotiations and, moreover, because Haley failed to provide certain requested information. I do not agree. I find, as credibly testified to by Gossard, that Haley's representatives answered all questions asked regarding Haley's financial situation and its relationship with Oceanway. Nor does the record show that Haley's officers or representatives attempted to establish a disguised corporation to evade Haley's bargaining obligation. Indeed, the name of Oceanway Transport, Inc. was placed on many former Haley trucks at Haley's premises, and the same drivers were employed by Oceanway to drive them. Business Agent Letts' testimony that he was unaware of the relationship between the two entities is not persuasive. Moreover, I credit the Respondent's witnesses who testified that Letts told them the information need not be provided until a later event, namely, negotiations with Business Representative Hubble, which negotiations never took place. And, even if Letts had been given the information, the Union would admittedly not have been in a position to agree to contract modifications.

Oceanway, being operated as a nonunion entity, could simply obtain work at the prevailing "gypo" rate for log hauling, and Haley, under the current contractual wage and benefit constraints, could not. There is no showing that there would have been any additional work for best copy available

Haley drivers subsequent to the time Haley commenced selling its trucks to Oceanway, other than the work Haley actually performed. Therefore, the work performed by Oceanway was not work that Haley's employees would otherwise have performed. Under these circumstances, it has not been shown that unit work was unlawfully transferred outside the bargaining unit, as alleged.

On the basis of the foregoing, I find that Haley engaged in good-faith negotiations for contract concessions, and that an impasse was reached. Further, under the precedent established in Milwaukee Spring Division, 268 NLRB 601 (1984), I find that Haley did not violate the Act as alleged by causing Oceanway, its wholly owned entity, to engage in log hauling. Indeed, such work under the prevailing contract rates would not have been performed by Haley. Moreover, Haley did not violate the Act, as alleged, by failing to furnish requested information, as the information had either been furnished to the Union or, under the circumstances, would have served no useful purpose.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Haley & Haley, Inc. is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. Haley & Haley, Inc. has not engaged in conduct violative of the Act as alleged.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record in this case, I issue the following recommended[3]

ORDER

It is recommended that the complaint be dismissed in its entirety.

May Department Stores Company, Venture Stores Division and United Retail Workers Union Local No. 881, chartered by United Food and Commercial Workers International Union, AFL-CIO, CLC. Cases 13-CA-21660 and 13-CA-21696

June 30, 1988

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS BABSON AND CRACRAFT

On February 17, 1984, the National Labor Relations Board issued its Decision and Order[1] in these proceedings, finding that the November 1, 1981 affiliation between the United Retail Workers Union (URW) and the United Food and Commercial Workers International Union, AFL-CIO, CLC (UFCW) was improper because unit employees who were not members of URW were not given an opportunity to vote in the affiliation referendum. Accordingly, the Board found that the Respondent did not violate Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by refusing, among other things, to recognize the affiliated entity, i.e., the Charging Party (Local 881). The Board's Order dismissing the complaint was enforced sub nom. by the Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals.[2] Thereafter, on April 28, 1986, in light of its decision in NLRB v. Financial Institution Employees, 475 U.S. 192 (1986), the United States Supreme Court vacated the decision of the court of appeals and remanded the case to that court for further consideration. On reconsideration, the court of appeals on July 25, 1986, issued its decision,[3] holding that the Board cannot require the URW "to allow nonunion employees to vote on the merger before ordering [the Respondent] to bargain with the post-merger union."[4] Without expressing views whether the affiliation referendum was conducted with sufficient due process or whether there is sufficient continuity between the unions, or on any other remaining issues, the court of appeals remanded the case to the Board for further proceedings consistent with its opinion.

Following acceptance of the remand from the court of appeals, the Board notified the parties that they could file position statements with the Board. On November 10, 1986, the Respondent and counsel for the General Counsel each filed a timely statement of position, and the Respondent filed a Motion for Summary Judgment and a statement of material facts. UFCW filed a position statement of November 14. On November 20 and 28, respectively, counsel for the General Counsel filed his response in opposition to the motion and the Respondent filed its reply to the response.[5] Thereafter, following the Board's issuance of its Decision and Order in Western Commercial Transport, 288 NLRB 214 (1988), the UFCW requested permission to file a second position statement. The Board granted all parties in this proceeding an opportunity to file statements of position in light of the recent decision in that case, and all parties have exercised the opportunity to do so.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record[6] in light of the position statements and briefs, and finds that the 1981 affiliation of URW with the UFCW was proper and that the Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act, as alleged, by taking the following actions: refusing to bargain with Local 881; engaging in direct dealing with employees; unilaterally terminating the grievance procedures set forth in the applicable collective-bargaining agreements and refusing to process grievances; refusing to grant Local 881 representatives access to stores; refusing to provide information about newly hired employees as required by the collective-bargaining agreements; and unilaterally changing the dues-checkoff provisions set forth in the collective-bargaining agreements and refusing to transmit to Local 881 dues and initiation fees deducted from employees' paychecks.

The Affiliation Referendum

The facts regarding the conduct of the affiliation referendum are set forth briefly in the Board's decision at 268 NLRB 979. The Respondent has recognized the URW as the exclusive bargaining representative of employees in its 10 Chicago area stores and its store in Decatur, Illinois, since 1978.[7] The most recent collective-bargaining agreement between the Respondent and URW covering the Chicago stores was effective from July 21, 1980, [4] Id. at 423. The court noted that the relevant considerations in both "merger" and "affiliation" cases are the same.

[5] In view of the procedural history of this case and the decision reached here, the Respondent's motion is denied.

[6] Per stipulation by the Respondent, Local 881, and the General Counsel, the record in this case consists of the charges, the consolidated complaint, the answer, and the stipulation of facts, with attachments, entered into by the parties and approved by the Board on April 23, 1982. (See 268 NLRB 979.) In the stipulation, the parties waived a hearing before an administrative law judge, agreed that oral testimony was neither necessary nor desired, and reserved the right to object to the materiality, relevance, or competence of any of the stipulated facts.

[7] In 1978, the Respondent recognized URW following the purchase of certain Turnstyle Stores from Jewel Companies, Inc. In 1962 Jewel had voluntarily recognized URW as the representative of its Chicago area Turnstyle employees and later recognized URW as the representative of its Decatur location employees pursuant to Board certification in 1972.

through July 24, 1983. The most recent collective-bargaining agreement between the Respondent and URW covering the Decatur store was effective from January 1, 1981, through December 31, 1983. As discussed in more detail below, the Respondent failed to adhere to certain terms of the agreements following November 1, 1981.

In January 1981[8] and for approximately 6 months thereafter, URW National Executive Director Fred Burki and URW National Vice President/Treasurer Frank Koukl investigated the possibility of URW's affiliating with UFCW and met with UFCW officials. On June 11, Burki and Koukl presented their affiliation plan to, and received the unanimous approval of, the four URW local presidents. On June 22, UFCW International President William Wynn and URW's executive council, staff supervisors, and board of governors met and, with the exception of two absent persons who later gave their approval, unanimously endorsed and signed a "resolution of merger," adopting the proposed merger agreement between URW and UFCW. Thereafter, on June 23, Burki notified the Respondent that URW intended to seek affiliation and sent all URW members a letter informing them of the governing bodies' decision and recommendation on affiliation and explaining the reasons for it. On June 24 and 25, Burki held a press conference attended by officials of both unions to announce a mail ballot referendum on the affiliation question, and notified all stewards about a special affiliation conference scheduled for July 27. On July 1, Koukl sent letters about the special affiliation conference and special membership meetings to be held the same week to all employers with whom URW had collective-bargaining agreements and, under separate cover, Burki informed the employers about the proposed affiliation. On July 10, all URW members were mailed a "Notice of Meeting and Mail Ballot Referendum" and a copy of the merger agreement and appendices,[9] and 4 days later, reminders of the special meetings and the referendum were posted at all employers' facilities. Stewards and local union officers attended the special affiliation conference on July 27, and affiliation meetings were conducted, as announced, twice a day on July 28 through 31. The latter meetings were open to all URW members and the members were given an opportunity to question URW and UFCW officials about the affiliation.

On July 31, Walenza Direct Mail mailed affiliation referendum ballots with instructions and return envelopes enclosed to the 20,548 URW members deemed eligible to vote.[10] The preprinted return envelopes were addressed to LaSalle Bank, which URW had appointed to guard and tally the ballots. Although the return envelopes were imprinted with a store identification number, the ballots themselves bore no identification marks.

As of the close of business on August 20, the preestablished cutoff date for the election, LaSalle Bank had received 9235 ballots.[11] The following day, the bank opened and commingled and tabulated the ballots. The tally was 6823 for affiliation and 2344 against it, with 68 ballots declared invalid. Of the 1214 ballots mailed to members in the Respondent's employ, 389 were returned to the bank and tabulated. The URW and the General Counsel acknowledge that because of the commingling of the ballots, they have no way of determining (by employer, unit, or store) how the employees voted.

On August 21, URW telephoned the Respondent and other employers under contract with it and informed them of the result of the referendum. By letter dated August 31, the Respondent's vice president, Coleman Peterson, acknowledged receiving a telephone call concerning the results of the referendum, but requested that Burki advise him "officially of the current and future status" of URW, specifically, whether the "merger" was complete and, if not, what further steps were necessary, when any additional steps would be taken, the effective date(s) of the merger, and the tally of ballots among the Respondent's employees. Peterson's letter also stated that the Respondent needed to know that it was "dealing with the proper organization and its authorized representatives" in order to continue "routine" matters such as dues checkoff, handling of new checkoff authorizations, and grievances. Additionally, Peterson stated that he had instructed management to discontinue these functions as of September 5 but, pending official notification, would "reinstruct" the managers if the merger was not going to take place or would not be effective until a later date.

In a letter dated September 1, Burki responded that the effective date of the affiliation was November 1, requested that Peterson "reinstruct" the managers to "continue business as usual," and assured Peterson of answers to his questions prior to November 1. In letters dated September 24, Peterson acknowledged compliance with Burki's September 1 requests and Burki formally advised Peterson of the referendum results and the effects of the impending affiliation, including that "[o]n 1 November, the URW will become United Retail Workers Union Local No. 881, affiliated with the [UFCW]." Burki's letter further asserted that there would be no change in URW officers or structure for a period of 3 years, that as a UFCW local, URW would remain autonomous and would continue making all decisions regarding collective bargaining, grievance handling, and arbitration, and that there would be no change in the current collective-bargaining agreements with the Respondent.[12]

[8] All dates refer to 1981 unless otherwise indicated.

[9] Appendices included the UFCW International constitution.

[10] URW contracted out the printing of ballots and labels as well as the mailing. Of the 22,412 employees represented by URW, the following individuals were eligible to vote:

> a. all active URW members on the payroll of an employer under contract with URW as of the last payroll date prior to July 31, 1981; and b. Non-members employed by an employer under contract with URW as of the last payroll date prior to July 31, 1981 who: (1) had not completed but would complete their 30-day probationary period before July 31; and (2) from whom URW had received a membership application before July 31, 1981.

[11] A total of 119 envelopes containing ballots and instructions were returned to URW as undeliverable.

On October 16, the Respondent's chairman, Thomas Rafferty, sent the following letter to Burki:

> Venture has been advised of the results of the mail referendum conducted among your membership on the issue of affiliation with the [UFCW]. We understand that among your total membership of approximately 22,000 persons, there were 6,823 votes cast favoring the affiliation and 2,344 votes opposed to the affiliation. This certainly does not represent an overwhelming level of participation, nor a clear mandate by your membership favoring affiliation.
> It is also our understanding that you are unable to separately determine the wishes of Venture associates[13] regarding representation by the UFCW, an issue of vital importance to our associates. We have asked for that information on several occasions and it has not been provided, and we have been led to believe it is unavailable. The history of your union's representation of Venture associates is such that few of them have ever had the chance to express their desires about representation by the URW, and this referendum has now deprived them of an opportunity for self-determination concerning representation by yet another union.
> The failure of the URW to conduct a separate referendum among Venture associates is made more unreasonable by the fact that even if all Venture associates had voted, they would have been so outnumbered by your members employed by other larger employers that there is no way the voice of Venture associates could have effectively been heard.
> We also understand that voting in the referendum was limited to URW members, a condition that excluded non-members from the opportunity to vote.
> In view of these considerations, and others arising out of the substantial difference between an independent [URW] and your new identity as a local of the United Food and Commercial Workers Union, the company has requested that the National Labor Relations Board conduct a vote among the associates in our union stores to allow them to indicate their desires regarding future union representation.[14] We will, as of November 1, 1981, suspend transmission of dues and initiation fees to the Union. Naturally, if our associates vote to select Local 881 of the [UFCW] as their bargaining representative, Venture will recognize and deal with that Union, as always in good faith. If on the other hand, they vote to reject such union representation, any union dues and fees deducted from our associates after the effective date of the affiliation . . . will be returned to them. Venture intends to create an escrow account for such purpose. In view of this action, Venture will decline to recognize Local 881 unless and until this question concerning representation is resolved. [Fns. added.]

Also, on October 16 the Respondent's store managers gave a scripted speech to employees, explaining its position regarding the affiliation, its request for a Board-conducted election, and its planned refusal to recognize Local 881 as the employees' collective-bargaining representative. Further, the Respondent mailed numerous letters to employees regarding its position on the affiliation.

On November 1, in accordance with the merger agreement between URW and UFCW, UFCW granted a charter to the URW officers, and successsors "under the title of United Retail Workers Union, Local 881."

The Pre- and Post-Affiliation Structure of Local 881

Prior to the effective date of the affiliation, URW was composed of four locals, each with a president, vice president, secretary, and sergeant-at-arms elected from among and by the respective local membership. Fourteen of the sixteen local officers were elected to and constituted the board of governors of the URW. Except in their capacity as members of the board of governors, the local leadership had no authority to pledge the credit or disburse funds of the URW or any local, negotiate contracts with employers, file or process grievances pursuant to collective-bargaining agreements, resolve disputes arising among members or locals, or discipline members for violating URW's constitution and bylaws. Although they received no compensation for their services as local officers, they received approximately $150 a month for their services on the board of governors.

[12] In his letter, Burki also informed Peterson that contract ratification procedures would remain the same and that negotiation committees would be selected as in the past.

[13] The Respondent refers to its employees as "associates."

[14] The Respondent's request for an election, filed October 16, was dismissed by the Regional Director for Region 13 on December 10 pending resolution of the unfair labor practice charges in this case.

Administratively, the URW was further composed of the executive council and its professional staff. National Executive Director Burki and Vice President/Treasurer Koukl were the sole members of the council. The professional staff was made up of nine national officers and supervisors, including the comptroller and vice president of field operations, and nine field representatives. The board of governors and the executive council were responsible for the negotiation and administration of collective-bargaining agreements,[15] the execution and enforcement of contracts necessary for the Union's day-to-day operation, and the resolution of disciplinary matters. Pursuant to the URW constitution, collective-bargaining agreements were ratified by a majority vote of affected local members at a meeting called for this purpose.

Following the affiliation, URW's four locals were redesignated as administrative districts of Local 881. In accordance with the merger agreement, Local 881 is run by an executive council and general executive board. Burki, Koukl, and the nine officers and supervisors from URW's professional staff serve on the new executive council. The general executive board consists of the executive council members and all members of the former URW board of governors, i.e., the former URW local officers. Local 881 also retains the identical professional staff of URW. The executive council manages Local 881's daily affairs. The general executive board elects the executive council, conducts disciplinary trials, and hears appeals from Council/Board President Burki's findings in disciplinary proceedings. Burki and designated representatives continue to negotiate collective-bargaining agreements, and contract ratification is by a majority of affected membership; however, the UFCW International reserves the right to approve initial proposals and to approve contracts prior to their submission to members for ratification. Local 881 has the exclusive authority to interpret and enforce its collective-bargaining agreements, including processing, withdrawing, and settling grievances, and submitting them to arbitration.

The URW constitution permitted a strike on a two-thirds vote of the membership present at a special strike meeting. Pursuant to the merger agreement, Local 881 may strike on the two-thirds vote of affected membership at a special meeting and approval by Local 881's president or the UFCW International. URW dues were set by a simple majority of stewards and delegates attending the URW national convention; whereas, Local 881 members may establish dues at regular or special meetings, subject to minimums set forth in the UFCW constitution and approval by the UFCW president. Unlike the URW, UFCW charges a $4.70 per capita tax monthly. In accordance with the merger agreement, however, UFCW agreed not to institute the tax for a period of 3 years following affiliation.

The Positions of the Parties

The Respondent challenges the legality of the affiliation, asserting that due process was not observed in the conduct of the referendum and that there has been a substantial change in continuity of representative as a result of the affiliation. More specifically, the Respondent contends that a unit-by-unit vote should have been undertaken and that in the absence of proof that a majority of its employees voted in favor of affiliation, it has no obligation to recognize or bargain with Local 881. Further, the Respondent asserts that postaffiliation changes in the administrative structure of URW, as well as changes in, among other things, officers and their authority, dues, and fees and their use, contract ratification procedures, strike approval, and membership disciplinary rules have resulted in a substantial loss of autonomy and give rise to a question concerning representation. The General Counsel contends that due process was safeguarded, that unit-by-unit proof of approval of the affiliation is unnecessary under the circumstances, and that Local 881 is substantially the same as URW.

Analysis

A. Due Process

In conjunction with Section 9(a), Section 8(a)(5) of the Act provides that it shall be an unfair labor practice for an employer to refuse to bargain collectively with the exclusive representative of its employees. In matters of affiliation, the Board has long held that an employer's duty to bargain with the employees' representative continues so long as the employees have been given an adequate opportunity to vote and there is continuity in the pre- and post-affiliation representative.[16] In assessing the adequacy of the opportunity to vote on affiliation, the Board has traditionally examined whether due-process safeguards have been met, i.e., whether employees were given notice of the impending affiliation election and a sufficient opportunity to discuss the affiliation and to ask questions about it, and whether precautions were taken to preserve the secrecy of the ballot.

---

[15] Burki and Koukl lead all collective-bargaining negotiations.

In the instant case, the record establishes that URW undertook elaborate preparations for the conduct of the mail ballot referendum. On June 23, following the unanimous approval of the affiliation plan by URW local presidents, the executive council, staff supervisors, and the board of governors, URW notified all members of the proposed affiliation, and on June 24 issued press releases regarding the August mail ballot referendum. On June 25, URW notified all stewards that a special affiliation conference for stewards would be held on July 27. On July 10, URW mailed all members a notice of special membership meetings and information about the referendum. Included in this notice was a copy of the merger agreement and its appendices. URW also posted notices concerning the meetings and referendum. All meetings were conducted as scheduled and members were given an opportunity to discuss the affiliation with URW and UFCW representatives. Instructions, ballots, and preprinted return envelopes were mailed to all URW members on July 31 by an independent direct mail company. During the balloting period, URW operated an affiliation "hot-line" to answer members' questions. The referendum closed on August 20, and on August 21, LaSalle Bank, the URW-appointed trustee of all mailed-in ballots, tabulated the ballots and issued its tally.

The foregoing events make it clear that URW members, including the Respondent's employees, were given sufficient notice of the election, an opportunity to discuss and make an informed decision regarding affiliation, and an opportunity to vote. It is equally clear that the integrity and secrecy of the ballots were maintained. Accordingly, we find that due process was observed in the conduct of the referendum.

Finally, there is no merit to the Respondent's contention that it has no duty to bargain with the Union because, as a result of the commingling of ballots in the affiliation vote, the precise vote in the Respondent's two bargaining units cannot be known. As it is clear, for the reasons discussed below, that the affiliation did not result in a lack of continuity in the representative, and as due-process safeguards on the affiliation election were clearly met, it is unnecessary to determine precisely how each unit of employees of each employer voted.[17] Where there is continuity of representative, an employer has no more right to seize the occasion for questioning majority sentiment in the unit than it would have if the bargaining representative had simply changed its own constitution. See Financial Institution Employees, 475 U.S. at 202. Continuity of representative was maintained in this case notwithstanding the affiliation with the UFCW.

B. Continuity of Representative

As we recently noted in Western Commercial Transport, 288 NLRB 214 (1988), the Supreme Court's decision in NLRB v. Financial Institution Employees Local 1182, supra, indicates that, at least with respect to the continuity factor, the general test for determining whether the affiliation of a bargaining representative with another labor organization raises a question concerning representation is whether the affiliation produces a change that is "'sufficiently dramatic to alter the union's identity.'" Western Commercial Transport, 288 NLRB at 217–218, quoting Financial Institution Employees Local 1182, supra, 475 U.S. at 206 (emphasis added). In Western Commercial Transport, the original union local lost virtually all its autonomy by being totally submerged in a district lodge local of the International labor organization with which it was affiliating. No role was open to the original union's officers except for the possibility that one of them could serve as a chief steward for the bargaining unit or as a unit representative to help create a local negotiating committee; but all day-to-day contract administration was to be taken over by a district lodge staff member.

In the present case no such dramatic alteration of identity has been shown. Rather, the record establishes some organizational changes with respect to relations between the four URW locals and a slight diminution in autonomy in relation to the UFCW International. Although URW's four locals representing the Respondent's employees were merged to form one UFCW Local—Local 881—this new local has four administrative districts corresponding to the old locals and their governance has remained substantially the same.

[16] Financial Institution Employees, supra. In light of our finding below that the Board's traditional due-process requirements have been met in this case, we find it unnecessary to consider whether, in view of the Supreme Court's opinion in Financial Institution Employees, such requirements need be fulfilled in all instances where affiliations occur (id., 472 U.S. at 199 fn. 6).

[17] See House of the Good Samaritan, 248 NLRB 539 (1980) (no separate vote by employer's employees required where affiliation did not disturb continuity of representative); American Enka Co., 231 NLRB 1335, 1337 (1977) (same). The same principle is implicit in the holding of American National Insurance Co., 281 NLRB 713 (1986), in which the Board found the employer obligated to bargain with the union following a merger, notwithstanding that ballots in the nationwide balloting were commingled. 281 NLRB at 714.

Thus, despite the reconstitution, the local officers who were elected by the membership to URW's board of governors prior to affiliation, now serve on Local 881's general executive board. Likewise, the former URW executive council, composed of Burki and Koukl, and the former URW professional staff, now serve as Local 881's executive council and are also part of the general executive board. Clearly, only the names of the governing bodies and the organizational subgroupings have been altered; the leaders and the essential structures remain the same.

The authority of the pre- and post-affiliation leadership also remains constant, as evidenced by the fact that URW local officers had no authority other than that exercised in their capacity as members of the board of governors. Significantly, the authority of Local 881's leaders to negotiate collective-bargaining agreements and fashion bargaining proposals and discipline members, and the authority of members to ratify collective-bargaining agreements and call strikes, are virtually identical to their preaffiliation authority. Further, Local 881 has retained all URW property and assets, including the URW treasury. Additionally, although UFCW locals set initiation fees and dues by majority membership vote subject to minimums set forth in the UFCW constitution and although the International charges a monthly per capita tax, there is no evidence of an affiliation-related dues increase. The merger agreement explicitly states that no tax will be imposed on Local 881 members for a period of 3 years.[18] Also, we note that former URW members in good standing became members of UFCW and were eligible to run for UFCW office on affiliation. Finally, we note that Local 881 stood ready to assume the collective-bargaining agreements between URW and the Respondent at the time of the affiliation and attempted to do so.

In view of the retention of local officers and assets and the corresponding evidence showing that there has been no substantial impairment or reduction of local autonomy, we find that continuity of representative has been preserved. Further, this finding of Local 881's separate autonomy is not negated by the right of the International under its constitution to approve certain actions taken by the local, including approval of initial negotiated proposals drafted by the local, and collective-bargaining agreements negotiated by the local prior to submission to local union membership for ratification. These reserved rights of approval, allowing the International only to react to initiatives of the local, do not serve to supplant the local as the entity primarily responsible for the conduct of its affairs. Indeed, if such conditions were sufficient to warrant a finding that an affiliation had produced changes in the local that raised a question concerning representation, this would be tantamount to a conclusion that virtually any affiliation of a local with an International would raise such a question. We see no basis in either precedent or policy for such a rule.

Given that due-process safeguards in the affiliation referendum were observed and there exists a continuity of representative, we find that the affiliation of URW with UFCW was proper and raises no question concerning representation.

The Unfair Labor Practices

The Respondent admits in its answer to the complaint, and also acknowledges by way of the parties' joint stipulation, that it has refused to recognize and bargain with Local 881. Having found that the affiliation raises no question concerning representation, we find that the Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by refusing to recognize and bargain with Local 881 as the exclusive bargaining representative of its employees in the units described above. The Respondent further admits and has stipulated, and we find, that since November 1 it has: (1) refused to process grievances filed by Local 881 pursuant to the applicable collective-bargaining agreements; (2) refused to grant Local 881 representatives access to its stores for purposes of administering the collective-bargaining agreements in accordance with those agreements; (3) refused to transmit initiation fees and dues to Local 881, as required by the collective-bargaining agreements; (4) refused to adhere to the union-shop provisions of the collective-bargaining agreements; and (5) refused to submit the names and addresses of newly hired employees in accordance with the collective-bargaining agreements. We find that by engaging in the enumerated conduct, the Respondent has unilaterally modified its collective-bargaining agreements with Local 881 and has violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS BABSON AND CRACRAFT

On March 27, 1986, Administrative Law Judge Walter H. Maloney Jr. issued the attached decision. Respondent Toledo World Terminals, Inc. (TWT) and Respondent International Longshoremen's Association (ILA) filed exceptions and supporting briefs, and the General Counsel filed cross-exceptions, a supporting brief, and an answering brief. TWT and ILA subsequently filed answering briefs.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs[1] and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order.

TWT is the lessee-operator of Facility One, the principal general cargo dock facility in the Port of Toledo, Ohio. TWT began negotiating to lease Facility One in the spring of 1981 when the predecessor operator, Toledo Overseas Terminal (TOT), closed because of financial difficulties. TOT had operated the dock under a contract with International Longshoremen's Association, Local Union No. 1982 (Local 1982). In considering a lease of Facility One, TWT decided it would not deal with Local 1982. TWT believed that TOT and prior operators failed in part because the Local 1982 contract was too costly and restrictive. Furthermore, an owner of TWT, Paul Wills, also owned Consolidated Dock Company (Con Dock), which operated in another part of the Port of Toledo and which had problems with Local 1982. In 1980, Local 1982, with ILA assistance, had established near the Con Dock facility a picket boat with informational signs alleging that Con Dock (which operated with Teamsters-represented stevedores) was not paying area standard wages. William Davis, chief operating head of Con Dock and TWT, estimated that Con Dock lost about $500,000 in ship revenues as a result of the picketing.

Having decided not to deal with Local 1982, TWT informed ILA of its position prior to signing the Facility One lease. ILA, fearful that TWT might use Teamsters labor, agreed to deal directly with TWT. ILA informed Local 1982 President Charles Moody of the decision and told him Local 1982 would be brought into direct dealing with TWT in the near future.

TWT informed ILA that it would recognize any union that presented cards for a majority of its employees. TWT informed ILA it intended to hire a core group of employees to be placed on a "preferred" list. Workers on the preferred list would be permanent TWT employees and not subject to the daily shapeup at which the union dock steward refers people to the Employer for work. TWT advised a number of unions of its intention to hire for its preferred list. Only former TOT employees belonging to Local 1982 applied. Starting April 15 or 16, 1981, TWT hired 13 employees[3] and gave their names to ILA. Moody obtained 13 signatures on union cards by April 20, 1981, the first day stevedores performed work for TWT. TWT and ILA executed a memorandum of understanding on that date that excluded Local 1982 as a party to the contract for the time being and that adopted, with modifications, the terms of the ILA Cleveland area

[1] TWT has requested oral argument. The request is denied as the record, exceptions, and briefs adequately present the issues and positions of the parties.

ILA alleges in its exceptions that the judge was biased against the Respondents and their counsel. After carefully reviewing the record, we find no basis to support this claim.

[2] The Respondents have excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

Although the parties' exceptions allege many factual errors, those we do not address are not material to the conclusions we reach.

In accordance with our decision in New Horizons for the Retarded, 283 NLRB 1173 (1987), interest on and after January 1, 1987, shall be computed at the "short-term Federal rate" for the underpayment of taxes as set out in the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621.

The General Counsel did not allege a violation of Sec. 8(a)(2) nor request a "fresh start" remedy. Accordingly, we do not adopt this portion of the judge's remedy.

We do not adopt the judge's recommended visitatorial clause because we find it to be unnecessary. See Cherokee Marine Terminal, 287 NLRB 1080 (1988).

The judge found ILA violated Sec. 8(b)(1)(A) by its discriminatory use of the grievance machinery. We adopt the judge's finding that ILA violated Sec. 8(b)(1)(A) by its discriminatory use of the grievance machinery and adopt the cease-and-desist order provided by the judge. In so doing, we find that no additional affirmative remedy is warranted for this violation in light of the predominant nature of the grievances and of the remedies provided for other violations found in this case.

Rather than the reinstatement language the judge uses, we shall substitute a remedy and Order that is more appropriate in the hiring hall setting.

agreement. ILA appointed Moody as dock steward at TWT. His duties included making job referrals at the hiring hall shapeups.

Local 1982 was not brought into the bargaining relationship with TWT, and Local 1982 was not given receipt of and control over dues paid by Local 1982 members regarding their TWT employment. On September 10, 1981, ILA and TWT executed a contract covering the Port of Toledo. No mention of Local 1982 appeared in the contract. Thereafter, Local 1982's executive board decided to file unfair labor practice charges against TWT and a decertification petition. On September 23, 1981, a Local 1982 membership meeting attended by 80 members ratified the executive board's decision. On October 2, 1981, Moody filed unfair labor practice charges against TWT, a decertification petition, and a representation petition covering the TWT bargaining unit. Moody also filed internal union charges claiming ILA had placed Local 1982 in a de facto trusteeship. Around the beginning of November 1981, ILA placed Local 1982 in trusteeship and named Local 1982 member Cleo Syph as trustee and new dock steward.

Moody and Syph are leaders of rival factions within Local 1982. The conflict between them dates back to 1974 and has been ongoing and notorious. Stevedores, almost without exception, belong to one faction or the other, although some men have switched camps as the balance of power has shifted over the years. The record is replete with evidence of Syph's hostility to Moody and his followers. The judge lists 34 threatening statements by Syph to Moody or Moody supporters that constitute violations of Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act.

Two days after Syph became dock steward, Harold Chevalier, Syph's principal assistant, filed internal union charges against Moody and other officers of Local 1982. Although a hearing was held and evidence taken, no decision has been made by ILA regarding the charges. Also during November and December 1981, Syph obtained pledge cards from stevedores in support of Syph's plan to charter a new local at the Port of Toledo. On March 12, 1982, the ILA executive council authorized the issuance of a charter for a new local at Toledo, designated Local 2037. On March 23, 1982, the Moody faction, on behalf of Local 1982, filed for relief from a judge in Federal district court where litigation against ILA was pending. On April 2, 1982, the district court ordered ILA to terminate the trusteeship of Local 1982, to pay Local 1982 the checkoff dues that had been received since May 1981, and to rescind the charter granted to Local 2037.

Against this background of hostility, we consider the referral of employees for hire at TWT by Moody and Syph as ILA dock stewards. As long as TWT utilized the shapeup system, TWT provided a taped telephone message at night indicating the number of workers over and above the 16 preferred employees it anticipated would be needed the following day. At 7:30 each morning when TWT needed in excess of 16 workers,[4] stevedores, the dock steward, and a TWT foreman would gather at the hiring area on the dock. The dock steward would call a worker's name, who, if present and willing to work, would be assigned a job for the day.[5] Shapeup ended when all the jobs were filled. From 1981 through a revamping of the hiring system in 1984, the TWT foremen present during a shapeup never refused to hire any worker referred by the dock steward.

In addition to running shapeups, the dock steward controlled lines assignments, which involved the hiring of four workers each time a ship docks at Facility One to unload or leaves the dock after unloading. The four workers are guaranteed 4 hours' pay for a "tie-up" and 2 hours' pay for a "let-go." The work—securing the ship at the dock with cables from the ship or releasing the cables to let the ship depart—may take only a few minutes and generally is not difficult. Lines work is considered desirable, but it is sporadic unless the lines dispatcher gives an inordinate number of assignments to one worker.

From the beginning of the 1981 shipping season[6] until his removal as dock steward, Moody ran the shapeups and had David Ray Edwards make lines assignments. Moody referred men at shapeup by calling out names from the Local 1982 seniority list in order of seniority. He went straight down the list until all the jobs were filled. Each day Moody began at the top of the seniority list. Edwards' lines assignments were made on a random basis, but with an eye toward spreading out the assignments. Beginning November 2, 1981, Syph ran the shapeups and made lines assignments. For the remainder of the 1981 season, Syph essentially ran shapeups and made lines assignments as had Moody and Edwards.

Beginning in 1982, ILA and TWT orally established a new job-referral category of employees called "experienced" employees, individuals who had worked 350 or more hours in the 1981 season. Twenty-six men, over and above the 16 preferred employees, met this criterion. They were called first at shapeups. Syph was not required to refer men in any particular order within the experienced category, except that Edwards and Shirley Marsenburg, another Moody supporter, had to be referred first and second each day.[7] Other workers, called "casual" employees, were referred after all preferred and "experienced" employees had been offered work.

[4] Preferred employees generally were notified at the end of the day of the next day's assignment.

[5] There is a conflict in the testimony over whether referred workers were allowed to pick their own assignments in 1981 or the TWT foreman made the assignment. We find it unnecessary to resolve this conflict.

[6] Because of ice, a shipping season at the Port of Toledo generally runs from April 15 to December 15.

In 1982 Syph discontinued use of the Local 1982 seniority list in making referrals at shapeup. The judge credited testimony that Syph said he was going to hire only his friends and relatives. In fact, Moody supporters on the experienced list were referred only after Syph supporters were called; Syph referred as casuals new men with no experience and no allegiance to either faction before referring Moody supporters; and, in 1982, Moody supporters received only 13 lines assignments, while Syph supporters received 496.[8]

Syph's hiring practices continued in 1983. Because of the decline in business in 1982, a worker needed only 200 hours to be on the experienced list. Five Moody supporters were removed from the experienced list because they had not worked enough hours, and three who were disabled or retired were removed. Eight Syph supporters were added to the list. Edwards and Marsenburg remained on the experienced list, but they lost their preference in order of call because they no longer had 1000 hours of work in the prior year.[9] Syph gave only five lines assignments to Moody supporters, although business increased in 1983 over 1982.

In 1984 TWT changed the method of hiring.[10] During negotiations for a new contract in January 1984, TWT advised ILA that TWT would do all the hiring if the NLRB issued a complaint against TWT for a hiring violation based on pending charges. After the first consolidated complaint issued on March 30, 1984, TWT, using a consulting firm, devised a system of selecting employees with essentially permanent status. Davis listed the 63 stevedores (including the 16 on the preferred list) he claimed performed 92 percent of the work for TWT from 1981 through 1983, and, with advice from 4 supervisors, ranked them. From the list of 63, Davis selected the top 50. In 1984 a TWT foreman (rather than Syph) at shapeups exhausted the list of 50 before turning to casuals, and he assigned lines on a rotating basis from the list of 50.

Beginning in 1982 Moody supporters reacted to Syph's hiring practices by filing grievances under the ILA-TWT contract. The grievances, mostly on forms provided by Moody, allege the grievant was not referred for work or not assigned lines, despite the referral and assignment of less senior men, because of his continued support for Local 1982.[11] None of the grievances alleging the hiring of or assignment of lines to less senior men were granted by TWT or pursued by ILA after TWT's denial. The TWT/ILA position on these grievances appears to be that the contract only required the referral of qualified men, and Syph never referred unqualified men; and the contract provided no standard for lines assignments.

ILA and TWT Liability for Hiring Practices from 1982 Through May 22, 1984

The judge found that ILA, through numerous statements by Syph, violated Section 8(b)(1)(A). The judge found that ILA violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) and (2) by discriminating for intraunion reasons in referring men to TWT for hire. We agree. The judge also concluded that TWT violated Section 8(a)(3) by virtue of his finding that Moody, Syph, and Edwards were TWT supervisors. Although we agree with the conclusion,[12] we do not agree with the judge's rationale.

We find, contrary to the judge, that ILA operated a hiring hall at TWT's Facility One. The shapeup process conducted by the ILA dock steward at the hiring area resembles the hiring halls operated by unions across the country.[13] It is clear from the above recitation of facts that TWT utilized ILA's referral system to obtain its employees. An employer is liable for union discrimination if it has actual knowledge or has reason to know of the discrimination. Postal Service, 254 NLRB 74 (1981). See also Wolf Trap Foundation, 287 NLRB 1040 (1988).

[7] Edwards' and Marsenburg's special status was arranged because starting in the 1982 season they were removed from the preferred list, a great economic loss. Having worked daily during the 1981 season, Edwards and Marsenburg had in excess of the 1000 hours required by the written contract to be considered "experienced." They were replaced on the preferred list by two Syph supporters.

[8] These figures differ slightly from the judge's because the judge inadverently listed employee McVicker as a Moody supporter when compiling this statistic.

[9] In 1982 Edwards worked 301 hours and Marsenburg worked 243 hours.

[10] At the beginning of the 1984 shipping season, a worker needed 400 hours of work in 1983 to be on the experienced list. Three Moody supporters, including Marsenburg, were dropped from the experienced list because of their 1983 hours, and three Syph supporters were added. One Syph supporter was moved from the experienced list to the preferred list.

[11] There were 249 grievances filed in 1982, 1672 grievances filed in 1983, and 1486 grievances filed in 1984.

[12] The judge found that the Respondent's liability commences February 12, 1983, 6 months before August 12, 1983, when the initial charge against TWT was filed. The Respondent excepts, contending that there was no charge concerning TWT discrimination until the August charge (alleging supervisory threats) was amended in October 1983 to allege participation in operating a discriminatory hiring hall. The supervisory threats, however, were directed at employees for filing grievances alleging illegal operation of the hiring hall, and the original charge alleged these threats to be violations of Sec. 8(a)(3). Thus, although the original charge did not allege employment discrimination, we find sufficient legal and factual nexus between the supervisory threats about filing grievances and the complaint's discrimination allegation. We therefore agree with the judge that the Respondent's liability commences February 12, 1983.

[13] That ILA referring agents operated on TWT's property and did not use published objective criteria in making referrals is not evidence that the system was not a hiring hall.

In this case, ILA's conduct was widespread and notorious, and TWT's chief operating head and two foremen admitted knowledge of the factionalism underlying ILA's discrimination. Moreover, the thousands of grievances filed claiming employment discrimination because of the infighting belies any good-faith claim that TWT did not know of the factionalism and resulting discrimination.[14] Accordingly, we conclude TWT violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by accepting and condoning a discriminatory referral system.

Edwards and Marsenburg

As discussed above, Edwards and Marsenburg were removed from the preferred list and given a preferential order of call on the experienced list in 1982. Although TWT claims they were removed from the preferred list to make room for more versatile employees, the judge credited testimony that TWT Foreman Glenard Staler told Edwards that his removal was because of "politics" and the judge found both Moody supporters were removed for intraunion political reasons. Although the judge found that TWT was the moving party in the removal of Edwards and Marsenburg from the list, he concluded that ILA violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) and (2) by attempting to cause their demotions because of ILA's hostility to the Moody faction.[15]

We agree with the judge's finding that TWT was the moving party in deciding to remove Edwards and Marsenburg from the preferred list, and with his unstated finding that ILA made no request that the two be removed. We do not agree, however, that it is reasonable to infer from ILA's hostility to the Moody faction that ILA participated in their removal. To establish an "attempt to cause" violation, there must be some evidence of union conduct; it is not sufficient that an employer's conduct might please the union. See Iron Workers Local 433 (Riverside Steel), 169 NLRB 667 (1968). In the absence of such evidence, we reverse the judge's findings of violations of Section 8(b)(1)(A) and (2).

The 1984 Hiring System

The judge found that TWT violated Section 8(a)(3) in revising its hiring system in 1984. In reaching this conclusion, the judge gave considerable weight to the fact that TWT, in choosing among the stevedores for permanent employees, "had given long and constant support to the Syph faction." We agree with the judge's 8(a)(3) finding for the reasons that follow.

We find the 1984 hiring system discriminatory because it represents the continuation of known, past discrimination. In 1984 TWT considered only the 63 men who did 92 percent of the work for TWT in the prior 3 seasons. TWT, however, was aware of and party to gross discrimination in 1982 and 1983 against Moody supporters who did not qualify for consideration in 1984 solely because of the past discrimination. Accordingly, TWT cannot evade continuing liability by using the product of its discrimination to establish a new system. Similarly, ILA remains jointly liable for discrimination beyond May 22, 1984, because its long pattern of discriminatory referrals made it all but impossible for TWT to devise a system that would avoid discrimination.[16]

The Removal of Moody as Dock Steward

The judge found that ILA violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) and (2) of the Act by removing Moody as dock steward and thus causing TWT to effectuate a substantial change in his employment status[17] in retaliation for his filing unfair labor practice charges and election petitions with the Board. To remedy the violation, the judge recommended ordering ILA to pay Moody the difference between what he actually earned and what he would have earned as dock steward. ILA defends its action by relying on Teamsters Local 282 (General Contractors), 280 NLRB 733 (1986), remanded sub nom. Kudla v. NLRB, 821 F.2d 95 (2d Cir. 1987), in which the Board held that a union may consider loyalty in choosing individuals for policy-making, steward-type positions.

We agree with the judge's finding of a violation for the reasons that follow. ILA removed Moody as steward for filing an unfair labor practice charge, for filing a decertification petition, and for disloyalty. Because this case presents a dual-motive situation, a Wright Line[18] analysis is appropriate.[19] Auto Workers Local 2017 (Federal Mogul), 283 NLRB 799 (1987).

[14] As found below, we reverse the judge's finding that the dock stewards were TWT supervisors.

[15] The complaint contains no allegation of an 8(a)(3) violation for the demotions of Edwards and Marsenburg, and none can be found because TWT's actions occurred outside the 10(b) period.

Because we find no violation for the removal of Edwards and Marsenburg from the preferred list, we will order no special remedy for them. Inasmuch as they had a preference in order of call during the 1982 shipping season, the evidence does not support a finding of discrimination for the entire year. We will order that they receive the standard remedy, beginning from 1983, afforded the other discriminatees.

The judge found that TWT violated Sec. 8(a)(3) in 1983 by removing the two men's preference in order of call. As the make-whole remedy for the general class of discriminatees now covers Edwards and Marsenburg, we find it unnecessary to adopt this additional 8(a)(3) violation.

[16] Having found that ILA remains liable beyond the establishment of the new system, we find it unnecessary to pass on the extent of Syph's authority to refer or hire under the system.

[17] The dock steward works more hours under the ILA-TWT contract than any other stevedore.

A union violates Section 8(b)(1)(A) by removing a steward for filing an unfair labor practice charge against the Union. Teamsters Local 79 (Carl Subler Trucking), 269 NLRB 1132 (1984); Auto Workers Local 212 (Chrysler Corp.), 257 NLRB 637 (1981), enfd. 690 F.2d 82 (6th Cir. 1982). Thus, the General Counsel has made a prima facie showing that Moody's removal was unlawful.

The record shows, regarding the filing of the decertification petition and the loyalty issue, that Moody filed a petition to certify Local 1982 as the representative for the unit at the time he filed to decertify the International. Moody was not seeking to bring in a rival labor organization. District Court Judge Young found that ILA's claimed fear of Moody's disloyalty was "a trumped up justification to cloak their own wrong doing." This finding is amply supported by the record in the instant case. Accordingly, we find General Contractors is inapplicable and ILA has failed to show that it would have removed Moody as steward even in the absence of his protected conduct of filing an unfair labor practice charge.

AMENDED CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Delete from Conclusion of Law 4: "and by agreeing to modify a collective-bargaining agreement with TWT in order to change a preferential status previously afforded to certain employees who were supporters of a dissident union faction."

2. Substitute for Conclusion of Law 5: "By maintaining and giving effect to an agreement or arrangement with the ILA to discriminate in employment against, and by perpetuating past discrimination in hire and tenure of, employees and applicants for employment whose names are listed in Appendix A of the judge's decision because of their membership in and support for Local 1982, Respondent TWT has violated Section 8(a)(3) of the Act."

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that

A. Respondent Toledo World Terminals, Inc., Toledo, Ohio, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

Act, and that Respondent International Longshoremen's Association (ILA) violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) and (2) of the Act. More particularly, the amended consolidated complaint alleges that Respondent ILA, acting out of discriminatory motives and in an effort to eliminate a hostile faction within Local 1982, attempted to place Local 1982 in trusteeship and remove its elected officers; removed Charles C. Moody, the leader of the dissident faction, as its dock steward; modified its collective-bargaining agreement with TWT with a view toward eliminating a preferential status of dissident members; granted a new charter to another local in order to replace Local 1982 as the general cargo local in the Port of Toledo; operated a discriminatory hiring hall or hiring arrangement with TWT; failed to use objective criteria and maintain the records necessary to operate a nondiscriminatory hiring arrangement; failed to refer for employment members and others who had filed grievances and had taken other actions politically inimical to the ILA-backed leadership on the docks; repeatedly threatened members with loss of work and other reprisals because they filed unfair labor practice charges and grievances and failed to support the ILA effort to replace Local 1982 with another local; and refused to process the grievances of dissident members. The amended consolidated complaint also alleges that TWT, for its part, threatened an employee with loss of work if he continued to file grievances and discriminated against active Local 1982 members by refusing to hire them or by giving others preferential hiring status based on intraunion factional considerations. Both Respondents deny that they or their agents made any unlawful threats. Respondent ILA states that any actions taken by it were aimed solely at preserving work opportunities at the Port of Toledo for its members in the face of a purported effort by a rival union to claim jurisdiction over work being performed by TWT employees. TWT insists that its hiring decisions were made solely on the basis of the ability of job applicants who proferred themselves for employment. Other defenses will be discussed in the course of this decision. On these contentions, the issues were joined.[3]

FINDINGS OF FACT

A. The Unfair Labor Practices Alleged

1. Background

After the St. Lawrence Seaway opened in 1959, the Port of Toledo became a deep-sea port. Its principal general cargo dock facility (Facility One) is located on the east side of the Maumee River near the point where the river empties into Lake Erie.[4] It is owned by a public agency called the Toledo-Lucas County Port Authority (Port Authority). Over the years the Port Authority has leased these premises to private stevedoring companies and has also leased adjacent properties that constitute an international trade zone called the World Trade Center. The docking facilities consist of about 40 acres and include 7 piers, a large warehouse and office complex, and a large, open area simply referred to as the field. Since 1959, the general cargo facility has successively been leased to Toledo Morain, Ceres, Oglebay-Norton, Toledo Overseas Terminal (TOT) (sometimes referred to as the DeBartolo Company, of which TOT was a subsidiary), and the present lessee, TWO, which leased Facility One to the Respondent in this case, Toledo World Terminals, Inc. (TWT), in the spring of 1981.[5] The companies who took over these operations at the beginning of the 1981 season under lease from the Port Authority are separate corporations, but are closely intertwined, having in part common principals and interchangeable management. The most prominent of these principals is Paul Wills, an owner of Wills Trucking Company, who was also the owner of the Consolidated Dock Company (Con Dock), another stevedoring company that operated in the Port of Toledo at another location until the end of 1984. Wills is the sole owner of TWT. The chief operating head of Respondent TWT and Con Dock is and has been William H. Davis.

Many of the employees involved in this dispute have worked on the docks in Toledo since 1959 and have been employees of each successive stevedoring company that has received a contract from the Port Authority. Their names appear in order from 1 to 154 on a seniority list frequently referred to in the record as the Local 1982 seniority list. In fact that list, with the minor exceptions of those who have recently died or retired from gainful employment, was the agreed-on seniority list that TOT and Local 1982, the collective-bargaining representative for TOT's stevedore employees, utilized in assigning work until TOT left the Port of Toledo in the spring of 1981. This list should more accurately be designated as the TOT-Local 1982 list. Respondent TWT has sought to escape from any responsibility to abide by that list, and its effort in this regard has been a contributing factor to the embittered and enduring dispute that is spelled out in the record of this case. These longtime stevedores, to whom port seniority is a treasured status, all have at least 9 years' experience on the Toledo docks. Since the Port of Toledo has experienced a marked decline in shipping volume over the last 10 years, the question of seniority has become most acute. Part of the fallout from this decline in business is the lack of opportunity for new employees to work on the port and the gradual aging of the complement of stevedores available for hire. In the mind gaged in the stevedoring business. In the course and conduct of this business TWT provides stevedoring services to shipping companies that are engaged in interstate and foreign commerce. From these services each year it derives income in excess of $50,000. Accordingly, Respondent TWT is engaged in commerce within the meaning of Sec. 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act. Respondent ILA and Charging Party Local 1982 are, respectively, labor organizations within the meaning of Sec. 2(5) of the Act.

[3] Errors in the transcript have been noted and corrected.

[4] General cargo includes such items as zinc and steel coils, potash, urea, nickel, hemp, molasses, and household goods belonging to military personnel. Large amounts of grain are shipped from the Port of Toledo, but grain is handled by other companies whose employees are represented by another ILA local.

[5] Although leasing the docking facilities to TWT, TWO leased the World Trade Center across the road to another affiliated company, Toledo World Industries (TWI).

of TWT, strict observance of such seniority, the willingness of its predecessor to observe various uneconomical hiring and manning practices insisted on by the ILA and by Local 1982, and TOT's defined benefit retirement plan for stevedores were among the reasons TOT and other stevedoring companies failed to operate at a profit and ultimately went out of business. Many of these manning practices created situations in which large numbers of employees were paid high hourly wages when there was no work available for them to perform. TWT was determined not to make the same mistakes.

Beginning at a time long before TWT came to the Port of Toledo,[6] stevedores in the Port of Toledo had become divided into two factions. It must be remembered that many of the individuals involved in this factionalism have known each other and their families for a generation or more, and their acquaintanceships are not solely limited to contacts on the job during the shipping season. The acknowledged leader of what has become the incumbent faction is the current ILA dock steward for TWT, Cleo J. Syph. The leader of the challenging faction is and has been Charles C. Moody, who was the ILA dock steward at TWT until internal difficulties within the ILA brought about his removal from that position by the ILA on November 3, 1981.

The enmity between these individuals dates back to about 1974, at which time the ILA merged black and white locals (Locals 1317-A and 1972) at the Port of Toledo into Local 1982. Although Moody and Syph both came from Local 1317-A, the black local, a dispute arose between them following the merger over seniority within the new local. Syph proposed that the seniority lists of the two former locals be dovetailed on a one-to-one basis, resulting in an amalgamated list that would show one black stevedore, then one white stevedore, and so forth, irrespective of length of service on the port. The Moodys, including Charles Moody's older brother Robert Moody, insisted on "date of rank" at the Port as the sole determinant of seniority, meaning that seniority on the merged list would not be strictly apportioned among black and white stevedores, leaving racial composition to fall where it might in the order of listing. Ultimately port seniority won out, but the bruises that resulted from this dispute lived on. The factionalism that was thereby generated carried over into subsequent contests for Local 1982 offices. Such contests between the Moody and the Syph factions were quite frequent.

Using the "Local 1982" seniority list as a guide, Charles Moody recited his estimate of the political sentiments of each of the 154 stevedores named thereon. Although Syph testified at great length on a variety of matters, he never disputed any of Moody's evaluations, so I regard this classification as a reliable guide concerning which individuals support which faction. One caveat suggested by Glen Staler and Floyd "Fats" Tefft, both longtime stevedores in Toledo and now marine foremen for TWT, is that factional sentiment on the part of some individuals tends to fluctuate, depending on which leader is perceived at any given moment to be holding the most power. When, in 1982, an internal union dispute gave rise to the submission of various petitions to the ILA both by Syph and Moody followers, some objective evidence came into being that confirms Moody's political assessments, although it is also clear that some individuals simply wished to hedge their bets by signing petitions circulated on behalf of both factions. If animus could be quantified, hostility between the principal adherents of these factions should be rated as a 10 on a scale of 10, although feelings on the part of others caught up in this Hatfield-and-McCoy rivalry might not, in any given instance, be quite so intense. Suffice it to say that all stevedores have been called on to choose up sides, and choose they have.[7]

Over the years, and until the beginning of the 1982 season when TWT told Syph that he could ignore the Local 1982 list, seniority rankings were of crucial importance in obtaining daily employment. This was true because stevedoring companies, including TWT, observed the practice of daily shapeups to hire employees assigned to load and unload vessels that called at the Port of Toledo. This practice, so commonplace in the longshore industry, means that when employees are needed to load or unload ships, they gather together at scheduled times in a hiring area and are selected for 4- or 8-hour shifts. The same process is repeated the next day a ship is in port. If the list is called from the top each day, then high seniority is a guarantee of more-or-less steady employment during the shipping season. Those lower on the list are called only when there are several ships in port or when a higher-ranked man does not show up for work. On very busy days, men who were not on the list at all would be hired. These individuals are usually referred to as "casuals."

Stevedores are also hired for certain work apart from the shapeup procedure. When a ship arrives in port or is about to leave, stevedores are hired for a "tie-up" or a "let-go." According to the TWT-ILA contract, four individuals are hired each time there is a tie-up or a let-go. The work during each call normally lasts only a few minutes, although, on a tie-up, a crew can be kept waiting at dockside while the ship makes it up the river to the dock. During high winds or bad weather, linesmen can also experience other problems while mooring the vessel. However, they are entitled to 4 hours' pay for each tie-up and 2 hours' pay for each let-go, regardless of how long their efforts might take. Assignments to this work are sporadic and may occur at any time of day or night, because the coming and going of ships is sporadic and not entirely predictable. Normally this work, referred to in the testimony as "lines," is regarded as highly desirable work because an employee is paid for time that, in large part, is not spent in active labor. However, it is also work that comes about only occasionally, so lines constitute only a small part of a stevedore's annual employment, unless the lines dispatcher chooses to give him an inordinate number of assignments. Until May 23, 1984, when TWT made a substantial revision in its hiring practice, the selection of employees for lines was left entirely to the discretion of the lines dispatcher or the dock steward. They were under no restrictions, contractual or otherwise, in how they went about selecting linesmen,[8] so long as they produced enough qualified men to do the job.

[6] TWT was not incorporated in the State of Ohio until March 6, 1981, when Wills and his associates, including Frank Miller and William Davis, decided to make a bid for the stevedoring work at the Port of Toledo, which was then being abandoned by TOT (i.e., DeBartolo).

[7] One employee now on the preferred list of TWT employees, Gerald Berg, was listed by Moody with a question mark, and there is little objective evidence to dispute this listing. Accordingly, he has been regarded in this decision as a neutral in the factional dispute. He is the only person actively employed who has been able to attain or retain this standing.

One further item by way of background should be noted. Between December 15 and April 15, the Port of Toledo is virtually shut down except for an occasional ship engaged in intra-Great Lakes traffic, because the locks on the St. Lawrence Seaway are closed and the lakes are, by and large, iced over. During this period of time, only a small crew of TWT employees high on the preferred list work with any regularity. They are assigned to the warehouse, which is adjacent to the piers. At the onset of the shipping season in mid-April, there is a burst of stevedoring activity to handle ships laden with goods designed to replenish inventories of various items that have fallen in short supply over the winter. Business tapers off during the midsummer months and picks up again in the fall. In November and early December, there is a rush of work from ship owners anxious to discharge their cargoes and remove their vessels from the lakes before the Seaway closes in mid-December. The pattern of hours worked by TWT employees, both on unloading and on lines, necessarily follows this cycle, although those on the TWT preferred list enjoy a partial immunity from such fluctuations. Although Great Lakes shipping in the early 1980s has not been what it was in earlier decades, referred to by Davis as the "glory years," TWT's business has recently been on the upswing after a disappointing year in 1982. The total number of hours worked by TWT's stevedoring employees is as follows, using the total hours worked in 1981, TWT's initial year, as the base year for measuring percentages of decline or improvement:

Year	Total Hrs. Worked by TWT Stevedores	% Increase or Decrease
1981	43,994
1982	32,241	- 26.7
1983	49,546	+ 12.6
1984	59,687	+ 35.9

Total hours worked in 1985 were not available at the time of the hearing in this case.

2. Events leading up to the opening of the 1981 season

In 1980, the facility taken over by TWT in April 1981 was operated by TOT, which was then in its seventh or eighth year as the general cargo stevedoring company at Facility One.[9] TOT had a contract with Local 1982 and did its hiring by daily shapeups in accordance with the seniority list that it established in agreement with the Union. This list essentially recognized port seniority rather than company seniority. Local 1982's elected dispatcher, David Ray Edwards, did the hiring, both at shapeups and for lines. From time to time, disputes arose concerning individual placements on this list, and these disputes were adjusted by a joint union-management committee that applied certain rules to determine when those who left the docks and returned might claim their old ranking and when they were required to go to the bottom of the list.

In 1980, TWT principal Wills and TWT President Davis operated a general cargo company, Con Dock, at a location across the Maumee River from Facility One further upstream near the I-280 Bridge. Con Dock employed only seven stevedores who were represented by Teamsters Local 20. Late in 1980, Local 1982, with the active assistance of the ILA and its Great Lakes District (GLD),[10] established a picket boat near the Con Dock premises and picketed Con Dock with informational signs, claiming that Con Dock was not paying its employees in accordance with area standards. Late in the 1980 season, Con Dock filed 8(b)(4) and (7)(C) charges against the ILA and Local 1982. These charges were dismissed by the Board's Regional Office in Cleveland or were withdrawn.[11] However, the effect of the picket boat on the business of Con Dock was severe. Davis estimated that this effort by the ILA and Local 1982 cost Con Dock about half a million dollars in lost revenues from ships destined for the Con Dock facility that were diverted to competitors in order to avoid the picket line. Con Dock took two further steps as a result of this incident. It revised the pay scale for its Teamster-represented stevedores to eliminate future contentions that Con Dock was not in fact paying its employees area standards (which the ILA has always equated with ILA wages and benefits). It also filed a civil damage suit against the ILA and Local 1982 under Section 303 of the Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act for damages arising from an assertedly illegal picket line.

[8] The only limitation imposed on the lines dispatcher or the dock steward is that a linesman is normally reprimanded if he is selected for a given crew but does not show up for work. No stevedore has to accept lines and a few do not, but those who do accept an assignment were and are usually removed from further consideration if they miss an agreed-on date. The dispatcher or steward is considered a fifth man on the crew and is compensated accordingly for his services in calling out the crew, although he normally did not appear at dockside while the crew is working.

[9] During the 1970s, the Port Authority reserved a public berth at Facility One for any stevedoring company wishing to unload a ship on an incidental or single-shot basis. The rest of the piers were leased to TOT for its exclusive use.

[10] The Great Lakes District is one of three subdivisions of the ILA. It is composed of about 66 locals whose members are employed at various American and Canadian ports throughout the Great Lakes. From time to time, John Baker, of Cleveland, and his brother, Chauncey Baker, have held office in the GLD, but its principal leader is and has been its longtime secretary-treasurer, Patrick J. Sullivan. Sullivan maintains the GLD office in Buffalo, New York, but also has an office in Washington, D.C., where he serves as director of the International's national legislative office.

[11] Cases 8-CC-1042, 8-CC-1043, and 8-CC-1047; 8-CP-234 and 8-CP-235.

When TOT let it be known to the Port Authority and others that it was not going to lease Facility One for the 1981 season, Wills and Davis were interested in picking up the lease. They took several actions in the late winter and early spring in order to be in a position to submit a competitive bid and to operate the facility when vessels started to arrive in mid-April. As noted above, Wills and his associates were interested in the World Trade Center as well as the docking area. They were equally concerned that picketing would not resume at Con Dock, which they planned to operate in 1981, and did, in fact, operate until 1984.

On April 1, Davis, who was president of Con Dock and executive vice president of Wills Trucking Company, went to Washington with his attorney, Victor Strimbu, to meet with Sullivan and John Baker. They met at Sullivan's Washington legislative office, which is located in the AFL-CIO headquarters building. The principal thrust of this meeting was to discuss the pending civil suit against the ILA and Local 1982 growing out of the 1980 picketing of Con Dock and to inform Sullivan that Wills and his associates were negotiating with the Toledo Port Authority for a lease of the TOT-occupied premises for the 1981 shipping season. At this time, Sullivan told Davis that his information was that a DeBartolo Corporation subsidiary would continue to operate the dock under the management of Colonel Zeplien, who had been in charge of the TOT operation in previous years. Sullivan was concerned that, if TWT took over Facility One, Teamsters-represented Con Dock employees might be hired at Facility One ("brought across the River" was his expression) and replace the ILA-represented employees who had been employed by TOT. In Sullivan's mind, TWT and Con Dock were essentially one and the same corporation. Strimbu told Sullivan that the Wills group envisioned the new operation not so much as a general cargo facility but as a bulk cargo unloading dock. He said they needed to hire about 20 employees right away but felt that the employee complement would eventually reach 40 or 50. He said they would like to hire the seven or so Teamsters-represented stevedores who had been working for Con Dock. Sullivan told Strimbu emphatically that there was no way that the ILA would roll over and permit his clients to take the jobs of ILA members, and that the ILA was not going to permit nonunion or substandard companies to enter the stevedoring business in the Port of Toledo. Strimbu told Sullivan on this occasion that, if TWT was awarded the lease on Facility One, under some circumstances the Wills corporation would recognize the ILA. Strimbu was emphatic that the Wills organization did not want to recognize Local 1982 because they felt that the relationship between this local and other companies that had operated previously in Toledo was the reason those companies were forced to go out of business. He said he needed flexibility in manning to make the operation work and did not want to be in a position of guaranteeing jobs for 28 stevedores as TOT had been doing. He also insisted that there was no way that TWT would accept the Local 1982 seniority list. Faced with those prospects, TWT would not even go into business in Toledo. Strimbu informed Sullivan that TWT would be interviewing 15 or 16 TOT employees, all ILA members, with a view toward hiring them.

Sullivan received a telegram, dated April 4, from ILA General President Thomas W. Gleason in which Gleason informed Sullivan that TWO was going to receive the stevedoring contract at Toledo. Gleason directed Sullivan to meet with TWO representatives and to conclude an agreement with them that was in line with the wages and benefits being paid in Cleveland. On April 13, these same individuals met again in Sullivan's office in Washington. By this time, it appeared more likely that TWO was going to be awarded the lease for Facility One. In fact, the Port Authority held a hearing on that same day and announced the award. Sullivan was also satisfied, to use his words, that "TWT was not going to discriminate (in hiring) against ILA members," an expression that actually meant that TWT was not going to hire any Teamsters to man its docks. In addition to Sullivan, both Bakers were also present on this occasion. These individuals then spent several hours together, going over item by item the provisions of the TOT-Local 1982 contract that governed these operations in 1980 and also reviewing an agreement between ILA Local 1317 and the Great Lakes Association of Stevedores (GLAS) covering port operations in Cleveland. Both Bakers were from Cleveland and were familiar with the operations of that port and the provisions of the Local 1317 contract, which was then about to expire.[12]

Davis and Strimbu were anxious to conclude some kind of understanding with ILA officials immediately because they expected the first ship of the season to arrive at the Port of Toledo on April 22, the Wednesday of the following week. It was Baker who suggested that TWT simply apply the Cleveland contract to the Toledo operation. This was not entirely acceptable to TWT but the suggestion formed the basis of negotiations that took place there and then. The normal pattern followed by the ILA in negotiating a contract with a new employer is to obtain recognition and then turn the matter of representing the individual bargaining unit over to the ILA local that has been chartered at the port in question. Strimbu and Davis were adamant that they would not extend recognition to Local 1982 and would not deal with it. They were amenable, however, to dealing with the ILA directly and they proceeded to do so.[13]

Sullivan told Strimbu that the ILA would insist that TWT hire its new employees from the old facility, i.e., from among the ILA-represented stevedores who had been employed by TOT. He insisted on the right of the ILA to nominate the dock steward, insisted that TWT observe standards on wages and benefits set forth in the master agreement covering most Great Lakes ports (the GLAS agreement), and stated that the ILA would agree to working arrangements then in effect at the Port of [12] John D. Baker is currently the president of the Great Lakes District. He was formerly an official of Local 1317 in Cleveland. Baker's evasive testimony at the hearing in this case was marked by large and selective lapses of memory. I place little reliance on what he had to say.

[13] My decision at the hearing to reject G.C. Exh. 158(b) is reversed, and that document is admitted into evidence as being a part of Baker's notes of the April 13 meeting.

Cleveland. Sullivan suggested that negotiations leading to a full, formal agreement begin within 30 days. Based on this broad outline, the parties then began to discuss the specifics of the memorandum of understanding that would be in effect by the time the first ship was scheduled to arrive at Toledo, and which would also form the basis of a formal, longterm contract covering the operation. There is ample evidence to corroborate Sullivan's admission that the parties had orally agreed on the terms and conditions of a contract before the first employee had been hired.[14] Strimbu told Sullivan at some point in these discussions that TWT would need to see ILA authorization cards signed by its new employees.

During the course of the April 13 meeting, the parties agreed to several specific provisions in the Cleveland contract. Baker's notes indicate as much. His notes also indicate a willingness either to consider or to check out other Cleveland contract provisions and indicate that certain other provisions would be left open for further discussion. These notes also indicate that the parties went over the provisions of the TOT-Local 1982 contract, agreeing to certain of those provisions, and agreeing to omit other TOT contract provisions from their memorandum of understanding.[15]

One significant departure from normal hiring practice at ILA-represented ports was agreed on by TWT and the ILA. TWT desired to hire a cadre of stevedores to whom it could give a sufficient number of working hours each year to establish what it hoped would be a small, stable, competent work force that would also be permanent in character. It felt that total reliance on the shapeup each morning did not produce these results. Accordingly, it proposed, and the ILA agreed, that TWT would be allowed to employ a small group of preferred employees who would be given work each day before the shapeup began. TWT hoped that such men would be encouraged by more or less steady employment to remain a regular part of its staff. Additional men, needed when extra crews were required, would then be hired at shapeup in the traditional fashion. The ILA has not permitted this practice at many ports, but it was anxious to get its foot in the door at TWT, so it acceded to TWT's proposal, feeling confident that all the employees on the preferred list would turn out to be ILA members.

TWT learned on the same day that they had been formally awarded the stevedoring contract for Facility One by the Port Authority. This announcement took place in Toledo. TWO, the actual recipient of the contract, was represented at the hearing by Frank Miller, who is a principal in TWI, its lessee for the foreign trade zone. Miller said that TWO intended to recognize current union jurisdiction, meaning ILA Local 1982 jurisdiction on berths A-1 through 7 and Teamsters Local 20 for the foreign trade zone. (The Teamsters represent about 10 employees employed by TWI at the World Trade Center.) Moody reported this statement by phone to Sullivan.

His happiness, however, at the prospective recognition of Local 1982 was to be short lived. On April 15 or 16, TWT began to hire employees for its preferred list. Davis testified that it notified various unions, including Con Dock employees, of its intention. No interview notices were placed on the former TOT premises at Facility One. Only former TOT employees applied, however. Moody learned quite by chance about the hiring interviews, which took place at a local Holiday Inn. Moody, Edwards, and former TOT employee Matthew Bennett went to the Holiday Inn and met Davis, Wills, and Marine Superintendent James Hardwick, who were engaged in conducting interviews. Moody noticed that they were using the Local 1982 seniority list during the interviews. In fact, no one was interviewed whose name did not appear on that list. Moody, Edwards, and Bennett all applied for jobs.

I credit Moody's testimony that, during the course of his conversation with Davis, he introduced himself as the financial secretary of Local 1982, informed Davis that Local 1982 actually worked the Toledo dock, and told him that Local 1982 was ready to sit down and negotiate with TWT. He indicated that Local 1982's attorney would contract TWT. Davis replied that TWT was dealing strictly with the ILA, that there was an understanding between TWT and the ILA, that Sullivan knew what they were doing, and, if Moody wanted to find out more about what was going on, he should contact Sullivan.

This is just what Moody did. Sullivan told Moody by phone to come to the Great Lakes District Office in Buffalo on Friday, April 17. Moody did so. In a conversation that took place on that date in Sullivan's Buffalo office, Sullivan told Moody that TWT was going to take over Facility One and was going to start hiring people. He informed Moody that the ILA agreed to let TWT pick 13 preferred men from the seniority list for initial hire each day. Moody protested that the ILA should not "allow" TWT to set up a preferred list. Sullivan's reply was that the ILA did not allow TWT to do anything because TWT would have to allow the ILA to go through the gate before it could object to anything. He advised Moody that it would be best to work from the "inside out," noting that the rest of the employee complement would be taken from the Local 1982 seniority list "unintegrated," i.e., without including any Teamster-represented employees from Con Dock. He further informed Moody that the ILA had agreed to accept the Cleveland agreement for the TWT operation, but assured him that Local 1982 would be brought in as bargaining agent within 30 days. He said that Wills and associates were going to close Con Dock, join the Illinois Great Lakes Association of Stevedores, and drop all charges and civil suits arising out of the 1980 picketing incident at Con Dock.

Following this conversation, Moody, Sullivan, and some other GLD officials who were with them in Buffalo engaged in a conference call with Strimbu and Gerald Lackey, the ILA's Toledo attorney. They discussed many of the points that Moody had previously discussed with Sullivan. Sullivan received confirmation from Strimbu that TWT had in fact secured a lease from the Port Authority and that it was intending to operate primarily as a bulk cargo facility. Sullivan reiterated his demand that TWT hire ILA members and threatened to picket TWT if it did not. They discussed the use of the Local 1982 seniority list. All agreed that the Company would be allowed to hire 13 preferred employees apart from the shapeup. On the next point, Moody's version and Sullivan's version of the conversation with Strimbu disagree. Moody testified that the parties also agreed that all employees hired after the preferred men were given work would be hired from the Local 1982 seniority list unintegrated, meaning that no Teamsters would be brought over from Con Dock. Sullivan testified that Strimbu adamantly refused to recognize or utilize the Local 1982 seniority list. I credit Moody's version, not only on the basis of demeanor, but also by virtue of the fact that Moody's version of this conversation described what eventually took place at the TWT operation throughout the 1981 shipping season. As more fully described later, Moody, as dock steward, utilized the Local 1982 hiring list for shapeups throughout 1981, calling off the names of members in the order they appeared on the list to hire nonpreferred TWT employees. In fact, Syph did the same thing for the balance of the 1981 season after he replaced Moody on November 3.

[14] After a luncheon recess at the hearing, Sullivan backed away from this statement, insisting that the ILA knew better than to enter into a prehire agreement, but I credit his first statement, which was given without the opportunity for extensive reflection.

[15] Sullivan testified that, as early as February 1981, Strimbu had told him that TWT would hire ILA members but would not negotiate with Local 1982 or with Moody. This is exactly what TWT proceeded to do. Sullivan's testimony on this point is uncontradicted. Strimbu never testified, notwithstanding his intimate connection with many facets of the effort to bring TWT and the ILA together in 1981.

Strimbu told the ILA representatives in the course of this phone conversation that TWT would agree to the provisions of the Cleveland contract concerning working conditions, that TWT would interview employees from the ILA pool (it had already begun this process), would grant formal recognition to the ILA on the presentation of authorization cards signed by TWT employees, and would execute a memorandum of understanding when such cards were in hand. He also said that TWT would not recognize Local 1982, but agreed to recognize Moody as dock steward. Toward this end, Sullivan told Strimbu that he would have Moody get the authorization cards signed and leave them at Lackey's office in Toledo. They agreed that Davis would prepare a list of the 13 preferred men who had been selected for employment and that this list would be furnished to Moody to assist in the solicitation of signatures. Moody testified credibly that, at this time, no one on the union side knew the identities of the preferred men. In the course of the conference call, Sullivan informed Strimbu that he was appointing Moody as the dock steward.

After the call was completed, Moody obtained ILA pledge cards from Sullivan and returned to Toledo. On Saturday, April 18, he went to Lackey's office and picked up the list of preferred men. It contained 13 names, including Moody's, but it did not contain the names of Syph, Harold (Buck) Chevalier, who is Syph's principal assistant, and David Ray Edwards, who is a Moody partisan and who became lines dispatcher during the 1981 season. These three names were added to the list a few days later. During his visit to Lackey's office, Moody objected to Lackey that the names found on the preferred list were "company-oriented" individuals. Lackey's reply to Moody was to "cool it." He assured Moody that Local 1982 was going to be brought into the agreement in 30 days and it would be best simply to let things evolve into Local 1982 control.

On April 18, Moody obtained 12 signatures and was able to get one more on Monday, April 20. On that day he turned the cards in at Lackey's office. April 20 was the first day on which any stevedores actually worked for TWT. A total of seven employees were paid for work on that day. Company records in evidence indicate that a total of 92 employees were listed as having been hired on that date, including all the men on the preferred list. On that date, a memorandum of understanding was executed in Toledo by Davis for the Company and Lackey for the ILA. Two days later, the same document was re-executed in Washington by Wills for the Company and Sullivan for the ILA. About 6:30 a.m., Wednesday, April 22, the Angel Glory arrived at the TWT dock and was tied up at Facility One by a four-man crew dispatched by Ray Edwards. Some 49 men went to work that day for the Company. TWT was off and running.

A statistical summary of the facts surrounding the initial recognition of the ILA as the bargaining agent for TWT's stevedore employees is as follows:

> Total number of unit employees, preferred, nonpreferred, and casual, who worked for TWT during the 1981 season—158
> Total number of unit employees who worked more than 50 hours in 1981—85
> Total number of unit employees who worked more than 100 hours in 1981—74
> Total number of unit employees who worked more than 350 hours in 1981 and thereby qualified for preferential treatment in 1982 and for union fringe benefits—41
> Range in number of stevedores hired by TWT during the first 10 days of operation in April 1981—5 to 69
> Total number of ILA authorization cards furnished to TWT in support of the ILA claim for recognition—13

3. The 1981 season through November 3

a. The memorandum of understanding

On April 20, Davis and his attorney, Strimbu, met in Lackey's office in Toledo and reviewed the authorization cards that Moody had left with Lackey. There was some discussion about permitting Local 1982 to become a party to the agreement. Lackey told Davis that the ILA preferred to work through its locals because it was simply a more practical way to operate. He said that economic matters were normally worked out by the ILA and the trade association (GLAS), while the local takes care of local matters. TWT responded that conceivably this might be acceptable at some future time, but it was not acceptable then. They noted that Wills and associates were accustomed to operating under a single master agreement, namely a Teamsters agreement, and they were not used to local negotiations. They feared that local negotiations could go on for months while the Company was expecting a ship at the dock in 2 days. Lackey and Davis then signed a memorandum of understanding that had been prepared.

The memorandum of understanding recited the fact that TWT had entered into an agreement with TWO to operate the dock area and that another enterprise, TWI, had entered into an agreement with TWO, the lessee of the Port Authority, to operate the foreign trade zone. It further recited that TWT had secured experienced employees to perform longshore and warehousing work and had placed 15 of them on a preferred hiring list. The document noted that the ILA had presented cards signed by a majority of the men on the preferred list and that it was being recognized as the exclusive representative of TWT's employees. The memorandum explicitly forbade the ILA from assigning or delegating responsibility for the administration of the agreement to any local but stated that, at some future time, the parties would discuss the appropriateness of permitting Local 1982 to become a party.

The agreement incorporated by reference the Cleveland agreement covering contractors with Local 1317, but explicitly stated that TWT would not recognize any past practices or agreements that existed at the Port of Toledo. Certain specific revisions to the Cleveland agreement were then set forth, one of which was that there would be no guarantees of employment for crews and that the dock steward would obtain employees in excess of those named on the preferred list. TWT agreed to join GLAS and agreed to pay fringe benefits into an escrow account in the same amounts that were required under the Cleveland agreement. One hundred hours of work would be required as a miminum for eligibility for health and welfare coverage.

TWT also agreed to a checkoff on presentation of appropriate authorizations, stating that any dues and initiation fees checked off would be transmitted to the Great Lakes District of the ILA at Buffalo, New York. Both the terms of the agreement and the understanding of the parties were that the parties would meet again within 30 days to begin negotiations for a longterm agreement. After this memorandum had been executed in Toledo, it was taken to Washington, where Sullivan and Wills signed it on April 22.

In his testimony in this case, Davis asserted that the reason for TWT's refusal to recognize and deal with Local 1982 was that it held Local 1982 responsible for the picket boat incident in 1980, which resulted in a substantial financial loss to Con Dock. He also stated that he had grave reservations that he could negotiate a competitive contract with Local 1982, but felt he could do so with the ILA. He was upset with Local 1982 because of earlier litigation with Local 1982 over fringe benefit funds and because Local 1982 insisted on nine-man crews for unloading bulk ships, as compared with three-man crews that the Teamsters permitted. Davis also felt that employees supplied in years past by Local 1982 to other stevedoring companies had a tendency to "disappear" during the workday from their oversized crews and thus be paid for time never worked. Davis also made a similar statement in an affidavit, given on March 26, 1982, during the district court litigation between the ILA and Local 1982 members. In that affidavit Davis flatly stated that "Toledo World Terminal, Inc., would not have engaged in the stevedoring business in Toledo if a condition of doing so was recognition of and bargaining with Local 1982. Toledo World Terminal, Inc., will only deal with Local 1982 if required to do so by operation of law."

b. The operation of the docks

As ILA dock steward, Charles Moody operated the daily shapeups until November 3, 1981. Shapeups were normally held at 7:30 a.m. and occasionally at 12:30 and 6 p.m. They were held, however, only if there was loading or unloading work to be done and if there was work available in the warehouse. As a preferred man, Moody was assured of employment before any nonpreferred applicant was hired. As dock steward, Moody was contractually assured of employment so long as anyone was hired. If a total of nine or fewer men were hired, the dock steward was expected to do productive work. If more than that number were hired, he had no assigned duties but was paid simply to be on the premises. These same practices were followed after Moody was replaced by Cleo Syph.

Preferred men were normally notified as they left work the preceding evening, or possibly by phone, that they would be needed the following day. They reported to the dock and went directly to assigned crews. For the benefit of all other stevedores who wanted to work on a particular day, TWT placed a message on a telephone tape the previous evening giving notice whether there would be one or more shapeups, what time they would take place, and how many crews would be needed. Based on this information, a stevedore who was not on the preferred list could decide whether it was worth his while to go to the warehouse the following day and make himself available for employment at the shapeup.

At the appointed time, nonpreferred applicants for employment would gather about a podium erected in the hiring area where Moody and the marine superintendent began the shapeup process. It usually lasted 15–20 minutes. During the 1981 season, Glenard Staler normally attended shapeups in the capacity of marine superintendent or foreman, although Floyd "Fats" Tefft occasionally substituted for him. Both Staler and Tefft had served as foremen for TOT and had many years of supervisory experience on the docks in Toledo. In 1982, Tefft attended the majority of the shapeups, while Staler performed other duties.

It was the responsibility of the marine superintendent to determine in advance of the shapeup how many men would be needed for the day and what classifications of employees would be needed. He normally obtained this information by looking at a ship's manifest or its loading plan and occasionally by actual inspection of the cargo hatches. The more skilled classifications were crane operators and signalmen. TWT also hired forklift operators, front-end loaders, checkers, and ordinary laborers. Most experienced stevedores performed several jobs and normally preferred the highest paying slots available. The desirability of these jobs, however, could be affected by the length of time that work might be available for a particular crew. There were "short shots" and "long shots"—assignments lasting only 4 hours and assignments lasting 8 hours or more. A long shot as a laborer might, under some circumstances, be preferable to a short shot as a forklift operator, although the latter classification paid slightly more than ordinary labor. Over the years, stevedores became "type cast," i.e., they were normally regarded by the dock steward and the marine superintendent as checkers, forklift operators, crane operators, and the like. It goes without saying that some could perform these functions better than others, and some went about their tasks with greater interest and enthusiasm than others.

At the beginning of shapeups in 1981, the marine foreman furnished Moody with a handwritten list of the jobs available that day. Moody wrote or posted that list on a blackboard in plain view of the assembled stevedores. There is a conflict in the testimony about exactly what occurred at this point in the shapeup routine. I credit Moody's corroborated testimony[16] that he followed the same procedure that dock stewards or dispatchers had followed with the previous employer, TOT. Moody called off the names on the Local 1982 seniority list in order of their appearance on that list.[17] If an individual was present, he signified his availability for hire and stated the job he wanted. His name was then placed with the job requested and the job was stricken from the list of available openings. In order to be hired at shapeup, a stevedore had to be physically present. If he did not respond as his name was called, he was regarded as unavailable for hire and the dock steward proceeded to the next name on the list.

Lines assignments in 1981 until November 3 were made by Edwards, who was placed on the preferred list as the 16th man. After some misunderstanding, it was agreed between the ILA and TWT that Edwards, who had performed both this function and the shapeup hiring function for TOT, should be compensated as the fifth man at a "tie-up" and as the third man at a "let-go." He was paid, as were all linesmen, as a laborer, which is the lowest rate in the contract. Edwards was not required to be present as the ship was being docked or untied and he rarely was. It was his responsibility to provide lines crews as requested, regardless of the time of day or night the request might be made. He performed this function by obtaining a list of names and phone numbers of stevedores who sought lines assignments and by phoning them as requests for men were made by the Company. Edwards was free to hire whom he wanted for lines and he utilized the Local 1982 seniority list for this purpose. He did not hire individuals in the order that their names appeared on that list but attempted a rotation so that the work would be spread out. His testimony, which I credit, and the records that he submitted, which I find generally reliable (although they may have contained some incidental errors) indicate that, in 1981, Edwards made lines assignments to a total of 116 men. Most of the persons to whom lines were assigned received from 10 to 20 hours of employment. There is no evidence that Syph partisans were discriminated against in these assignments. Many received close to 20 hours of work and Syph himself, who was working only part time in 1981, received 10 hours of lines. It is arguable from these records that Edwards, a strong Moody partisan, gave a few hours above the average to Moody supporters in one or two instances.

Moody was anxious that Local 1982 be brought into the picture as the collective-bargaining representative in lieu of direct participation by the ILA itself. He repeatedly asked Sullivan when this would occur and Sullivan always gave him a standard reply that he was working on the matter and that it should happen soon. To press this point, Moody and his attorney, Ted Iorio, went to Washington on May 15 and met with Sullivan in the latter's office.

At this same time, Moody was given the task of soliciting and submitting checkoff authorization forms to TWT. He had been instructed by Sullivan to use Local 1982 checkoff forms and he did so, obtaining the signatures of all the stevedores who usually worked on the docks. These cards were given to TWT with a cover letter from Moody outlining what dues the ILA expected TWT to remit. He specified the Local 1982 bank accounts to which TWT should send pension and health and welfare payments. The normal ILA practice, embodied in the checkoff form, was that the local would receive 10 cents an hour for each hour worked by a member, that the International would receive 11 cents an hour, the Great Lakes District would get 3 cents an hour, and that the local would also receive, for each member, $6 per month for the 8 months that constituted the shipping season (April through November). Moody specified in his cover letter the account to which Local 1982 dues should be sent.

Early in May, Moody turned the authorization cards into the company office. Strimbu called Sullivan and told him that TWT would not recognize Local 1982 checkoff cards because it would not recognize Local 1982. Sullivan then asked him when TWT would recognize Local 1982. Strimbu simply said, "We're new. We're employing [16] Among the corroborating factors is the admission that, in 1981, there was in fact a blackboard available in the shapeup area that was used as part of the shapeup routine. It was later removed. Syph agreed with this facet of Moody's testimony. He recounted a trick played on him by members of the Moody faction when he took over the hiring function as dock steward on a busy day in November 1981. On the occasion in question, Syph called off the names of stevedores in order as they appeared on the Local 1982 seniority list. Moody partisans present whose names had been called all responded that they wanted laborers jobs, leaving open the more skilled positions that they normally claimed. This meant that Syph was put in the position of filling those jobs with men further down the seniority list who, in the judgment of the marine foremen, were less qualified than the Moody supporters who normally were hired for those positions. The foremen took Syph to task severely for failing to provide the Company with the best available employees and warned him not to let it happen again. It was not long thereafter that he stopped using the Local 1982 seniority list at shapeups. This incident could not have occurred unless job applicants at shapeups in 1981 were in the habit of selecting their own jobs from a list of available openings, contrary to the TWT contention that Moody merely called off names and left it to the marine foreman present to make assignments of applicants to available positions as the men responded.

[17] In 1981, the Local 1982 seniority list was posted on company premises in or near the hiring area.

Local 1982 members. We will consider it sometime in the future." On May 20, at a meeting attended by Moody, Baker, Davis, and James Hardwick, TWT's general manager, Moody, asked Davis why dues were not being deducted. Davis replied that no dues were being deducted under the checkoff authorizations because Local 1982's name appeared on those forms and TWT refused to recognize Local 1982 as the bargaining agent of its employees. What transpired then is set forth in findings made a year or so later by U.S. District Judge Don Young in litigation filed against the ILA by Moody and other Local 1982 members:

> Paragraph 7 of the Agreement . . . provides that upon receipt of proper authorization cards, TWT would deduct dues and transmit them to the Great Lakes District of (ILA).
> The evidence leaves no doubt that the plaintiffs and a large number of other members of Local 1982 did in fact sign authorization cards. Copies of one hundred and twenty-six (126) such cards were offered in evidence . . . . However, all of these cards provide that the dues are assigned to Local 1982. The uncontradicted evidence shows that when these cards were presented to TWT, it refused to accept them because of its hostility to Local 1982. The defendant's officers who were present at the meeting told TWT that it should strike out the name of Local 1982 and pay the moneys directly to the defendant (ILA).
> The evidence leaves no doubt that most, if not all, of the members who signed the cards would not have consented to any such change in the agreements which they had executed. To say the least, the action taken amounted to a conversion by the defendant, if not an embezzlement of the funds paid on the strength of these cards.[18]

As part of the agreement whereby Local 1982 was stricken from the checkoff authorization cards that Moody had presented to TWT, the parties agreed that the dues to be deducted should be placed in an escrow account in an Akron bank. On June 11, Moody and a company representative, Michael Hoff, signed a bank deposit card purporting to open a joint ILA or Local 1982-TWT account for receiving deposits of dues payments from TWT to the ILA. Moody found out in the fall of the year that in fact this account had never been opened and that all checked off dues had been directly remitted by TWT to the ILA's Great Lakes District. The disposition of those dues was one of the subjects of the aforementioned lawsuit, which Local 1982 members filed in the fall of 1981 against the ILA.[19]

Between June and August 1981 Davis and Strimbu met with ILA representatives, principally Lackey and John Baker, but excluding Moody, a total of five times for the purpose of working out the provisions of a formal contract between ILA and TWT.[20] On several of these occasions TWT was again requested by the ILA to recognize Local 1982, but each time TWT refused. I credit Moody that he did not learn that negotiations were in progress until he found out about it on August 11 from Strimbu at a grievance meeting. During this same period of time Moody and Baker had met with various TWT representatives to discuss grievances that were being filed by various TWT employees. Approximately 86 grievances had been referred for disposition at this level but, by the end of the summer, only a few had been resolved. Moody furnished Strimbu and Baker with copies of these grievances at the August 11 meeting.

When, in mid-August, Moody learned that negotiations were in progress for a new contract, he voiced strong objection, complaining that TWT was not even living up to its current agreement (the memorandum of understanding). Nevertheless, negotiations continued. On September 14, Hardwick received a letter from Moody informing him that certain pending grievances were going to be taken to arbitration. In fact, none were taken to arbitration and none of the 3700 grievances filed against TWT since its arrival at the Port of Toledo have ever gone to arbitration. Syph testified that, since he became dock steward in November 1981, the ILA has never disagreed with any company position on a grievance.[21]

On September 10, TWT and the ILA signed a contract covering the TWT operations in the Port of Toledo. Sullivan signed on behalf of the ILA and Wills signed for TWT. The contract was made retroactive to April 20 and was scheduled to expire on December 31, 1983. It was not referred to the membership for ratification, although ratification is the normal ILA practice and was the regular practice of Local 1982-before the advent of TWT. In explaining this departure from standard procedure, Sullivan testified that the September 10 contract was actually a local agreement concluded by the GLD, adding that there were no GLD procedures or bylaws covering referral of this particular kind of contract for ratification because it was an unusual type of agreement for the GLD to negotiate. Normally any agreement concluded by the GLD was districtwide in its application. One provision of the September 10 contract that was new and noteworthy was the provision giving hiring preference to so-called "experienced" men. The agreement continued the preferred listing of the 16 individuals referred to as "preferred" men but established a category of individuals who had worked an aggregate of 1000 hours or more during the preceding season. It required that these individuals be given preferment in hiring after the list of 16 preferred men was exhausted. After hiring all experienced men, as defined therein, the dock steward was then free to hire "from other available sources." This ranking applied only to hiring at shapeups. It did not govern selection of employees for lines. Because TWT did not have available to it the records of its predecessor, it necessarily had to leave to the judgment of the dock steward, for the balance of 1981, the determination of which candidates for employment had worked 1000 or more hours for TOT during the 1980 season. In fact, they ignored this provision entirely.

[18] Charles Moody v. Longshoremen ILA, Case 81-712, U.S. District Court for the Northern District of Ohio, Western Division, memorandum and order of Judge Young dated April 2, 1982.

[19] The actual removal of the phrase "Local 1982" from the checkoff cards was accomplished by Davis' secretary on his instructions.

[20] Sullivan testified that, in his view, Moody's proper function was to enforce the contract at the dock and see to it that TWT did not hire "new people," meaning Teamsters.

[21] Occasionally Moody was able to adjust a grievance by discussing it with the marine foreman. Such grievances never came to the attention of the union-company committee at step 3 of the grievance procedure.

The contract also imposed on the Union the responsibility to maintain, administer, and operate an employment office and obligated the Company to obtain its employees from this employment office unless the Union was unable to furnish it with qualified individuals. The contract set forth the procedure outlined above for "requisitioning applicants." It required the Union to furnish the Company with a list of its members and their addresses and phone numbers, if any.

The contract made no mention of Local 1982 nor did it give any recognition to the steward or dispatcher elected by the membership of Local 1982. It did, however, set forth a rate of pay for stewards and outlined some of the steward's powers and duties. Shortly after the execution of this agreement, an executive board meeting of Local 1982 was convened. It was attended by Moody, Robert Highsmith, Richard McGoffney, Henry Swayze, James Del Rio, and Kermit Jones Sr. The sense of this meeting was that Local 1982 had been deceived into thinking that it would be brought into ILA-TWT negotiations as a party. To use Moody's words, "trusting the ILA did not appear to be the way to go." The executive board authorized the filing of unfair labor practice charges and a decertification petition. On September 23, a membership meeting was held that was attended by about 80 members of Local 1982. Those in attendance at this meeting ratified the action of the executive board and signed cards to be used as a showing of interest to support the holding of a representation election.

On October 2, 1981, Moody, in his own name, filed a decertification petition (Case 8-RD-1046) and a certification petition (Case 8-RC-12617) covering the TWT bargaining unit. He also filed an unfair labor practice charge against TWT (Case 8-CA-15245), alleging that TWT had violated Section 8(a)(1), (2), and (5) of the Act. The charge proceeded on a successorship theory, stating that TWT was a successor to TOT and was thereby obligated to recognize Local 1982. Having failed to do so and having recognized the ILA, TWT was, in Moody's view, guilty of violating the Act. Not long thereafter, Local 1982 also filed internal union charges under provisions of the ILA's constitution and bylaws, as well as the constitution and bylaws of the GLD, charging misconduct by the Great Lakes District executive board and the ILA for placing Local 1982 in a de facto trusteeship, by failing to make it a part of the TWT contract, and by usurping its functions as the local in charge of handling day-to-day union business in Toledo. On October 5, 1981, Robert L. Moody Jr., Charles Moody's older brother, also filed internal charges against 11 TWT employees, most of whom were preferred men,[22] claiming that they performed work outside their assigned classifications, thereby depriving other ILA members of work opportunities.

The filing of charges against TWT and the filing of two representation petitions, one of which would decertify the ILA, hit ILA offices in New York and Washington like a bombshell.[23] Immediately on receipt of the petitions, Sullivan phoned Moody and asked him what he was doing. Moody's reported reply was that filing petitions and a charge was his way of "getting the Company moving" in the direction of recognizing Local 1982. Sullivan told him in the course of the phone call that he did not think it was proper for Moody to do this because of all the effort the ILA had put forth to obtain recognition and to work out an agreement to protect ILA members. He flatly told Moody, "We can't stand for this." Moody's reply was that the members of Local 1982 did not want to displace the ILA but merely wanted recognition for the Local.

Sullivan then phoned Thomas W. Gleason, president of the ILA. Sullivan recommended to Gleason that Moody be replaced as dock steward. Gleason agreed. Sullivan also recommended an investigation be initiated to determine whether the ILA should place Local 1982 in trusteeship. Gleason agreed to that recommendation. On October 12, a committee was appointed by Gleason to determine whether a trusteeship should be established. The committee was composed of GLD officers John Baker, Chauncey Baker, and Harrison Tyler. Shortly after this committee was created, John Baker went to Toledo to conduct an investigation. His investigation consisted of going to Lackey's office, making copies of the charge and petitions (which he forwarded to Gleason and Sullivan), speaking to Syph, and returning to Cleveland. He did not notify Local 1982 or any of its officers that an investigation was underway nor did he seek any explanation from Local 1982 concerning the activities that were being questioned. On October 21, the committee sent a telegram to Gleason recommending that Local 1982 be placed in trusteeship, that its officers be removed, and that Moody be removed as dock steward.

Having learned of this effort, Moody took it on himself to call ILA officials to press his case. He got a runaround. On October 22, he called Sullivan. Sullivan told him to talk to John Baker. On October 23, he called Baker. Baker told him to call Lackey. On October 26, he again called Sullivan. They had an angry conversation in which each called the other various names. Sullivan accused Moody of dereliction of duty as a steward in not processing grievances. Moody reminded Sullivan that he had presented 86 grievances to John Baker and Strimbu at the meeting of August 11 and that nothing had been done about them. He also said he had 74 more grievances to take up at the ILA-company level. Sullivan hung up.

[22] Those individuals named as Respondents by R. Moody to internal union charges were all Syph faction members—Bollman, Burkhard, Chevalier, Kutcher, Erichson, Kristoff, Loveless, Ludlow, J. Rizo, L. Victorian, and Cleo Syph.

[23] The first set of representation petitions were filed in C. Moody's own name. C. Moody was apparently afraid that, if the Local were placed under trusteeship, the trustee would withdraw any petition or charge filed in the name of the Local. On October 31, 1981, he filed additional petitions making it clear that he was seeking certification for Local 1982, not for himself personally, as the bargaining agent for TWT employees. These petitions are still pending and are blocked by the pendency of the charges in the present case (Cases 8-RD-1187 and 8-RC-12949).

During October, John Bowers, executive vice president of the ILA, phoned Cleo Syph from New York concerning the pending petitions. At that time Syph was on the executive council of the Great Lakes District, although he held no office in Local 1982. Bowers asked Syph what he knew about the petitions. Syph said he was unaware of them and expressed surprise and disbelief that Moody would have filed them.

On November 2, 1981, Gleason sent Syph a lengthy telegram, in which he informed Syph that the ILA executive council had approved the placing of Local 1982 in trusteeship. Copies of the telegram were sent to Moody and other officers of Local 1982. The stated reason for the trusteeship was "activities of the officers and certain members of the Local who are presently attempting to remove the ILA as the collective-bargaining representative with Toledo World Terminals, Inc." The telegram also stated that Syph was being appointed as the trustee for Local 1982. Gleason directed him to take charge of the books and assets of the Local and to arrange to conduct its internal affairs. Syph was also told that he would continue to act under Gleason's supervision and direction, and that he should make a written report to Gleason concerning the status of the Local's books and records and its affairs. The telegram served to suspend the Local's officers and to direct them to cooperate with Syph in the performance of his duties as trustee. In an affidavit given a few days later in the course of litigation in the U.S. district court, Sullivan stated Moody's removal came about, in part, because he had filed representation petitions and an unfair labor practice charge.

On the same day, Sullivan sent telegrams to Syph and Moody informing them that Moody was being removed immediately as ILA dock steward and that Syph was replacing him. TWT was also notified by Sullivan of this move. At that point a fratricidal war erupted on the Toledo waterfront. It is still in progress.

4. November 3, 1981, through the winter of 1981–1982

I credit the corroborated testimony of Moody and Edwards that, on the morning of November 3, 1981, Syph[24] arrived at the dock waving the telegrams he had received appointing him as trustee for Local 1982 and appointing him dock steward. He screamed at Edwards, "You—are done. You and the Moodys are done." He continued to rage and screamed at Edwards several times, "You're fired. You don't know how much power I got." Syph also screamed at Robert Moody, who was standing nearby, "I'm a professional —. I know how to — a —. You're through. You're fired, you s.o.b."

Later that morning Edwards reported these statements to Staler, the foreman, and asked Staler whether Syph had the power to fire him. Staler said that he did not. However, from that point forward Edwards ceased to act as lines dispatcher and worked as a laborer or forklift operator in the loading and unloading operation. Syph took over the job of hiring linesmen.

On the same day, Syph and both Bakers went to the Local 1982 business office, which is located in an old building on Summit Street a few miles from the dock. They entered the office, changed the locks on the doors, and phoned Moody at the dock. They told Moody that the Local had been placed in trusteeship, that they were taking over the office, and demanded all books and records. Moody objected to this procedure but to no avail. A week later, Moody gave Syph copies of the Local 1982 books and records, but retained the originals in his possession. TWT recognized this change in stewardship on the dock and immediately allowed Syph to replace Moody at the morning shapeup and to enjoy the privileges on its payroll reserved to the ILA dock steward. For the balance of the 1981 season Syph continued to call the roll of the Local 1982 seniority list at shapeups and to assign work in the same order that Moody had used. Moody was reduced to the status of an ordinary stevedore but retained, and still retains, his place on TWT's preferred list.[25]

On November 4, 1981, Chevalier, who later became assistant dock steward, filed with the ILA internal union charges against Moody and other officers of Local 1982. The text of his charges was drawn up by Lackey. Chevalier charged that Local 1982 officers were guilty of conduct detrimental to the welfare of the ILA by filing a decertification petition to remove the ILA as the bargaining representative of TWT employees, by calling and holding secret meetings and giving notice of those meetings only to those Moody wished to participate, by expending Local 1982 funds without proper authorization, and by failing to deliver books and papers to the trustee appointed to take charge of the Local. On November 9, Gleason appointed both Bakers and Tyler to a committee that was instructed to investigate and report to the ILA on Chevalier's charges. They were directed to hold a hearing, permit "Brother Moody and other suspended officers" to be heard, and file a written report with recommendations. Moody was notified that the hearing was scheduled to take place at a Holiday Inn in Toledo on November 18. It took place on that date. Over objection of one of the charged parties, Chevalier's original charges were amended to include, among the allegations of conduct detrimental to the ILA, that Moody had filed an unfair labor practice charge against TWT on October 2.[26] No decision has ever been made by the [24] Syph was a thoroughly unreliable witness. Not only was his demeanor bad, his testimony was replete with contradictions and failures to give explanations to basic questions posed to him. I would not credit any testimony given by Syph that was contradicted by any other witness.

[25] Because of contractual privileges accorded to the dock steward, the demotion of Moody to ordinary stevedore status carried with it a very substantial change in Moody's earnings. A comparison of those earnings with Syph's earnings for 2 years, for which documentation is found in the record, is: Moody—gross earnings for 1983, $18,351 and for 1984 $27,370; Syph—gross earnings for 1983, $52,259 and for 1984, $60,384.

[26] Baker testified at the hearing in this case that no evidence was adduced at the November 18 hearing that Moody had conducted any union meetings secretly or undemocratically or that Moody had spent union funds without proper authorization.

ILA concerning these charges, perhaps because of the suit in U.S. district court, which was filed by Moody and others against the ILA, and the order of the court, which was issued on November 19, the day following the hearing by the ILA committee.

As suggested previously, Moody's response to the ILA's imposition of trusteeship and the pressing of internal union charges against officers of Local 1982 was a suit in the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of Ohio (Western Division), filed in early November, to restrain the ILA from interfering with the operations of Local 1982. On November 19, Judge Young entered a preliminary injunction, accompanied by an opinion from the bench, restraining the ILA from imposing a trusteeship on Local 1982, from removing the officers of Local 1982, "and otherwise interfering with the operations of Local 1982." He made it clear that he was leaving a final resolution of the underlying dispute between Local 1982 and the ILA to the NLRB and was taking action solely to preserve the status quo because he felt, if he did not do so, that Local 1982 would cease to exist by the time the Board could resolve the issues between the parties and that any resolution it might make would be rendered moot by the march of events.

Immediately thereafter, Moody wrote letters to Syph and to ILA officials requesting that Syph refrain from making any further statements or taking any further action on behalf of Local 1982, that Local 1982 books, records, keys, and property be returned to Moody, and that Local 1982 be informed immediately of the present status of all pending grievances. Moody also wrote to Sullivan asking what had happened to money that had been deducted from employee checks pursuant to Local 1982 checkoff authorizations and that had supposedly been placed in an escrow account. He demanded specifics regarding name of the escrow agent, the number of the account, and the total amount of funds. In another letter, Moody asked Sullivan to remove Syph as dock steward and to substitute Edwards, the elected dispatcher of Local 1982, in his place.

The replies to Moody's various letters, as well as his earlier correspondence, came from different ILA officials and representatives. Lackey wrote Moody that henceforth his interest in the processing of grievances was wholly unofficial and merely that of any stevedore on the docks, since Local 1982 had no contractual relationship with TWT and had no authority to file or process grievances on behalf of any TWT employee. Lackey offered Moody an opportunity to sit down and discuss outstanding differences with Sullivan at Sullivan's office in Washington. Early in December, Gleason wrote to Moody and other Local 1982 officials stating that "it has always been the International's position that any grievances within the ILA should be handled in the first instance within our own organization, rather than be submitted to the National Labor Relations Board or other government agencies." Gleason then appointed both Bakers and Tyler to serve on a committee to investigate certain charges filed in October by Moody and about 100 members of Local 1982 against the ILA executive council, the Great Lakes District executive board, and various Syph supporters who were members of Local 1982. In a later communication, a hearing on those charges was set for December 18, although it was not held on that date because Moody requested a postponement. In fact, such a hearing has never been held.

During November and December 1981, Syph and his supporters were also engaged in a third alternative strategy aimed at securing their position as the representatives of Toledo stevedores. In addition to having Local 1982 placed in trusteeship and filing internal charges aimed at ousting Moody and other officers from positions of power in Local 1982, Syph filed with the ILA an application to charter another general cargo local at the Port of Toledo. This application was forwarded to ILA headquarters on December 23. On December 29, 1981, he sent to the ILA a list containing names of persons who had signed union authorization cards, styled "pledge cards," which designated the ILA as the bargaining representative of the signer without any reference to Local 1982. The collection of these pledge cards was an ongoing effort, which extended far beyond the day the initial set of cards was mailed to ILA headquarters in New York. In fact, Syph continued to solicit signatures on pledge cards up to 1984.

I credit Claude R. Tucker Sr. to the effect that, in December 1981, Syph phoned Tucker at his home, told Tucker that he had a card for him to sign, and said that he wanted to get as many signed as possible before going to New York to see Gleason. Syph added that if Tucker did not sign, he would be "left out." Tucker responded that he did not want to sign because the stevedores already had a local. Syph then told him that he was not going to have a local, that Syph was going to get another local, and that, if Tucker did not sign, he was not going to go to work.[27]

Sometime in 1982, Syph presented Nathaniel Levesque with a pledge card and said, "Sign this and you can work." Levesque refused. Syph emphasized that Levesque would have to sign a card stating, "I'm going to see that nobody is working but my friends and family." Syph approached Wesley W. Boyd on three occasions to solicit Boyd's signature on a pledge card. Each time Boyd refused. On the first such occasion Boyd told Syph that he was not signing anything to get a new local because he already belonged to Local 1982. He did not change his position when further requests were made. Shortly after the trusteeship was imposed, Syph asked Thomas W. Gaines to sign a pledge card. Gaines refused. Syph then told Gaines, "If you don't play ball with me, I'll get you off this dock if it's the last thing I do. All you will do is spend money buying gas coming back and forth from the dock." Toward the beginning of the 1982 shipping season, Syph met Gaylon Howard at L. C.'s, an establishment referred to either as a "speakeasy" or an "after-hours club."[28] Syph told Howard that he was organizing [27] Witness Claude R. Tucker denies ever having signed a pledge card for a new local. Syph said he did. There is a pledge card in evidence purportedly signed by Claude W. Tucker. The witness was never confronted with this card on cross-examination. I conclude that the card was signed by some other person and credit witness Tucker's assertion that he never signed a pledge card for Syph.

a new local and that Howard would have to sign a pledge card, adding that if Howard did not sign now, "it would cost $600 after (the local) was formed." Howard refused.

On one occasion in 1982, Syph offered Paul Conley a pledge card and asked him to sign it. Conley refused, whereupon Syph told Conley that it was Conley's fault that he was not working every day. On two different occasions Syph asked Floyd Early to sign a pledge card. Early refused. A few months later, Syph asked him again. When Early refused a second time, Syph said to him, "Well, I can't hire you no more." In November 1981, Syph asked Raymond Merrill to sign a pledge card. Merrill refused. Syph then told Merrill that, if he did not sign a pledge card, he would never get another day's work. Late in 1981, Syph approached Richard "Lefty" Hollinger about signing a card. Syph told Hollinger that, "When the new local gets in, whoever doesn't sign a card wouldn't be working." Hollinger in fact signed a pledge card that was solicited by Julio Ramirez, a fellow employee. Sometime in 1982, Syph phoned Harkles Bacon at his home and asked Bacon to sign a pledge card. He told Bacon on this occasion that it would be necessary to sign a card to be a member of the new local and that, if Bacon did not sign, he would be "left out." Bacon replied that he could not become a member of a new local and still remain a member of an existing local.[29]

On receipt of Syph's application for a charter for a new local, Harry R. Hasselgren, secretary-treasurer of the ILA, wrote Sullivan a letter, dated January 12, 1982, in which he requested that Sullivan conduct an investigation concerning the merits of granting the application. Sullivan notified interested persons that he would hear their views concerning the chartering of a new local on January 29 at the Holiday Inn in downtown Toledo. On or about January 26, Moody submitted to Sullivan by letter a petition signed by about 110 members of Local 1982 protesting the granting of the application. Moody also met Sullivan personally on January 29 with other members of the Local 1982 executive board. He gave Sullivan a second copy of the petition opposing the creation of a new local and reaffirmed the loyalty of Local 1982 members to the ILA. Moody reminded Sullivan of a promise given to Moody in Buffalo the previous April that Local 1982 would be made the cobargaining agent of TWT employees within 30 days, and stated that Local 1982 members had been fighting for many years to maintain union standards at the Port of Toledo. Moody demanded bargaining rights for Local 1982 and complained that Syph had been coercing its members into signing pledge cards. He also complained that he had received no support either from Sullivan or Baker in enforcing the contract. Sullivan's reply was a noncommittal statement that he had come to Toledo just to solicit everybody's views.

Jeffrey Julius, Local 1982's lawyer, dispatched a letter the following day to Charles R. Goldberg, the attorney who represented the ILA in the suit before Judge Young, protesting the proposal to charter a new local and threatening to bring the ILA before Judge Young for contempt if such a charter were granted. Julius' letter also made reference to a meeting scheduled to take place on February 10 to discuss differences between the ILA and Local 1982, and expressed the opinion that an effort to charter a new local would completely undermine any possibility of harmonious resolution of the dispute.

During December and January, an exchange of correspondence between Moody, Gleason, and others had taken place with a view toward working out the differences that were dividing the parties. One of Moody's problems was that the treasury of Local 1982 was depleted and he was unable to travel at union expense to New York or Washington, where Gleason and others wished to hold such a meeting. At long last the parties agreed to meet on February 8 (not February 10) at the ILA office in Washington. Moody went to Washington and arrived for the meeting at the appointed time. He was kept waiting for 6 hours.

When the meeting finally took place, the ILA was represented by President Gleason, his son, Thomas W. Gleason Jr., who is the ILA's general counsel, Sullivan, and both Bakers. In the course of the meeting, Moody again reaffirmed his loyalty to the ILA and offered to drop all litigation if the ILA would secure for Local 1982 its bargaining rights with TWT. He reminded Gleason that Sullivan had promised Moody in April 1981 that Local 1982 would be brought in on the TWT contract within 30 days, but nothing had happened.

Gleason (Sr.) accused Moody of trying to turn the dock over to the Teamsters. Gleason (Jr.) said that the ILA could put Local 1982 into trusteeship either for filing a decertification petition or for filing an unfair labor practice charge against TWT. Sullivan merely stated that he had been personally hurt because the petition and charge had been filed. Moody complained that the ILA had tied the Toledo stevedores into a substandard contract, without benefit of ratification, and that the Cleveland agreement was nothing compared with the DeBartolo contract that had governed the port during the preceding years. The meeting ended in a hot argument and the ILA leadership just walked out of the room. Gleason (Sr.) returned and invited Moody to phone him in New York in a couple of days and they would work something out. Moody did so, but Gleason was on vacation when the call arrived. Moody then sent Gleason a letter that was never answered. On February 10, Sullivan forwarded a report to the ILA executive council recommending that a new charter be granted for a general cargo local at Toledo.

Moody attended the ILA annual convention early in March at the Diplomat Hotel in Hollywood, Florida, as a delegate from Local 1982, but was denied credentials and could not participate in the convention. He attempted to speak with Gleason personally concerning the out-then sells them liquor by the drink in order to support the operation. Moody referred to these individuals as "skinners" because of the name of the card game they played.

[29] Sometime later, in 1983, Syph renewed the effort to collect pledge cards for a new local. On one occasion, while soliciting a card from Charles Hampton, Syph told Boyd to sign the card or he would not be hired. Boyd refused.

standing differences between Local 1982 and the ILA, but was unable to do so. One of Moody's reasons for wanting to attend the International convention was that the ILA executive council would be in attendance, and he felt that they would be making a decision at that time on whether to issue a charter for a new general cargo at the Toledo Port. On March 3, Moody appeared before the executive council, pledged the loyalty of Local 1982 to the ILA, and said that all they wanted was their bargaining rights. He said that the Local wanted to keep its charter and complained that it had received no support from the Great Lakes District. Syph told the executive council that "Moody and his stoolies" were trying to turn the port over to the Teamsters. Before leaving Florida, Moody received word indirectly from Gleason that an answer to his complaints would be sent in the mail.

On March 12, the ILA executive council authorized the issuance of a charter for a new local at Toledo, designating it as Local 2037. On March 15, Gleason wrote Syph and informed him of this fact. He said that the new local would only cover employees of TWT and that the charter document itself would be forwarded to Syph on the payment of a standard $13.50 fee charged for the issuance of charters. Before receiving Gleason's letter, Syph distributed a notice, using his own name as vice president of the GLD, stating that there would be an organizational meeting of the newly chartered Local 2037 on March 19 at the MEBA hall. The notice also contained a proposed slate of officers for Local 2037, headed up by Syph for president, Julio Ramirez for vice president, and Chevalier for financial secretary-treasurer. When Moody heard about this meeting, he sent Gleason a telegram in which he threatened the ILA with further legal action. In fact, the charter for Local 2037 was never forwarded to Syph because of the pendency of litigation, so the March 19 meeting never took place.

On March 23, Local 1982 went back to district court and filed, within the framework of its pending suit, a motion for a temporary restraining order and preliminary injunction and a show cause order seeking to hold the ILA in contempt for violating the order of November 19. A hearing on this show cause order was held on March 29. Although not granting all of the relief prayed for, Judge Young held the ILA in contempt. In a decision dated April 2, he required the ILA to make a formal entry in its records terminating the trusteeship and providing Moody with a certified copy of the minutes taking such action. The ILA was further required to notify Syph that he was no longer trustee, and instructed the ILA to deliver to Local 1982 officers the books and records of the Local. Of considerable importance is that he directed the ILA to pay over to Local 1982 the portion of the checked off dues designated for Local 1982 in the checkoff cards that had been filed with TWT the preceding May, together with interest on dues at 8.25 percent. Until this time, the GLD had taken this money from TWT and had deposited it in the general account of the Great Lakes District along with other GLD funds. Young also ordered the ILA to rescind the charter granted to Local 2037 and to reimburse the plaintiffs for attorneys fees involved in prosecuting the contempt action. Certain quotations from Judge Young's opinion are pertinent here:

> In desperation, the plaintiff Moody filed with the National Labor Relations Board a complaint of unfair labor practices, and petitions to decertify the defendant (ILA) and to re-certify Local 1982 as the collective bargaining agent for the workers at TWT.
> The defendant falsely accused Moody of filing the proceedings on behalf of the Teamsters Union, a traditional rival of the defendant on the Toledo docks. Defendant's officers based this calumny on the fact that the current attorney for Local 1982 also represented the Teamsters Local in Toledo. The matter of what labor law firm represents which labor union and when is a very fluid one in Toledo. No one has ever questioned, however, the complete loyalty of each firm to each of the individual unions it happens to represent at a given time, unaffected by any rivalries among their clients.
> The events presented at the various hearings in this case leave no doubt of the almost pathetic loyalty of the members of Local 1982 to the defendant, in spite of its clear disloyalty to them. It is hard to believe that the defendant's officers truly thought that the plaintiffs were trying to act on behalf of the Teamsters Union. It seems more probable that this is a trumped up justification to cloak their own wrongdoing.

Judge Young found that certain actions of the ILA in fall 1981 and spring 1982 violated his November 19 Order restraining the ILA from interfering with the operations of Local 1982. That the ILA had chartered a new local, that it had denied Moody a seat at the International convention in Florida, and ——that the ILA had taken no affirmative steps to dissolve the trusteeship were deemed to be evidence of contumacious conduct.

> [T]his rejection of the plaintiff Moody as a delegate demonstrates that the defendant continues to treat Local 1982 as being under trusteeship, in complete defiance of this Court's order.
> It is clear from these facts, which are undisputed, that the defendant in fact continued to treat the trusteeship as if it were still in force, depriving Local 1982 and its officers and members of any autonomy. It is hard to imagine a more direct and flagrant contempt of a court order.

Regarding the new local, Judge Young went on to say:

> The undisputed testimony was that Mr. Syph had been threatening dire consequences, financial and otherwise, to any employee of TWT who did not sign applications for membership in the new local. The undisputed testimony was also that there is no other port on the Great Lakes where two general cargo unions exist at the same time. Attempts to shake the plaintiffs' testimony on cross-examination > failed, and documentary evidence which perhaps could have refuted it was not offered.

> As a practical matter, the existence simultaneously in one seaport of two general cargo local unions, one recognized by the dock operators and other not so recognized, would be totally destructive of the unrecognized union. To say that chartering a new local would not interfere with the operations of Local 1982 is patently absurd.

The ILA appealed Judge Young's decision to the Sixth Circuit, where it was upheld in an opinion and order dated November 1, 1982 (Cases 82-3108 and 82-3220). The Great Lakes District, however, did not begin to remit back dues or current dues to Local 1982 until after the court of appeals had affirmed Judge Young's order. It continued to make those payments until spring 1984, when, at the outset of a new contract, TWT employees executed new checkoff authorizations. Most of those authorizations omitted any mention of Local 1982.

5. The 1982 shipping season

a. On the waterfront

The 1982 shipping season in Toledo began on April 23. Syph continued to act as dock steward at the morning shapeups and to assign lines. One new feature of the hiring process in 1982 was the establishment of a new category of employees referred to as "experienced" employees. The ILA and TWT agreed during the previous winter that the criteria for eligibility for health and welfare coverage should also be a criteria for preferential treatment in hiring in 1982. Notwithstanding the contractual provision designating employees with 1000 or more hours in the preceding season as experienced employees, the parties orally agreed that the figure should be adjusted to 350 hours. Accordingly, some 26 men who had worked 350 or more hours in 1981 were given preferment in hire after the 16 "preferred" men were hired. These 42 individuals constituted the core of the TWT labor force. Staler announced at a shapeup on that day that henceforth the Company would recognize only 41 employees regardless of seniority. (That figure eventually became 42.) A second change in the shapeup procedure was that Staler began to assign employees to job openings as their names were called. Syph's function was limited to calling the roll, although, as noted infra, he had some discretion in that regard.

Opening day was also marked by a spirited exchange between Syph and Charles Moody. After the evening shapeup was over, Levesque, a Moody supporter, asked Syph for a grievance form. Syph told Levesque that he was not Levesque's "g.d. steward" and told Levesque to get a form from Moody. He also told Levesque that he "didn't give a —" if the Company fired all the Moody people. Charles Moody jumped into the conversation at that point. He denounced Syph as a "rotten s.o.b.," accused Syph and the ILA of putting the men in a yellow dog contract, and finally referred to Syph as an "Uncle Tom" and a "company man." Syph admitted he was a company man and walked away.

As in other years, however, TWT was also forced to rely on casuals to fill out its hiring needs during peak intervals. All in all, TWT employed some 93 stevedores during the 1982 season, including 41 casuals. Some of the casuals worked only a few hours and some worked more than 100 hours, but none were hired until all of the 42 preferred and "experienced" men who had appeared at shapeup had been employed. Two individuals were removed from the list of preferred employees and placed in the list of "experienced" employees, namely Edwards and Shirley Marsenburg. Both were and are Moody supporters. As discussed more fully later on, Edwards and Marsenburg, both of whom had worked the contractual 1000 hours in 1981 required of experienced men, were replaced on the preferred list by Walter Sampsel and Joseph Victorian, both Syph supporters. Neither Sampsel nor Victorian had worked close to 1000 hours in 1981. Edwards and Marsenburg were given preferment in call among the 26 experienced men during the 1982 season, but their change in status, in addition to Edwards' removal as lines dispatcher, severely affected the number of hours both worked in 1982. Here is a comparison of the number of hours worked by both: Edwards worked 1559 hours in 1981 and 301 hours in 1982; Marsenburg worked 1254 hours in 1981 and 243 hours in 1982. Davis testified that he had discussed this move with John Baker before taking it. According to Davis, TWT initiated the request and Baker agreed. Later on, Edwards spoke to Staler and complained about being taken off the preferred list. I credit Edwards to the effect that Staler replied, "Well, Ray, it's just politics," to which Edwards stated, "I don't know what you're talking about. I thought you just wanted good workers."

This change in the preferred list by TWT meant that the only Moody supporter left on that list was Charles Moody himself. The political lineup among TWT's 42 preferred and "experienced" employees for the 1982 season was 22 Syph followers, 19 Moody followers, and one neutral. Among the 41 casuals, Moody sentiment was overwhelming although, in the next 2 years, Syph made a determined effort to hire as casuals new men who either had no particular allegiance to any faction or who could be relied on as his own supporters.[30]

At the outset of the 1982 season, Davis told Syph that he no longer had to use the Local 1982 seniority list at shapeup as he had in the fall of 1981. Accordingly, Syph discontinued using it. Although Syph had to hire preferred men, as well as Edwards and Marsenburg, before hiring any experienced men, within the ranks of 24 of the 26 experienced men Syph could hire in any order he chose and he admitted as much in his testimony. I credit corroborated testimony of other witnesses that the 41st and 42d men hired by Syph before reaching the casuals were always Gaylon Howard, a Moody supporter, and Robert Moody Jr.

[30] During the 1984 season, for instance, a total of 114 individuals were employed on the docks by TWT. In that year, the number of employees given preferment in hire had been increased to 50, meaning that 64 casuals were employed at some time during the shipping season. Of those 64 casuals, 26 were men who had not been hired in the 1981 season and who were never on the Local 1982 seniority list. A number of them had family ties to Syph-faction employees, leadmen, and foremen. They were: S. Ballard, K. Barker, F. Bires, G. Campbell, D. Chevalier, R. Cleveland, F. Clinksdale, D. Cousins, J. Dalimer, R. Fisher, E. German, L. Gholston, T. Golebieski, E. Hemp, D. Hice, J. Hodge, P. Kristoff, H. Loveless, W. Momenee, D. Morris, J. Morris, D. Pitts, A. Seay, R. Spencer, and L. Staler. I credit the testimony of Levesque and others that, on busy days, casuals were hired at shapeup who were unknown to either Syph or the marine foreman. They were requested to state their names and, in some instances, to spell their names in order to be listed on the hiring sheet.

On lines Syph could hire whom he pleased and he repeatedly said so to various employees. Syph's own records, which are in evidence, indicate that in 1982 he made a total of 17 lines assignments to 11 Moody supporters[31] and a total of 492 lines assignments to 41 of his own supporters.[32] (Syph's records were kept in terms of number of assignments on particular ships and days rather than in terms of the number of hours worked by linesmen.) Syph concedes that he did not equalize hours of work for longshoremen through the assignment of lines because "that was not my job." He admitted that lines assignments he gave in 1982 to T. Syph, Spencer, M. Rizo, A. Rizo, J. Ramirez, and D. Tefft—all of whom were casuals during that season—materially helped them to work the 200 hours they needed to qualify as experienced men during the 1983 season. Syph also admitted that he assigned lines by using a list composed of the names of men who had signed his petition asking the ILA to charter a new local.

As previously noted, business declined in 1982 and the total number of man hours worked by TWT employees was reduced by 26.7 percent, from 43,994 man hours to 32,241 man hours. Some 20 TWT employees, however, all Syph supporters, experienced an increase in hours worked in 1982 over what they had worked in 1981. Those prospering in the face of adversity were:

Name	1981 Hours	1982 Hours
Cleo J. Syph (new steward)	741	2,914
Joseph Victorian*	225	872
Walter Sampsel*	358	918

* New preferred man.

In marked contrast, all the 63 Moody supporters listed in Appendix A of this decision experienced sharp cuts in the number of hours worked in 1982 as compared with 1981. Charles Moody himself was reduced from 1578 to 725 hours in his new-found position as an ordinary stevedore.

I credit testimony in the record from Levesque, Howard, and others to the effect that Syph said flatly that he was going to hire his friends and relatives and that others would not work. A list of relatives of Syph and Company Foreman Glenard Staler and Floyd "Fats" Tefft, who were hired repeatedly in 1982 and thereafter, is as follows:

Fred Syph—Cleo Syph's brother
Ted Syph—Cleo Syph's brother
F. D. Syph—Cleo Syph's nephew
C. J. Syph—Cleo Syph's nephew
M. Turner—Cleo Syph's nephew

G. Foster—Cleo Syph's cousin
T. Fletcher—Cleo Syph's son

[31] Moody supporters receiving lines assignments in 1982 from Syph are as follows: Bacon, Tucker (2), Barteck (2), McVicker (4), Hollinger, Spivey, Hood, Hicks, and R. L. Moody (2), Clemons and Edwards. Edwards claims that he was not paid for the only lines assignment he received, since it occurred during normal working hours. He was given this assignment rather than an unloading job and paid as if he were unloading a ship. Charles Moody received no lines assignments from Syph, notwithstanding that he was a preferred man. In fact, Charles Moody was the only preferred man who did not get a lines assignment in 1982. When asked why he did not assign any lines to C. Moody in 1982, Syph simply replied, "No reason." In the fall of 1982, Staler had told C. Moody that the Company was going to try to equalize lines assignments among preferred men. On December 10, 1982, C. Moody filed a grievance claiming that he had not been given any lines assignments in 1982 and that he was the only preferred man to be overlooked in this regard. On May 17, 1983, Davis wrote a letter to Lackey in which he stated that the contract did not require that preferred men be given lines.

[32] Syph supporters given lines assignments in 1982 are as follows:

L. Victorian (6 assignments)

On one occasion, Syph told Davis that he was rotating lines among "some" employees.

O. Sanders—husband of C. J. Syph's sister
C. Spencer—Staler's brother
R. Spencer—Staler's nephew
L. Staler—Staler's son
D. Tefft—F. Tefft's brother

Among Syph's tenants, in an apartment house owned by Syph on Fulton Street, who were hired were D. Hendricks, W. Ramsey, and F. Gholston. Among Syph's card-playing friends at L. C.'s who were hired were R. White, J. Hodge, and L. Jones. As noted above, F. Tefft was also involved in hiring a relative. Moody filed a grievance against Tefft for nepotism, but the grievance was rejected.

On one occasion, Davis spoke to Syph about hiring relatives and told Syph that he did not like the practice. Syph asked Davis if he should discontinue the practice and Davis replied, "No." When asked at the hearing for an explanation of why several Syphs received lines assignments in 1983 substantially larger than the assignments given to other employees, C. Syph replied simply that he had no explanation, denying that he ever took family relationships into consideration when making job assignments.

b. More internal union charges

In addition to the internal union charges filed by Robert Moody and various Moody faction stevedores in November 1981,[33] additional charges against the ILA and various of its officers and constituent bodies were filed in 1982. Each of these charges was signed by a large number of Moody adherents and was then forwarded either to ILA headquarters in New York City or to the GLD headquarters in Buffalo. A partial listing of charge signers is found in Appendix A of this decision. None of these charges has ever been acted on by the ILA.

On June 3, 1982, a charge was filed with the GLD demanding an accounting by the GLD for the collection of the tonnage incentive and the $10 container royalty, which the collective-bargaining agreement with TWT required the employer to pay to the ILA. On the same day, a charge was lodged with ILA headquarters against the ILA executive officer, executive council, GLD officers, and the GLD council alleging that ILA dock steward Syph had refused to process pending grievances filed by TWT employees. This charge asked that Syph be brought to trial, removed as dock steward, and be required to make grievants whole for any financial losses sustained because their grievances had not been properly processed. A third internal charge, filed on the same day and sent to ILA headquarters, named the same respondents as did the second charge and complained that Syph, as dock steward, had refused to enforce the hiring provisions of the collective-bargaining agreement between the ILA and TWT. Like the other charge involving Syph, this one requested that Syph be brought to trial, removed as dock steward, and required to make grievants whole for losses sustained by his asserted failure to enforce the contract.

A fourth charge filed on June 3, 1982, was forwarded to ILA headquarters in New York and named as respondent ILA and GLD officers and councils. It complained about the policy of the ILA in conducting an organized refusal to load Russian ships to protest the Russian invasion of Afghanistan. This boycott led to the filing and prosecution of secondary boycott charges and the issuance of a complaint that was ultimately upheld by the U.S. Supreme Court. The Moody charge sought an accounting of legal expenses incurred to defend the unfair labor practice complaint and requested the filing of a suit by the ILA against the ILA officers responsible for organizing the boycott of Russian ships to recover from them personally any sums expended from the union treasury to defend the secondary boycott complaint.

Late in December 1982, Moody sent off another internal charge to the ILA office in New York. It was signed by a large number of Local 1982 members. The thrust of this complaint was that ILA officialdom had violated the constitution and bylaws by refusing to permit Local 1982's elected dispatcher, Edwards, to function as such on the Toledo dock. They asked, among other things, that various named ILA officials be disciplined for this asserted violation of their rights as Local 1982 members.

6. Grievances

Between the beginning of the 1982 season and the time this case came on for hearing in summer 1985, TWT employees and applicants for employment filed a total of 3707 grievances, most of which dealt with the failure or refusal of TWT and the dock steward to hire them, either at shapeup or on lines. A summary of grievances filed by year is as follows:

1982	249
1983	1672
1984	1486
1985 (thru 7/8/85)	300
Total	[34]3707

Over this period of time, grievances were filed in the names of some 69 TWT employees and applicants for employment. It is fair to say that, both in 1982 and thereafter, the filing of these grievances constituted a major administrative headache both for Syph and for TWT. Davis testified that he assumed that Local 1982 was responsible for these grievances, since most of the grievants were either Local 1982 leaders or were associated with them. This assumption was the basis for an unfair labor practice charge that TWT filed against Local 1982 on August 4, 1982. The charge alleged that the Local was harassing it with false and frivolous grievances. The charge was dismissed (Case 8-CB-5026).

At the beginning of 1982, a large number of grievances were left unresolved from the 1981 shipping season, when Moody was dock steward. Moody had presented

[33] At the hearing on August 29, 1985, I reserved ruling on the admission of G.C. Exh. 84. That document is now admitted into evidence.

[34] Regrettably, counsel felt called on to place each of these 3707 grievances in the record in this case, thereby clearing space in filing cabinets throughout the State of Ohio, but adding bulk to files elsewhere.

86 grievances to John Baker and Strimbu on August 11, 1981,[35] and had had 74 more in hand when he was ousted as steward on November 3. Copies of those grievances had been forwarded to Lackey by Moody under cover letter dated October 28, 1981. Twenty-six more grievances were signed by TWT employees and countersigned by Moody in November 1981, after he was removed as steward. In November 1981, Moody presented several of these grievances to Tefft and Staler, but both of them refused to accept them because Moody was no longer the steward. They required that all grievances be presented to them by Syph, the new dock steward. On November 5, and again on November 27, Moody gave several of these rejected grievances to Syph for presentation to the foremen, but Syph refused to take them, telling Moody that he was just trying to harass him with grievances. Syph denied that he had ever refused to accept a grievance, but I discredit him on this point as I do on many others. One of Moody's complaints against ILA officialdom was its failure to assist him in pressing grievances against TWT when grievances were taken beyond the stage of discussion between the steward and the marine foreman. It should be noted that a few of the 1981 grievances were filed by members of the Syph faction.

Sometime in the fall of 1981, Moody submitted to Lackey the grievances referred to in his letter to Hardwick. In a letter dated June 11 of the following year, from Davis to Syph and Lackey, Davis made reference to these grievances that "had been left on Jim Hardwick's desk on several occasions last fall." The grievances in question bore control numbers 81-86 through 81-152. Davis denied all of these grievances because they had been untimely filed and because they had been presented to TWT on Local 1982 grievance forms. He reminded Syph and Lackey that "Toledo World Terminal, Inc. does not recognize that local as a signator to the agreement between Toledo World Terminal and I. L. A."

TWT has never prepared a grievance form for the use of its employees, although previous employers at the Toledo dock had done so. At one time, Local 1982 had a secretary named Eunice who typed out complaints for the individual grievants who had come to the union hall to avail themselves of this service. However, sometime in 1981 or 1982, the Local had to discontinue this service and lay off their secretary because they had no funds to pay her. Beginning in 1982, Moody had blank grievance forms made up and kept them in his locker at the dock. These forms were altered slightly from time to time. Moody made these forms available to grievants on request. The normal practice was for a grievant to fill out a form in duplicate, present the original to Syph in the presence of a witness, and leave the copy with Moody.

Samples of grievance forms prepared by Moody and made available to dock workers are as follows:

> Some of the men hired to do this work have less experience in the industry than me. I was not hired because of these violations and my continued support of ILA Local 1982.
> (signature of grievant)

Some of the later forms were a "combination form" and could be used either for a linehandling grievance or a shapeup grievance. Beginning in 1984, the forms used added the phrase:

> This document is being given to you to initiate the grievance procedure. In the event that the Company does not give me a satisfactory answer please consider this a written grievance pursuant to Step 3 of the grievance procedure.

The latter phrase was added because of technical objections raised in 1982 and thereafter by TWT to the procedure used by many of Moody's supporters.[36] In the view of TWT, a grievant was first obligated to go to the dock steward and discuss his grievance orally with Syph. The dock steward and the grievant were then obligated to go to the marine foreman and discuss the grievance orally with him. Only after the marine foreman turned down the oral presentation of a grievance was the grievant entitled, in the estimation of TWT, to submit his grievance in writing.[37] If a grievant initiated the proce-

[35] Moody's written demand to arbitrate these grievances, given to Hardwick in early September 1981, has never received a reply from TWT.

[36] In 1981, when Moody was the officially recognized ILA steward, such procedural objections were not raised by TWT. Moody never brought a grievant into the company office to discuss a grievance with the marine foreman, nor did TWT object to the fact that grievance forms used by Moody during that year were forms supplied by Local 1982 that bore its name.

[37] Syph had a slightly different understanding of the three steps of the grievance procedure. In his view, at step one he was required to present the grievance to the foreman, at step two to the superintendent, and at step three to the company president. In Syph's opinion, there was nothing in the contract requiring the grievant to be present in person at step dure with a written grievance without going through the aforementioned steps, TWT would deny the grievance on procedural grounds, although it would frequently couple its procedural rejection with a further denial of the grievance on the merits. At one time, Moody added to the standard form a request for arbitration in the event that the grievance was finally rejected. Davis testified that, in his opinion, Syph had never presented to him a procedurally correct grievance during Syph's entire tenure as dock steward.

Grievants normally filed shapeup grievances immediately following a shapeup at which they were not hired and an individual, who was lower on the Local 1982 seniority list, was hired. This is what the forms meant by the standard phrase "less experience in the industry," which appeared on most if not all shapeup grievances. Lines grievances were usually submitted a day or two following a tie up or a let go for which the grievant was not hired.

During 1982 and 1983, Syph was furnished by TWT with a small office at the warehouse near the hiring area. (Later, when Syph's role in the shapeup process was sharply curtailed, this office was moved to a former guard shack located near the street entrance.) Stevedores frequented Syph's warehouse office to ask for work, to complain about not getting work, or to speak to Syph on a multitude of matters. Moody's followers disparagingly named Syph's office the "ass kiss room." They normally handed their written grievances to Syph in the ass kissing room.

Many of Moody's followers experienced great difficulty in filing grievances with Syph. Syph's conversation with Levesque on the opening day of the 1982 season was recited above. Between 1982 and 1984, Tucker filed 104 grievances. Syph told Tucker on more than one occasion that his hiring grievances had no merit because Syph was free to hire whom he pleased. When Tucker voiced a complaint that men lower on the Local 1982 seniority list had been hired in preference to himself, Syph simply told Tucker that he had torn up the Local 1982 seniority list. On one occasion Levesque went into Syph's office and asked him why he was not being hired.[38] Syph told Levesque that the Company said that he was not qualified. This remark started an exchange of curse words, in the course of which Syph told Levesque to "get (his) g.d. ass out of the office and don't come back no more. You're fighting the wrong battle and you're on the wrong team." Levesque protested that he was not on any team at all and was simply insisting on his rights and his seniority.

On May 19, 1982, Franklin D. Moody, Charles Moody's younger brother, turned in a written grievance to Syph. Syph told him that it was not necessary to file a written grievance and suggested to F. Moody that he just talk to him about his problem. F. Moody replied that he did not care to talk to Syph and that he would see him in court. Syph's reply was, "You smart-mouthed s.o.b. I'll see that you never get hired."[39] On another occasion, Syph told a group of employees who were turning in grievances that "you guys are making a play thing out of this." He told Levesque during one exchange that he was going "to get everyone of the g.d. Moodys off the docks and then retire and turn it over to Chevalier." In June 1985, Tefft asked Syph what the men were doing who were hanging around the hiring area. Syph replied, "They're grievants, but I don't owe those s.o.b.'s back there nothing." Once when Levesque had been hired by the foreman after TWT changed the hiring procedure in 1984, Syph complained to Staler, "You mean you hired that s.o.b. after all the grievances he filed."

Between 1982 and 1984, Robert Bradford filed an even 100 grievances. Sometime in 1983, Syph told Bradford that, if he kept filing grievances, he was not going to go to work. Bradford's reply was, "If this is all I have to go on, I'll do this because I want my job." On another occasion, while filing a grievance, Bradford was told by Syph that his grievance was no good, was illegal, and that Bradford was wasting his time.

During the 3-year period of time starting with the beginning of the 1982 season, Alexander Evans Jr. filed 100 grievances. Once, in 1984, Syph asked Evans, "Why are you filing a grievance? You ain't getting any money." Syph went on to tell Evans that the Moodys were going to starve him out and would cause him to lose his job. In May 1985, Evans went to the guard shack and presented Syph with a grievance for not being hired at shapeup. Syph told Evans, "I should have left you in prison."[40]

Wesley W. Boyd is 65 years old. He has filed a total of 149 grievances. On July 25, 1985, Boyd was hired directly by Tefft as an "extra" man. Syph told Tefft on this occasion that, if he had his way, he "wouldn't hire none of those black s.o.b.'s." Julio Ramirez,[41] a Syph follower, then said to Boyd, "What the hell are you doing here? We don't want no niggers driving for us." On that occasion Boyd was assigned to drive a 2600 diesel forklift whose power steering was broken. Because of this defect in the machinery, Boyd was hard put to wrestle with the truck as he steered it about the dock. On one occasion in 1984, when Boyd turned in a grievance to Syph, Syph told him to go see Moody because Moody was Boyd's dock steward.

Charles Hampton Sr. is functionally illiterate. Over the years he filed a total of 149 grievances. While presenting one of these grievances, Syph asked Hampton to read it to him. When Hampton was unable to do so, Syph called Hampton a "dumb—," told him he would not get hired, and threw him out of the office.

Thomas W. Gaines filed 46 grievances. He presented one of these grievances to Syph using Edwards as his witness. Syph's response was, "Let's go into the superintendent's office and settle it." When they arrived at the one when the steward spoke with the marine foreman. The contract itself imposes no obligation on a grievant to discuss his complaint orally with the steward before reducing it to writing. It merely says that he should present the grievance to the steward without specifying how that presentation should take place.

[38] Between 1982 and 1984, Levesque filed a total of 223 grievances.

[39] Between 1982 and 1984, Franklin Moody filed a total of 30 grievances.

office, Edwards started through the door and Syph objected to his presence. Gaines explained that Edwards was acting as his witness. When Syph said that Edwards was not coming in, Gaines asked why not. Syph replied, "Because he is one of those—who is trying to ruin things around here." A shouting match ensued in the course of which Syph called Gaines a "damn fool." All of them were thrown out of the office by the marine foreman.

Gaines had another encounter with Syph in which he asked Syph why he was not being hired. Syph's reply was that Gaines did not have any seniority and Syph could hire whom he pleased. On a third occasion Gaines met Syph at the union hall. Syph said to him and other stevedores who were present, "You monkeys don't take heed to your superior." On a fourth occasion, Syph told Gaines, "You won't get no work down here so you might as well quit."

On two occasions, Syph told Carl Foster Jr., a relative by a former marriage, that his grievances did not mean anything. On a third occasion, as Foster was turning in a grievance, Syph told him that Foster's association with the Moodys was one of the reasons why he was not being hired and that it would be helpful to him if he quit associating with them. Eventually Foster quit coming to shapeups because, as he put it, "I can't just live on grievance paper."

Gaylon Howard filed 116 grievances. One evening he spoke with Syph on the porch of L. C.'s where they had both gone to play cards. He asked Syph why he had not been getting hired. Syph told him that he did not represent anyone from Local 1982. He said to Howard, "Why don't you go to Moody. He's your rep, but he can't do a thing for you."

Lonis "Tony" Byrd filed about eight grievances. He testified that he did not appear regularly at shapeups in 1982 because of the controversy between the factions. Once during that year Syph spoke to Byrd in the shapeup room. Syph said that Byrd, who was number one on the Local 1982 seniority list among the active stevedores, was not being hired because he lacked experience. He accused Byrd of sticking with the Moodys and said he was going to get rid of the Moodys and "all the guys who stuck with the Moodys." On another occasion in the warehouse, when Byrd presented a grievance to Syph, Syph told him that he was not working because he stuck with the Moodys and directed Byrd to take his grievance to the Moodys. Byrd, who has worked on the docks since 1959, told Syph that he had done every job on the docks, but Syph merely replied that no one was going to work on the docks except his kinfolk and his friends. Byrd took his hiring complaint to Tefft and Staler, but both of them said they could not help him. On another occasion, Syph told Byrd and others that if Local 1982 were placed in trusteeship, he was definitely going to kick out the Moodys and anyone who stuck with them. He reiterated this threat in Byrd's presence on other occasions.

Paul Conley filed 25 grievances. At one shapeup in November 1982, Syph refused to hire him, so Conley presented a grievance. Syph told Conley that the grievance did not mean anything because Conley was on the wrong ball team, adding that he could not understand why Conley, a longtime associate of Syph, had teamed up with the Moodys. On another occasion, while the lawsuit in district court was pending, Conley handed Syph another grievance. Syph told him that he would not be hired as long as he had anything to do with the Moodys. Conley's reply was, "That remains to be seen." Syph insisted to Conley that his men were right, that the Moody faction was wrong, and that Judge Young would be the man to render that decision. Thereafter Syph told Conley several times when Conley was presenting grievances that he did not want the grievance, that the grievance did not mean anything, and that all he did was to throw them in a wastebasket.

Raymond Merrill filed a total of 139 grievances up to the close of the 1984 shipping season. One of these grievances was granted.[42] The rest were not. In August 1983, Syph told Merrill that he should not be hanging around with the Moodys because "they're a bunch of g.d. crazy fools." He included Edwards and Richard Staunton by name in this description. He also told Merrill, who is illiterate, that he was not following the proper procedure in filing grievances, but he did not outline what the proper procedure was. He did tell Merrill that he should not file any more grievances because it was causing him to lose work.[43]

During the 1982, 1983, and 1984 seasons, Milton Shoecraft filed a total of 175 grievances. On one occasion in 1983, Shoecraft and William McCully went into Syph's office to protest Syph's failure to hire them that morning. Syph's reply to Shoecraft was that he was only hiring experienced men. He also told Shoecraft that, "If you hang around the Moodys, you'll find yourself outdoors. They'll be making the money and you won't be making any money at all."

In June 1983, Syph announced that he would not accept any more grievances in the shapeup area and that all grievances had to be presented to him in his office. He did not always adhere to this rule. Edwards overheard Syph say to his brother near the employee lockers located next to the shapeup area that "if these s.o.b.'s keep filing grievances they are never going to work."[44]

Robert L. Moody Jr. filed 233 grievances in a 3-year span between April 1982 and the close of the 1984 season. In his testimony, Syph expressed even greater antipathy toward Robert Moody than he did toward his younger brother Charles. Having worked 350 hours in [42] Merrill suffered a fainting spell aboard a ship he was helping to unload and was assisted to the dock. Before he was allowed to come back, the Company insisted that he have a physical examination performed at a nearby VA hospital. (Merrill is retired from the service on disability.) Merrill grieved this requirement, so the Company relented and accepted him back without an examination.

[43] About this same point in time, Tefft took Merrill aside and gave him the same advice. Tefft explained on the stand that he felt that Merrill was "easily led." His advice to Merrill was that he should not be hanging around the Moodys because they were causing him to lose his job completely. Merrill's reply to Tefft was that it was a free country and he would associate with whom he pleased. Tefft also counseled Merrill that he should not be filing grievances.

[44] The General Counsel's witness Melvin L. Jones testified that Syph told him he was wasting time filing grievances and that as long as he filed grievances, he was not going to get hired. I discredit Jones on the basis of demeanor and conclude that he was an unreliable witness.

1981, R. Moody qualified as an "experienced" man during the 1982 season. However, his total number of hours worked dropped from 636 in 1981 to 233 in 1982. In 1981 R. Moody received 26 hours of work on lines. In 1982 he got only two lines assignments from Syph. Qualifying hours to remain an experienced man in the 1983 season were dropped from 350 to 200 hours because 1982 had been a disappointing season. Accordingly, R. Moody retained his status as an experienced man in 1983. However, he was concerned that his health insurance coverage would be in jeopardy because of the scarcity of work assignments he was receiving from Syph in early 1983.

On May 4, 1983, R. Moody went into Hardwick's office along with Edwards to complain about scarce work assignments and about their potential effect on his insurance coverage. Hardwick told him that he would not speak to him unless his steward was present, so R. Moody and Edwards went to get Syph. Syph came into the meeting, saying to R. Moody and Edwards, "They ain't going to talk to you s.o.b.'s unless I'm with you." At the meeting with Hardwick, R. Moody complained that he was steadily being assigned to "short shots" and, at that rate, he would not have enough qualifying hours in 1983 to retain his insurance coverage during the following season. He also complained that Syph was not giving him any lines to supplement the hours earned from shapeups. Hardwick merely replied that the dock steward had to call his name at shapeup when hiring experienced men, but that lines assignments were strictly up to Syph. Syph then said, "— you, Moody," to which Hardwick added, "Meeting adjourned."

On various occasions, when R. Moody presented grievances, Syph told him that his grievances were no good, that he (Syph) would hire whom he pleased, and that R. Moody's standing on the Local 1982 seniority list meant nothing.[45] R. Moody worked 381 hours in 1983. This was not enough for him to retain his place on the list of experienced employees in 1984, since the number of qualifying hours for 1984 was raised to 400 hours worked during the preceding year.

Richard "Lefty" Hollinger has worked for TWT sporadically since it took over the general cargo in 1981. Unlike many of the other witnesses for the General Counsel, Hollinger has filed only one grievance during that period of time. On several occasions, Syph, a lifelong acquaintance, told him to "keep a low profile" and refrain from filing any grievances. In 1984, when he was looking for work, Hollinger was told by Syph to "keep your nose clean and I'll see what I can do for you." Hollinger signed a couple of internal union charges that Moody circulated. Regarding this action, he heard Syph tell Ramirez, "Let Lefty suffer a little bit. He's with Moody and them guys. Let him suffer a little bit. He'll be back to work."

Robert Highsmith filed 100 grievances between the spring of 1982 and the fall of 1984. While filing one of these grievances, Syph told him that anyone who files a grievance would be fired.[46] During the same period of time Alvin Freeman filed 57 grievances. Syph rejected one of them, saying that he was not following the right procedure. When Freeman asked Syph what the right procedure was, Syph made no reply. On another occasion, when Freeman was acting as a witness for Marsenburg in filing a grievance, Syph denounced them as "scabs," saying that they would not get jobs until after the other men had been hired. On another occasion, while turning in a grievance, Freeman reportedly overheard Syph say that he would see to it that Gaines and Shoecraft would never work again on the docks. I discredit Freeman, however, and find that his testimony on this point was unreliable. Harkles Bacon filed a total of 88 grievances. He did so everytime he appeared at shapeup and witnessed the hiring of an applicant who had a lower ranking on the Local 1982 seniority list than he did. Once, in 1983, Syph told him that if he continued to file grievances, he would not be hired at all.

Matthew Bennett filed only a handful of grievances. One such grievance was denounced by Syph as "horseshit." He suggested to Bennett that he throw it away. Syph also made the same suggestion to Marsenburg when the latter tried to submit a grievance.

The Company's position respecting all lines grievances was that the steward had plenary authority to hire whom he pleased and that the cited provisions of the contract found on Moody's grievance forms were inapplicable to lines. Regarding shapeup grievances, TWT took the position that seniority on the docks was inapplicable to its operation and that no complaint existed merely because a person who had a lower rank on the Local 1982 seniority list was hired in preference to a higher ranking individual. It steadfastly refused to recognize the applicability of that list to its operation. TWT recognized three categories of employees and applicants—preferred men, experienced men (later called "qualified" men), and casuals. So long as an individual was properly hired in the order required by these three classifications, the contract had, in its opinion, been observed. Regarding grievances charging that the grievant had been discriminated against in employment because of his continued support for Local 1982, TWT first took the position that all employees and applicants were TWT members and hence no discrimination among them could occur simply because one member was hired in preference to another. When this response wore thin, it then took the position, stated by Davis at the hearing, that no actual evidence of any particular discrimination based on union or intraunion considerations had been personally brought to TWT's attention.

Syph testified that he never found merit in any grievance filed by Local 1982 members. He also admitted that he never made any independent investigation concerning the merits of a grievance and that his entire investigative effort consisted of talking to the company president. He simply gave batches of grievances to Hardwick. From time to time, he would discuss an individual grievance with Davis if it appeared to be unique or unprecedented. However, in none of these discussions did Syph ever take a position on the merits of the grievance or act as an advocate for granting it. But, for the most part, grievances were resolved by the Company without any face-to-face discussions at the third step, the final step before arbitration. Syph also testified that he never disagreed with any disposition the Company ever made of any grievance, even though, in some instances, such as a grievance filed by Robert Bradford, the Company failed to address or resolve the central allegation in the employee's complaint. To use Syph's words, "We made a practice of not violating the contract."

[45] At a general meeting held by Local 1982 on January 22, 1982 (the occasion for signing the petition protesting the formation of a new local), Robert Moody was elected Local 1982 dock steward replacing Leroy Hunter and Kermit Jones Sr. This post was "without portfolio," however, since TWT refused to recognize Local 1982 or its dock steward.

[46] On one occasion late in 1981, Syph told certain of his supporters in the lunchroom at the warehouse that he was going to get rid of Highsmith and both Moodys.

Not all the grievances submitted dealt with hiring. A few dealt with improper manning. Some of these were granted. Moody filed one grievance asking to know why certain awards of money, which had been placed in escrow by the Company in 1982 when it upheld certain grievances based on improper manning, had never been distributed to the employees bringing the grievances. The amount in question was $2402.97. Although admitting that the money has remained in escrow for about 4 years, TWT said that it did not make distributions to specific individuals because it was unsure which employees were entitled to be paid because certain unloading gangs had not been sufficiently manned as required by the memorandum of understanding. Syph said he also knew about the money in the escrow account but he did not know to whom it should be distributed. He was unaware of whether it had been drawing any interest during the 3-1/2 years it had been on deposit. This grievance has never been resolved. When asked why he did not press the matter or take the Company to arbitration, Syph merely replied, "I just assumed that Mr. Davis was an honest man, and that when he got ready, we would get together and pay these people." At the hearing in October 1985, Baker testified that he did not know which individual grievants were entitled to the money and did not know when anyone might be paid. He admitted that he was not doing anything to resolve the question.

In 1982 and 1983, any responses made by TWT to pending grievances were made in letters sent by Davis to Lackey. Individual grievants were not given individual responses. In 1984, Davis began to provide specific replies to particular grievants. For the most part he used a form to do so, much as the grievants had used forms to submit their complaints.

7. The 1983 season

Because 1982 had been a poor year, TWT and the ILA agreed that eligibility for benefits and for placement on the list of experienced men entitled to preferment in hire during the 1983 season should be dropped from 350 to 200 hours. The Company again used the list of 16 preferred employees—men who were hired independently of the shapeup. The composition of this list was the same as in 1982. The list of experienced men remained at 26 men. Some changes, however, took place in the composition of that list.[47]

Edwards and Marsenburg, preferred men in 1981, were placed on the experienced list in 1982 but with preference in order of call. Toward the end of the 1982 season, Syph told Edwards that it would take 2000 hours to qualify as an experienced man in 1983 and that Edwards would never make it. Syph punctuated his statement by saying, "Edwards, you're through." In 1983 they remained on this list, but the preferment in order of call was removed. Accordingly, Syph was free to hire them in any order he chose so long as no casual employees were hired first.

Gaines, Glover, McCully, Highsmith, and Shoecraft, all Moody men, were removed from the list and became casual hires, ostensibly because they failed to have enough hours in 1982 to qualify for the 1983 list. Three other individuals, all Moody supporters, were listed as disabled or retired. In their places, eight Syph supporters were substituted.[48] Gaines missed "making the cut" by 25 hours, Glover by 157 hours, McCully by 32 hours, Highsmith by 2 hours, and Shoecraft by 5 hours. The effect of being reduced from experienced employees to casual employees was that these individuals worked far less in 1983 than in 1982, notwithstanding the fact that 1983 was a better year all around on the dock.[49] Most of them had to abandon their jobs with TWT and seek other employment.

I credit Howard to the effect that, in the fall of 1982, during a late-night card playing session at L. C.'s, Syph stated, "It's a damn shame. There's McCully. There's Gaines. There's Highsmith. There's Milton Shoecraft. They are all at the top of the seniority list. They are not going to get no bonus this year. They won't be hired next year off of the list. Milton Shoecraft, without a miracle, he won't get hired no more. When it comes to — a — around, I'm an expert."[50]

Toward the end of the 1983 shipping season, Syph made a statement of similar import during another card-playing session at L. C.'s. On this occasion he directed his remarks at Spivey and Robert Moody, stating in the presence of Howard and others that he had called Willie Spivey at his home because Spivey did not have enough hours. Syph wanted to encourage Spivey to come to late season shapeups in order to earn sufficient hours to be placed on the experienced list in 1984. Syph stated that he was urging Spivey to come to work in order to block Robert Moody from getting enough hours to qualify for any preferment in 1984. Syph's quoted phrase was that he was "watching them hours like a hawk watching chickens" to make sure his friends would get in and Moody supporters would be left out. Robert Moody ended up working 381 hours in 1983, some 19 hours short of the 400 hours that became the standard for experienced employees at the outset of the 1984 season. Having been reduced to the status of a casual employee, he was forced to seek other employment in 1984.

[47] The 10(b) period on charges filed against the Employer began on February 12, 1983.

[48] Lawler, Oliverez, Ramirez, A. Rizo, M. Rizo, C. Spencer, T. Syph, and D. Tefft.

[49] In 1983, TWT employees worked a total of 49,546 hours, up by 17,305 hours from 1982 and by 5552 over the 1981 total.

[50] Syph included McGoffney in this list of employees who might lose their standing on the experienced list.

During the 1983 season, Syph continued to make lines assignments at his sole discretion. Notwithstanding the fact that 1983 was a better season than 1982, Moody supporters received only 5 lines assignments, i.e., 12 fewer assignments than they did in 1982. The overwhelming number of these assignments in that year went to Syph supporters. For this disparity Syph had no explanation.

One flurry of intraunion bitterness broke out in the summer of 1983 when Local 1982 held an election of officers. The Moody faction won and Chevalier, J. Victorian, and J. Turner filed charges with the International alleging that the election was improperly conducted because some of the candidates were not dues-paying members. The ILA president referred the charges to C. Moody who, as secretary-treasurer, was obligated under the ILA constitution to investigate such charges and to hold a hearing. When Moody failed to hold a hearing, these same members of the Syph faction filed internal union charges against C. Moody for failing to investigate the earlier election charge pertaining to the candidacies of persons who paid no dues. The second charge was referred by the ILA to the executive board of Local 1982 for investigation and a report.

Moody countered these charges by writing a letter to Gleason dated July 22, 1983, requesting that the ILA furnish Moody with detailed records specifying hours worked and dues deducted for each TWT employee. He complained that Local 1982 was never given such information, and that without such information pertaining to dues checkoffs, it would be impossible for him to respond to the initial charge and determine whether the candidates for union office were or were not dues paying members, as alleged by Chevalier, J. Victorian, and J. Turner. At a meeting late in August 1983, Sullivan told Moody that the ILA would not turn over the dues records to him because the information in question would "give him the edge" over Syph. Following this conversation, a hearing was held by the ILA on these charges on October 12, 1983, but no results have ever been announced.

8. The 1984 season

The 1984 shipping season was the best yet for TWT. The total man hours worked by its stevedores amounted to 59,687, up 10,141 hours from the previous year and 35.9 percent over its initial year. Several significant changes in hiring procedures took place during 1984. The old contract between TWT and ILA expired on December 31, 1983, and negotiations commenced on January 12, 1984, for a new one. At that meeting Davis told John Baker and other ILA negotiators that, if the Board issued a complaint against TWT for a hiring violation based on charges that were then pending, TWT would thenceforth insist on doing all the hiring. Baker objected, saying that the ILA operated hiring halls throughout the ports of the United States and that it would not relinquish this prerogative in Toledo.

When the shipping season began in April, hiring procedures in effect during 1983 continued to be followed for a short while. The number of hours necessary to be on the experienced list was raised from 200 to 400 hours worked during the preceding season. Following this change, certain changes in the composition of the list took place. Moody supporters Howard, Marsenburg, and Robert Moody were dropped to the ranks of casual employees, while Syph supporters J. Beese, F. Syph, and A. Victorian became experienced men. Syph supporter John R. Bennett was promoted from the experienced list to the preferred list. The total number of employees having preferment at shapeup remained at 42 and Syph continued during April and early May to control both the shapeups and the assignment of lines.

On March 30, 1984, the Regional Office issued the first consolidated complaint against TWT and ILA. Shortly thereafter, TWT engaged a consulting firm to devise a system of selection of employees who would have more or less permanent status. On May 2, Davis gave Hardwick, Tefft, Staler, and Warehouse Foreman Darby Lovicott a sheet containing the names of 63 stevedores listed in alphabetical order. The names were drawn from the list of employees who had worked for TWT during the past three seasons. Davis maintains that these 63 employees performed 92 percent of the work during those years, but this percentage is disputed by the General Counsel. Davis instructed each of these individuals to make individual ratings for each of the 63 named employees regarding ability, productivity, and quality of work, and to work independently of other rating supervisors. They were also asked to rate each employee regarding attitude. Davis admitted that the "attitude" rating reflected, in large part, whether the employee in question was in the habit of filing hiring grievances. The ratings requested to be made were excellent, good, fair, and poor. Davis assigned numerical weights to each of these ratings, made up a composite rating sheet, and selected from this list of 63 the 50 highest rated individuals. These were the men to whom he assigned preferment under the forthcoming contract. He also sought to establish an order of call among all but the 16 preferred men. Among the other 34 individuals, who would now be referred to as qualified rather than experienced employees, there were five subclassifications—power operator, checker, signalman, laborer, and front-end loader. In each subcategory, men were given a ranking. Because of their ability to do more than one job, some men were listed in more than one subclassification, thereby enhancing their opportunities for employment at shapeup.

The net effect of this effort was to add three Moody supporters—Tucker, Bacon, and Hood—to the list of qualified employees and to add four Syph supporters to this list (McVicker, Torres, M. Turner, and S. Turner). Merrill and Ben, both Moody supporters, were dropped into the ranks of casual employees. Among the 13 individuals on Davis' list who did not "make the cuts" and who became or remained casual employees were 3 Syph supporters—Apodaca, R. Moore, and G. Foster—and 10 Moody supporters—Ben, M. Bennett, Czizi, Gaines, Glover, Howard, Merrill, R. Moody, Nolan, and Shoecraft. The political lineup of the 50 individuals selected by Davis and his foremen was 37 Syph supporters, 11

Moody supporters, and 1 neutral, a considerable change from the 22–19–1 lineup that existed at the beginning of the 1982 season among stevedores on the preferred and experienced lists.

Davis wrote John Baker a letter in which he outlined what had taken place and insisted that these 50 named individuals be given preferment in employment as preferred and qualified men, that the order of call proposed by the Company for qualified men be recognized, and that the Company be allowed to do the hiring with its own foremen both at shapeup and at lines. For lines assignments TWT proposed a simple rotation among the 50 listed employees, who would be entitled to earn seniority with the Company.[51] The ILA reluctantly agreed to this proposal and a contract was concluded containing these provisions.

At TWT's insistence the contract was submitted to the stevedores for ratification. At TWT's further insistence, the ratification vote was limited to the 50 persons whom it had selected as its permanent cadre. Casuals were not allowed to vote. The vote took place at a meeting held on the evening of May 22, 1984, in a portion of the office building where Local 1982 rented space for its office. Chevalier acted as election clerk, flanked by a deputy sheriff whose function was to keep out members of Local 1982 who appeared to vote, but whose names did not appear on the TWT eligibility list. A large number of these individuals did appear and attempted to gain admission but were not permitted to do so. The contract was ratified and became effective at the shapeup the following morning.

No explanation exists in the record from the Company about why, in May 1984, it raised the number of employees entitled to preferment in hire from 42 to 50. I credit Hollinger's testimony that Syph told him the Company was adding more men at that time to make sure that the contract was ratified.

Beginning with the shapeup on May 23, the marine foreman took charge of the daily hiring. Syph rarely attended shapeups from that point forward although he was required to be on the premises to earn any money. The first 50 men to be hired were the individuals selected by TWT as preferred and qualified men. Accordingly, the shapeup became little more than a roll call and an attendance check regarding the list of 50. After that list was exhausted, casual employees would then be hired. They were often selected by the marine foremen from men who were present on the premises. Regarding the hiring of casuals after May 23, 1984, Tefft and Staler were at odds in their testimony. One said that, if he needed "extra" men, he would ask Syph and Syph would obtain them wherever he could. The other said that he would simply give Syph the name of an extra man and ask Syph to phone him and tell him to come to work. Syph admitted that, from time to time, he was requested to provide extras and would obtain them from any source available, including relatives, tenants at his apartment building, hangers-on at the Consaul Tavern, people lingering about the premises after the shapeup had concluded, or men whose names were on a list of casual employees that he maintained.

On lines, the practice under the new contract was for the foreman who needed a linehandling crew to give Syph the names of 8 or 10 men in alphabetical order and tell Syph to call either 2 or 4, depending on whether it was a tie-up or a let-go. Syph did so, exercising some discretion within the limited list regarding whom he would call. The list was ultimately called in rotation. Records in evidence indicate that in 1984 and thereafter, lines assignments have been apportioned among the 50 preferred and qualified men more or less equally, within a range of difference of 1 or 2. Both before and after the 1984 contract, casual employees were almost never called on to work lines.

After the 1984 contract was ratified, new checkoff authorization forms were circulated. The form distributed by Syph made no mention of Local 1982 or of a checkoff of $6 per month for any local. Moody circulated his own checkoff form, which did include Local 1982 as the recipient of monthly dues. From that point forward, no dues were transmitted by the GLD to Local 1982 so its sources of revenue have almost completely dried up.

9. Casual employees

Like all stevedoring companies, TWT is forced to use the services of casual[52] or "extra" employees during peak periods to supplement its normal complement. During the first 4 years of its operations on the Port of Toledo, TWT has hired the following number of stevedores during the respective shipping seasons:

1981	158
1982	93
1983	126
1984	114

Most of these individuals worked in the early spring or late fall, when the weather was bad and a combination of absenteeism among regular employees and the arrival of large numbers of ships in concentrated periods of time made jobs available for them at shapeup. They were and are almost always assigned to laborers' jobs.

So long as the Local 1982 seniority list was used as the basis for hiring at shapeups, nonpreference employees who were selected came from that list. (By Local 1982's definition, a "casual" was a temporary employee whose name was not found on its seniority list.) Moody testified without contradiction that no one on the Local 1982 seniority list had less than 9 years' experience on the port.

[51] The term "seniority" as used in the company proposal—which later became embodied in the contract—did not have the broad or expansive meaning that it does under most collective-bargaining agreements. The concept had no applicability to layoffs and recalls but merely applied to promotions and training for new jobs, something that rarely, if ever, takes place on the docks because of the surplus of employees already available to fill any job classification.

[52] The use of the word "casual" in this decision, regarding job applicants who did not enjoy some kind of preferment in hire, does not constitute a determination that such persons were or are casual employees as the Board uses that term to designate persons who are ineligible to vote in representation elections because of their tenuous relationship to an employer. In fact, as discussed later, a number of these casuals I regard as discriminatees and hence "employees" within the meaning of Sec. 2(11) of the Act.

Only after the list was exhausted were incidental casuals hired for the day. This practice meant that the cadre of casuals available to TWT, and utilized by it at the outset of its operation in Toledo, was a fairly standard and predictable group of people who were well known in the industry both by union and management officials. Only after Syph took over the hiring and began to hire whom he chose after exhausting the list of 42 preferential hires were men hired who were new to the docks.[53]

Various Moody supporters who testified recounted numerous instances when casuals having little or no experience on the docks were hired by Syph in preference to themselves, even though they were present at shapeup. On some occasions, they were denied employment and found that Syph had phoned other men and asked them to come in to fill in a vacancy in a crew. Syph testified that he hired as casuals the men who showed up most frequently at shapeups. Until the consolidated complaint in this case was issued, TWT kept no records concerning the identity of stevedores present for shapeup who had not been hired. They recorded only the names of those who had been hired. Thereafter, Tefft or Staler made handwritten notations at the bottom of daily hiring sheets indicating whom they saw in the area that were not hired. For the most part, these lists included only Moody supporters.

Syph did not maintain daily sign-in sheets for job applicants and kept no other records of unsuccessful job seekers, until it appeared that this information might be needed for purposes of litigation. Thereafter, he made sporadic lists. Over the years C. Moody did compile such information on a daily basis. As a preferred man, C. Moody was almost always on the job and was in a position to observe who was hired and who was not. Some errors in these sheets were pointed out at the hearing but, by and large, they constitute a reliable record of daily hiring events from 1982 to the present. Another source of information concerning who was present but not hired are the 3707 grievances themselves. Those that dealt with shapeups—and most of them did—indicate that the grievant was (with few exceptions) present on the day noted on the grievance for hire but was not selected. Although the Company routinely rejected these grievances for reasons relating to contract interpretation, none of its rejections ever attacked the basic factual premise of the grievance, namely that the signer was actually present for shapeup, but did not go to work.[54] Accordingly, I also regard them as reliable records establishing these facts.

TWT maintains that, after it took over the hiring in 1984, it established a rule requiring casuals to stand at a particular spot in the warehouse hiring area at the risk of being deemed unavailable for hire at shapeup. No such rule was ever posted. The spot in question was immediately around the podium used by the foreman and inside a mesh fence that divided the hiring area from the locker and lunchroom area beyond. This area was always congested with job seekers who wanted to be next to the foreman on the podium. As described in the record, the new rule did not pertain to men on the list of 50 who were free to stand or sit anywhere within earshot of the foreman, so long as they responded when their names were called. Tefft and Staler indicated that the rule was aimed at various individuals who "filed grievances" and who were in the habit of congregating each morning near the shapeup, area but beyond a mesh fence in the lunchroom.[55] Although many witnesses testified that they had never heard of the rule, or had heard a foreman make mention of it only shortly before the hearing began in this case, Tefft and Staler testified that, on three or four occasions between May 1984 and the summer of 1985, they had told assembled applicants at shapeups that, if they wanted to be hired, they had to come over and stand next to the hiring podium. Several witnesses testified that they regularly stood in that spot, but their presence did not result in employment. There is little doubt that, on various occasions when the Company needed day laborers, foremen (and particularly Syph) rounded them up wherever they could be found, either on or off company premises. Davis testified that it was acceptable to TWT if a casual were denied employment because he was an active supporter of Local 1982, adding that a person so affected had no remedy under the grievance procedure.

B. Analysis and Conclusions

1. The supervisory status of Moody, Syph, and Edwards

Both the original memorandum of understanding and the first contract between TWT and the ILA, incorporating by reference the terms of the Cleveland agreement, spoke in terms of a union employment office and a hiring hall system. These contracts envisioned a system under which TWT would first seek employees, other than preferred employees, from an ILA office under a referral system that would give preference in referral to experienced employees, i.e., those having 800 or 1000 hours of employment on the docks in the preceding season. TWT would then be free to hire from "any other available source" after exhausting referrals available from the "employment office." In fact, the hiring provisions of the memorandum of understanding and the Cleveland contract, as well as later ILA-TWT agreements, were never carried into effect in Toledo. The ILA has never operated an employment office in Toledo during any period of time pertinent to this case. There has never been a conventional hiring hall arrangement in effect between these parties, and the hiring procedure that was followed until May 23, 1984, was one in which TWT simply hired the ILA dock steward and lines dispatcher as its own supervisors and allowed them to perform TWT's daily hiring function in the manner outlined earlier in this decision. There is no dispute that Moody, during his term as dock steward, and Syph thereafter, were agents of the Respondent ILA for whose acts and conduct the ILA is vicariously responsible. The same holds true for Edwards in 1981. It is equally clear that they were supervisors for TWT within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act, for whose statements, acts, and omissions TWT was also vicariously responsible. The fact that these individuals were agents of the ILA for hiring purposes does not preclude them from being agents of TWT as well, since a hiring official can be a dual agent. Master Stevedores Assn., 156 NLRB 1032 (1966); Daugherty Co., 147 NLRB 1295 (1964); Plumbers Local 17 (FSM Mechanical Contractor), 224 NLRB 1262 (1976); Southern Stevedoring Co., 230 NLRB 609 (1977); IATSE Local 592 (Saratoga Performing Arts), 266 NLRB 703 (1983).

[53] A list of 26 casuals hired during the 1984 season who had not worked at all in 1981 is set forth, supra at fn. 30.

[54] Davis testified that he assumed, as a matter of fact, that any grievant had presented himself for hire and was not hired.

[55] When asked why these individuals repeatedly showed up each day at shapeup time if they did not want to be hired, neither Tefft nor Staler had an answer.

While bearing the title of dock steward, both Moody and Syph were regularly employed by TWT—the first to be hired and the last to be discharged. Their annual incomes far exceeded the incomes of the working stevedores whom they selected each day for employment. So long as any stevedoring employee worked on any given day, Moody (and later Syph) were entitled to be paid. I credit an abundance of testimony in this record that, in 1981, Moody (and later Syph) actually did the hiring of all experienced and casual employees who were hired at shapeup. Their daily function was to call the roll and to allow those who answered their names to select a day's work from among the jobs still unfilled. In 1981 the marine foreman who was present was merely an observer. His function amounted to little more than notifying the steward what jobs he wanted filled and to see to it that the steward filled those jobs. No one whose name was called by any steward was ever denied employment. Regarding casuals hired after exhausting the Local 1982 seniority list, both Syph and Moody had plenary hiring authority.

When the system changed in 1982, Syph still retained the authority to call the list of 26 experienced employees in any order he chose and thereby retained substantial discretion to designate who would be hired and who would not. His authority to designate who would receive lines was plenary, and the Respondent emphasized that authority every time it responded to a lines grievance.

In 1981, Edwards had the same plenary authority to hire whom he pleased on lines. No one hired by him was ever denied a place on the Respondent's payroll as a linesman. It should be noted that Edwards also worked in 1981 as a preferred man and earned a substantial amount of money as a rank-and-file employee loading and unloading ships. In that capacity he was plainly not a supervisor. It was as a nonsupervisory preferred man that he finished the 1981 season because, on November 3, 1981, he lost his position as lines dispatcher to Syph when Syph became dock steward.

After the parties revised the hiring procedure in May 1984, Syph still played a role in the hiring process and retained some discretion in selecting who would be hired and who would not. After shapeups were completed, marine foremen looked to Syph to supply them with casual employees to fill any crew vacancies that still remained, and at least Tefft looked to Syph to obtain these men from any source available to Syph. Then, as before, any person selected by Syph was routinely employed. On lines, Syph summoned linesmen by phone from a list supplied by the foremen. Although his discretion was narrowed, he was more than just a phone operator. He could decide who, on a list of 8 or 10 men designated by TWT, would be called first. Thus, he could influence who got more favorable lines assignments, including those that carried weekend premium pay. If, after May 23, 1984, Syph did not actually hire individuals on behalf of TWT, he effectively recommended them for hire and so remained a supervisor within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act.

2. Discriminatory motive

The pleadings and some of the General Counsel's evidence dwell on when Syph took over as steward, he hired relatives and cronies at shapeup and on lines. There is no doubt that this was a pervasive practice on the part of Syph, and he said as much to various Moody supporters. The General Counsel points out that the ILA never adopted objective criteria, other than an hours-of-work requirement, governing the hiring arrangement that existed at TWT, and that it never posted any such criteria for the benefit of job applicants. Because the ILA never operated an employment office or hiring hall, there was no place for it to post any hiring hall rules, except perhaps on company premises. The theory advanced by the General Counsel presumes the existence of a conventional hiring hall situation at the Port of Toledo during the period here in question, which never came into being. Such an arrangement presumes the existence of a union hall, apart from company premises, which is operated by one or more union officials who are paid by the union, not the employer, to operate that hall. In the course of their duties, they are obligated to send men to a company personnel office or to a hiring foreman, who is then obligated either to put them on the company payroll by virtue of the fact of referral or to call for more men. Here the dock steward doubled in brass as a company supervisor. If the theory underlying the General Counsel's contention were to be followed, it would be necessary first to find that the dock steward-supervisor referred men to himself and then hired them. This is conceptually absurd. It also results in giving the term "discrimination," as used in Section 8(a)(3) of the Act, a totally different meaning depending on whether it is to be applied to an employer or to a labor organization.[56] Moreover, such a theory is wholly unnecessary to the General Counsel's case under the facts in this record.
